Abadi—Landlord is presumed to be owner only of vacant site forming part of abadi—Weight of presumption though slightly impaired by existence of structure on site still landlord can be presumed to be owner 311*a*

Acknowledgment—No cause of action can be founded on acknowledgment 294*a*

Adverse possession—Legal nature of possession explained—Possession and occupation are distinct 357*b*

——Minor — Minority does not prevent ouster and stop running of adverse possession—Minor only gets another three years after attaining majority if time expires before three years—Occupation by minor is not equivalent to possession — Question to be considered is whether legal rights of ownership were exercised on his behalf by others—If so whether minor was in occupation becomes immaterial—Stranger entering on land and physically ousting minor from occupation as well as possession and setting up adverse title in himself — Time runs against minor from that moment — S bequeathing property to plaintiff and dying in 1917—Plaintiff minor in 1917 and living with S's widow — Widow asserting hostile title and obtaining mutation of all S's properties in her own name on 4th January 1918 and continuing in hostile possession till 1932 — Plaintiff alleging to have been kept out of knowledge of will by fraud till 1928 — Plaintiff turned out by widow in 1921, becoming major in 1922 and regaining possession as owner in 1932—Plaintiff held lost his title under S. 28, Limitation Act, 12 years after 4th January 1918 unless he could avail himself of S. 18, Limitation Act 357*c*

——Co-owners — Ouster — Demand and refusal or clear knowledge of ouster is necessary — Omission to pay profits does not amount to ouster 843*d*

——Possession need not be brought to notice of owner — Possession overt and without any attempt at concealment is sufficient—Acts, such as tethering of cattle on site, using it for sitting in open or sleeping during hot weather or for depositing cow-dung cakes and firewood by themselves are not adverse — But they become adverse when they are so overt and exclusive as to be referable to title asserted by adverse possessor by virtue of sale deed in his favour 311*c*

——Person entering into possession in fiduciary character — He must prove open assertion of hostile title to prove that his possession had become adverse 181*a*

——Cosharers—Name of some not entered in mutation register — Possession of other cosharers does not become adverse to them 141*a*

——Mortgagor and mortgagee — Mortgagee's possession secured under foreclosure decree is not adverse against mortgagor who is not party to the decree 141*b*

——Mortgage — Stranger entering into adverse possession of property burdened with simple mortgage—His adverse possession as against mortgagee does not commence until mortgagee has obtained decree for foreclosure 72*b*

Arms Act (11 of 1878), S. 19 (f)—Family living jointly in same house — Head of family is presumed to be in possession of unlicened arms found in house—Presumption is rebuttable—Weight to be attached to presumption varies with circumstances 296

Berar Inam Rules (1859), R. 3—Estate is restricted though not life estate — After collateral heirs of two removes, estate is disallowed in absence of special orders : 334*a*

——R. 3—Hyderabad Jagir is not personal but continues to relations mentioned in R. 3—Each holder is not grantee but holds only certificate — Certificate should show proper persons — If one of two persons is through mistake left out it should be corrected and both should be entitled to jagir 334*b*

Berar Land Revenue Code (1928), Ss. 173 and 182—Joint Hindu family consisting of father and minor sons—Sale by father—Minor son can pre-empt—Addition of son's name by father to sale deed does not make son vendor 199*b*

——S. 183 — Pre-emption — Price fixed apparently much below market price—Court has to fix bona fide value—Vendor is entitled to get difference between real value and fixed value from pre-emptor and is entitled to appeal 353

Central Provinces and Berar Relief of Indebtedness Act (14 of 1939), S. 6 (3)—Mortgage — Preliminary decree passed against mortgagor and his transferees—Pending application for final decree transferees applying to Debt Relief Court—Mortgage being one and indivisible, proceedings for final decree must be stayed for both mortgagor and transferees or for none : 268

C. P. and Berar Relief of Indebtedness Act ——Ss. 20 and 23—Ss. 20 and 23 totally bar jurisdiction of civil Court in respect of any matter pending before Debt Relief Court —Notice under S. 6 (3) of Act issued—Civil Court staying proceedings—No revision lies to High Court from stay order 268*a*

Central Provinces Debt Conciliation Act (2 of 1933), S. 2 (e)—Words "recoverable as an arrear of land revenue" mean debt recoverable in conceivable circumstances as land revenue — Nature of debt must be looked to—Compromise decree in suit for arrears of thekajama in proprietor's favour is excluded from purview of S. 2 (e) : 161

——S. 4, Proviso — Word 'prescribed' means prescribed by rules 226*a*

——S. 7 (1), Proviso — Words "at any time"—Meaning — It is not correct to say that the words "at any time" must mean any time before the Board has accepted the application 226*c*

——S. 7A—Construction—It is not proper construction of S. 7A to say that if the application is made not under the powers conferred by S. 4 but in flat violation of the provisions of that section it is not an application under Section 4 226*d*

——Ss. 8, 8 (2) and 9 (1)—Conditions of S. 8 fulfilled — Operation of S. 8 (2) is automatic and independent of order of Board — Civil Court has jurisdiction to determine whether conditions requisite for operation of S. 8 (2) were present or not —Aforesaid conditions not present—Board's order under S. 8 (2) cannot bind civil Court 249*a*

——Ss. 8 (1) and (2) and 9A—Omission to verify statement as required by S. 9A is curable and not fatal defect — Unverified statement—No objection taken and matter allowed to proceed — Party concerned afforded no opportunity to cure defect—Statement must be deemed to have substantially complied with S. 8 (1) 249*c*

——Ss. 9, 8 (2) and 9A — Signature on statement under S 9 by creditor's son with his father's authority and consent is valid —Creditor's failure to sign statement under S. 9 is only defect of procedure and can be cured even in appeal — In such case Court should not proceed under S. 8 (2) but should grant time to creditor to remedy defect 159*a*

——S. 9 — Admission by debtor of agreement to pay sum due on bond — S. 9 does not operate 95*c*

Central Provinces General Clauses Act (1 of 1914), S. 22—Rule and notification —Difference explained 226*b*

Central Provinces Land Alienation Act (2 of 1916), S. 9 (1) (2) and (3) and Ss. 3, 1 (2) and (3) and 25 (2)—Date of commencement of Act in S. 9 (1) and (2) refers to date fixed under S. 1 (3)—Mortgage by conditional sale by Kanwar of Bilaspur in 1926—Notifications under Ss. 1 (2) and 3 making Act applicable to Bilaspur and declaring Kanwars to be aboriginals issued in 1933—Subsequently on foreclosure decree being made absolute mortgagee put in possession—S. 9 does not apply—Deputy Commissioner cannot apply under S. 25 (2) of the Act 163*a* ——S. 25 (3) — Right of revision under S. 25 (3) is not reserved to Deputy Commissioner alone but is open to any party aggrieved 163*b*

Central Provinces Land Revenue Act (2 of 1917), S. 2 (17) — Ex-proprietor subsequently purchasing share in village though not to same extent as before — He regains proprietary rights in sir and ceases to be occupancy tenant 351*b*

——S. 2 (17) — Construction must be in favour of proprietor 351*c*

——Ss. 122, 123, 187 and 157 (3) — Co-sharer defaulting in paying land revenue—Lambardar or sadar lambardar paying revenue on behalf of defaulting cosharer acquires charge on defaulting cosharer's share—He can charge interest in such case on equitable principles 245

——S. 188—Permanant lease of khudkast land by Hindu widow granted in course of village management — Lease is binding on reversioner—Burden of proof stated : 306*d*

——S. 188 and C. P. Tenancy Act (1 of 1920), Ss. 2 (7) and 49 — Division of title between cosharers—Transfer of proprietary rights by cosharers — Transferee and not lambardar becomes landlord of transferor ex-proprietary tenant — If however transferring cosharer has not exclusive ownership but only exclusive enjoyment then lambardar is the landlord—Lambardar must however in that case hand over rent collected to transferee cosharer (Per Full Bench; Stone C. J., and Vivian Bose J. contra.) (FB) 21

——S. 222—Failure to lodge claim within three years of notification does not debar defence based on title 300*a*

——S. 222 — S. 222 does not lay down prescription 300*b*

Central Provinces Local Fund Audit Act (9 of 1933), S. 14—Appeal to High Court arising out of application under S. 14—No ad valorem court-fee can be demanded : 129*a*

Central Provinces Local Self-Government Act (4 of 1920), S. 23—S. 23 does not apply to village panchayat 128*a*

——S. 73—S. 73 does not apply to actions based on breach of contract — District Council taking premises on lease for placing school therein — Suit by lessor for arrears of rent—S. 73 does not apply—Limitation for suit is governed by ordinary law : 273*d*

——S. 75 —Contract in breach of S. 75 is illegal 273*b*

——S. 75—Construction—Word "respectively" should be read after words "with that Council, Board or Committee" — Member of Committee interested in contract with District Council — No offence is committed 273*c*

Central Provinces Money-lenders Act (13 of 1934)—Burden of proof — The Act only applies to money-lenders and therefore before it can be applied it must be shown by the person seeking to apply it and seeking to take advantage of its provisions that the plaintiff is money-lender 177*e*

——(as amended from time to time), S. 2 (v)—Regular course of business—Isolated act of money-lending is not money-lending in regular course of business 177*c*

Central Provinces Municipalities Act (2 of 1922) (as applied to Berar)—Rules 19, 20 and 21 made by Local Government for collection of cycle tax — Rules being in excess of Government's power and in contravention of Act are ultra vires and of no effect 232*b* ——Terminal tax — Terminal tax rules of Nagpur Municipality, R. 3 — Hard drawn bare copper wire imported by rail is liable to be assessed under serial No. 5 and not under serial No. 7 of Terminal Tax Schedule 137*b*

——S. 83 (2)—Commissioner is competent to make a reference 137*a*

——Ss. 97 and 98 — Building bye-laws under, framed by Nagpur Civil Station Sub-Committee, bye-law 10 and bye-law 10, proviso 1—Construction of proviso 1—Word "area" in proviso 1 refers to plots and not to bungalow area—Sub-Committee by resolution making bye-law 10 (a) and (b) applicable to bungalow area excepting basti area and new settlements and bye-law 10, proviso 1 to settlements other than bungalow area—Resolution held ultra vires as altering bye-law 10 364*d*

Central Provinces Municipalities Act ——Ss. 97 and 98 — Building bye-laws under, framed by Nagpur Civil Station Sub-Committee, bye-law 10 — Sub-Committee by resolution interpreting bye-law—Resolution is not absolutely binding on subsequent meeting of Sub-Committee 364*f*

——S. 133 (1) (e) — Flour mill, unless raising offensive noises, smell or smoke, is not licensable under Section 138 (1) (e) 292*b*

——Ss. 175 and 176—Rule-making power of Provincial Government is subject to limitations in Ss. 175 and 176 which do not confer on it any power to impose pecuniary burden for public purpose 232*a*

——Ss. 179 (1) (b-1), Bye-law (11)—Purchase of linseed in municipal market—Refusal to take delivery on ground that linseed was mixed with lot of mud—Offence of breach of bye-law is committed — Bye-law is not unreasonable interference with trade, and comes under head of regulating use of markets mentioned in S. 179 (1) (b-1)—It is not in restraint of trade and is not ultra vires—Even assuming latter part bad, that part may be separated from good part instead of declaring whole bye-law void 203*a*

Central Provinces Reduction of Interest Act (32 of 1936)—Applicability — Act in force during suit on loan but repealed before judgment in suit — Court in its judgment cannot resort to provisions of Act 177*d*

Central Provinces Tenancy Act (1 of 1920), Ss. 6 and 12—Hindu widow cannot surrender her holding so as to defeat reversioner (Obiter) 306*c*

——S. 12 (4)—Document prima facie not embodying transfer prohibited by Act — Registering Officer is bound to admit document to registration—Registration however does not cure defects in conveyance : 328*a*

——S. 13 — Lambardar omitting to apply under S. 13 — He can sue his cosharer for possession of holding surrendered by tenant to him 221*b*

——Ss. 35, 12 — Registered surrender by tenant of occupancy holding to stranger — Surrender is invalid — If transaction amounts to abandonment lambardars' remedy is under S. 35—If it is transfer in violation of S. 12 lambardar must proceed before revenue authorities—Suit for possession in civil Court should be dismissed: 328*b*

——Ss. 49 and 37—Both proprietary and cultivating rights given up—Person acquir-

Central Provinces Tenancy Act ing such rights can transfer cultivating rights to another 79*d*
——S. 106—Suit purporting to be for arrears of rent — Defendant found not to be tenant—Suit must be dismissed 351*a* Central Provinces Village Panchayat Act (5 of 1920), S. 12 (1) (d) — Holding of market is measure of public utility—Village Panchayat can undertake control of it without reference to District Council: 128*b*
Certiorari—Writ of—Nagpur High Court cannot issue 282*b*
Charitable and Religious Trusts Act (14 of 1920), S. 3 — Dedication of property to idol is case of trust and is covered by S. 3 317*c*
Civil Procedure Code (5 of 1908), S. 2 and O. 23, R. 1 — Suit by three plaintiffs — Plaintiffs 2 and 3 deriving title from plaintiff 1—Plaintiff 1 withdrawing suit—Court dismissing whole suit as withdrawn by plaintiff 1 — Decision is on merits and not simply under O. 23, R. 1 and is appealable — No revision lies — Mere absence of formal drawing up of decree does not invest High Court with jurisdiction to interfere in revision 180
——S. 2 (2) and O. 6, R. 5 — Suit for damages — Plaintiff ordered to furnish certain particulars — Plaintiff even after several opportunities failing to furnish particulars —Court thereupon passing order discharging defendant — Order held amounted to decree and was appealable 223
*——S. 2 (2) — Decree — Matters determined must be of substance granting or denying remedy on part of plaintiff — Two alternative modes of seeking remedy—Court holding that one is not available—Decision is appealable 84*a* ——Ss. 2 (5) and 16 — Courts in Berar are not foreign Courts in British India and vice versa (Per Full Bench; Niyogi J., contra*)* (FB) 36*a* ——Ss. 2 (5), 16, 17 and 21 — British Indian mortgage decree with respect to Berar property and British Indian property can be executed in Berar—No suit on British Indian judgment is necessary: (Per Full Bench: Niyogi J., contra*)*: (FB) 36*d*
*——S. 6 — Mortgage suit — Subsequent mortgagee added as defendant claiming his rights to be investigated and decided—Suit for purposes of jurisdiction has to be valued ad valorem on amount due on plaintiff's prior mortgage — Jurisdiction is not lost if amounts claimed on prior and subsequent mortgages together exceed Court's pecuniary jurisdiction — No court-fee is payable on claim under subsequent mortgage 138

——S. 11 — Might and ought — Plea not raised for want of knowledge — Fact with due diligence could have been discovered — Plea is barred by res judicata 346*a*

NIYOGI J.

Ganpatdas Kaludas Gosai — Defendant — Appellant

v.

Harivallabh Onkarji Trivedi —
Plaintiff — Respondent.

Misc. Appeal No. 119 of 1939, Decided on 5th August 1940, from order of 1st Addl. Dist. Judge, Nagpur, D/- 29th April 1939.

* (a) Stamp Act (1899), S. 35—Document held not promissory note and could, if insufficiently stamped, be validated by levy of penalty.

It is necessary to look into the terms of the document and the surrounding circumstances to see whether it was intended to be a promissory note in the sense of its being intended to be used as a negotiable instrument. The mere use of the words "I promise to pay" would not necessarily make it a promissory note. [P 1 C 2; P 2 C 2]

A document provided as follows: "On demand I promise to pay to Mr. Harivallabh Onkarji Trivedi of Nagpur the sum of Rs. 950 only which I have taken this day as a loan in cash without mortgaging anything with interest at the rate of Re. 1 per cent. per month; the whole capital as well as interest will be repaid by three years from the date. If I failed to repay within the time I shall pay interest at 1½ rupee per cent. per month.":

Held that the parties did not intend the document to be a negotiable instrument and that in reality it purported to incorporate only the terms of an oral agreement. It could therefore be validated on levy of the penalty if it was insufficiently stamped. [P 1 C 2]

(b) Deed — Construction — Deed must be construed as a whole.

Documents must be construed as a whole, and every part of the documents must receive attention and the intention should be gathered from the whole context of the instrument so as to make one entire and consistent construction of the whole: A I R 1928 P C 35, Rel. on. [P 2 C 2]

R. N. Padhye — for Appellant.

M. R. Indurkar and A. B. Jamdar — for Respondent.

Judgment.—This is a defendant's appeal from an order of remand passed under O. 41, R. 23, Civil Procedure Code, by the first Additional District Judge, Nagpur, in civil appeal No. 1-B on 29th April 1939. The respondent sued to recover Rs. 1170 on the strength of a document dated 5th June 1935, which was described as a promissory note. The terms of that document are as follows:

On demand I promise to pay to Mr. Harivallabh Onkarji Trivedi of Nagpur the sum of Rs. 950 only which I have taken this day as a loan in cash without mortgaging anything with interest at the rate of Re. 1 per cent. per month; the whole capital as well as interest will be repaid by three years from the date. If I failed to repay within the time I shall pay interest at 1½ rupee per cent. per month.

It bears an adhesive revenue stamp of four annas. The defendant contended that, it being a promissory note under which the loan was payable otherwise than on demand, was liable to stamp duty under Article 49 (b) of sch. I to the Stamp Act II of 1899 as a bill of exchange and that as it was insufficiently stamped S. 35, Stamp Act, bars its validation by levy of penalty. That contention prevailed in the Court of first instance but was overruled on appeal.

The principal question is whether it was intended to be a promissory note within the meaning of that expression as defined in S. 4, Negotiable Instruments Act. The mere use of the words "I promise to pay" would not necessarily make it a promissory note. As observed by Bowen, L. J., in (1888) 21 Q B D 352[1] at p. 357 most commercial documents contain, either expressly or by implication, a promise to pay a sum of money, but they may contain a great deal besides, and it cannot be contended that all such documents are promissory notes within the meaning of the section." This case was decided on appeal from the decision reported in (1888) 20 Q B D 645[2] in which the observations of Pollock, B., are as significant. They are as follows::

The next question is, can we say that this instrument is necessarily included in the terms of the section? It would be easy to say that every instrument was necessarily included which provides simply and purely for the payment of money, whether it be one single payment, or distributed over a period, or to be paid out of a particular fund, or upon any condition or contingency. But can that construction be applied where, though all the terms of the section are satisfied with respect to the payment of money, the document is not a document which in ordinary parlance is called a promissory note, but contains terms beyond a stipulation for a mere money payment? In that state of things ought it to be treated as one instrument or as two separate instruments? I think it is clear that for the purposes of the Stamp Act it cannot have been intended that a document should be treated as in part a promissory note and in part an agreement. It must be either one or the other. The question is, what is the dominant, the substantial effect of the instrument? In this respect the prior decisions assist me in forming a conclusion. The Courts have said that in order to determine the question two things must be enquired into—what is the intention of the parties, and what is the instrument in the common acceptation of men of business, or persons among whom it is commonly used.

Their Lordships of the Privy Council in 17 LAH 557[3] at p. 569, decided a similar point on the broad ground, namely, whether it was intended to be brought within the definition relating to documents which are to be negotiable instruments. Their Lordships referred to the English case reported in (1888) 20 Q B D 352[1] at p. 357, and pointed out that documents such as receipts and agreements generally were not intended to be negotiable, and serious embarrassment would be caused in commerce if the negotiable net were cast too wide. On the terms of the instrument before them, their Lordships found that it was primarily a receipt and they declared that even if it was coupled with a promise to pay it was not a promissory note. In A I R 1938 P C 121[4] their Lordships of the Privy Council observed that there was a strong current of authority in India to the effect that documents containing a promise to pay came within the ban of S. 35, Stamp Act, and alluding to 63 I A 279,[3] pointed out that the test is not that the instrument contained a promise to pay but whether or not the parties clearly intended the document to serve as a negotiable instrument.

It is consequently necessary to look into the terms of the document and the surrounding circumstances to see whether it was intended to be a promissory note in the sense of its being intended to be used as a negotiable instrument. It is a well-recognized rule of construction of documents that they must be construed as a whole, that every part of the documents must receive attention and that the intention should be gathered from the whole context of the instrument so as to make one entire and consistent construction of the whole : see 54 M L J 82[5] at p. 87.

The document under consideration starts with the words "On demand I promise to pay" but subsequently says that the principal sum with interest would be repaid in three years. The words "promise to pay on demand" as explained in 11 N L R 189[6] at p. 192, import that the debt is due and payable immediately. Now, this stipulation is inconsistent with the later one which says that the money was payable within three years. The learned counsel for the appellant contends that the intention was that the money was to be repaid within three years from the date of demand made for its payment. On this argument the making of a demand would be a condition precedent to payment and the date of payment would vary according to the date of the demand. That is manifestly not an unconditional promise to pay. If the promise to pay within the specified time, namely three years, had stood by itself it would not have affected the unconditional nature of the promise as provided in S. 5, Negotiable Instruments Act, for the reason that the obligation to pay, though not immediate, was postponed till a specified date. Whether the parties contemplated payment immediately or after a lapse of a specified period, the date when the promise is liable to be enforced is a well-defined and certain date and the liability is unconditional; but that is not the position with regard to the document under consideration which recites a promise to pay immediately and in the same breath at some future unspecified and shifting date. This glaring inconsistency in the document itself evidences that it was not intended to be used as a negotiable instrument. The recital containing in that instrument, viz., that the executant had received Rs. 950 in cash was a false recital inasmuch as it is clear from the trend of the pleadings that the amount represented a balance found due on previous accounts. The position was that the creditor had been lending money to the debtor from time to time and receiving payments. The relations between the parties were purely those of debtor and creditor and they obviously intended to bring into existence an acknowledgment of the debt coupled with a fresh agreement to discharge the balance found due within the period specified there with a fresh agreement as to payment of interest.

The primary rate of interest settled was Re. 1 per cent. with a stipulation for its enhancement to Re. 1½ per cent. on default being made in payment of the debt within the specified period. The material terms of the document leave no doubt that it was intended to be a memo of an already concluded oral agreement. To escape payment of the full stamp the agreement was made to simulate the form of a promissory note by use of initial words "on demand I promise to pay". I agree with the lower Appellate Court that the parties did not intend the document to be a negotiable instrument and that in reality it purported to incorporate only the terms of an oral agreement. It was therefore rightly validated on levy of the penalty. The appeal is dismissed with costs. Costs in the Courts below will be paid as ordered by the lower Appellate Court.

Judgment. — This appeal arises out of an order made on an objection brought by the auction-purchaser in a Court auction following upon a decree in a suit on a second mortgage whereby the auction-purchaser sought to prevent the sale, in execution of a decree on the first mortgage, of the same subject-matter as had been sold to him in the earlier Court auction. To understand the argument it is necessary to state a few facts. This is a case in which the mortgagor and the mortgagee are the same in both the mortgages. The subject-matter of the first mortgage we will call Blackacre. The subject-matter of the second mortgage we will call Blackacre and Whiteacre. The first mortgage was so conditioned that the money did not become due before 13th February 1934 so that it was quite impossible for the mortgagee, even had he been so minded, to sue on that mortgage before that date. On the other hand the second mortgage was so worded as to make the money become due on an earlier date. Accordingly a suit was brought on the second mortgage on 24th April 1933, some ten months before a suit could have been brought on the first mortgage, and it is for that reason that S. 67-A, T. P. Act, does not apply to this case. A preliminary decree for sale in the suit on the second mortgage was passed on 4th February 1934, nine days before a suit could have been brought on the first mortgage, and a final decree was passed on 27th June 1936. It is pursuant to that final decree that the sale took place. As regards the first mortgage the suit was brought on 13th December 1934; preliminary decree was passed on 31st July 1935, and final decree on 1st August 1936. When the sale took place in execution of the decree on the second mortgage the proclamation shows the following incumbrance to which the property is liable :

On account of mortgage incumbrance Rs. 16,165 mortgage decree in C. S. No. 14-A of 1934 of the Court of Additional District Judge, Jubbulpore.

That is the decree which had been passed, by the date of the proclamation, in the second suit so that the sale in execution of the decree in the first suit took place after a decree in the second suit had been obtained, that is to say, the suit on the first mortgage. The list of property sold shows that it was sold subject to the incumbrance of the mortgage decree for Rs. 16,165 of the Court of the Additional District Judge, Jubbulpore, in C. S. No. 14-A of 1934. It is apparent from the evidence of the auction-purchaser that he had purchased it subject to this mortgage decree. He gives the value of the property free of the mortgage decree at Rs. 30,000 and he purchased this property, which he himself says is worth Rs. 30,000 free from incumbrance, for Rs. 16,000 subject to mortgage.

Nevertheless it is urged with his accustomed ingenuity by Mr. Padhye for the appellant in this case that this is a case which is controlled by the principle that though a mortgagee who is a mortgagee in respect of the same property under several mortgages, one subsequent to the other, may sue as many times as he has mortgages, he cannot sell as many times as he has mortgages but that he can sell once only. That proposition is said to be founded on 3 I C 175,[1] 20 ALL 322[2] followed in 25 C W N 129,[3] A I R 1927 ALL 117[4] and 31 N L R SUP 1.[5] 25 C W N 129[3] is an elaborate judgment dealing with the question whether in a case such as this there can be two suits, and Mookerjee C. J., in the course of an examination of many cases on that point came to the conclusion that there could be more than one suit. Then the Court considers very summarily whether granted two suits there can be two sales, 3 I C 175[1] is referred to, and the Court observes at p. 137 as follows:

We have finally to consider what conditions, if any should be annexed to the decree that may be made herein, for it is indisputable that the property cannot be sold twice in execution of the decrees in the two suits. There cannot be a sale on the first mortgage keeping alive a puisne encumbrance, for such a sale conveys the interests of the mortgagor and the mortgagee as they were at the date of the first mortgage and must therefore necessarily sweep away the subsequent encumbrance.

That appears to have been followed in 31 N L R SUP 1,[5] which, at p. 8, it is argued, goes beyond the above for there it is observed:

It is not however open to the holder of two mortgages to have the property sold in execution of the first mortgage subject to the second mortgage, because by having the property sold on the first mortgage he must be deemed to have withdrawn that property from the operation of the later mortgage. If therefore the mortgaged property or part of it is sold in execution of one of the mortgages, it cannot therefore be sold again in execution of the other mortgage.

That is an observation which appears in the decision of a Full Bench of the Judicial Commissioner's Court and would be binding upon us were it necessary for the decision of that case. But in that case the sale was in execution of the decree on the first mortgage. The principle that was applied was that when a first mortgagee sells he sells the property as at the time of the first mortgage, and therefore he sells free from incumbrance, and if he sells free from incumbrance he sells the whole estate, and if he sells the whole estate he cannot sell it again. Nor can he, according to these observations, reserve the second mortgage interest and sell the property subject to the second mortgage.

In this case however what is being sold is the equity of redemption which was outstanding in the mortgagor after the first mortgage was effected. It appears to us to be beyond argument that if A is the mortgagor and B the mortgagee and A takes a mortgage from B of Blackacre and then at a later date B mortgages to C by way of a second mortgage C can sue B on the second mortgage, obtain a decree for sale and sell the equity of redemption. That having been done, A can sue B and obtain a decree for sale on the first mortgage, and bring the property to sale. No difference would arise if C assigned his rights to A so that A is the first mortgagee and the assignee of the second mortgage. In such a case he could sue on the second mortgage, get a decree for sale and sell. Then he could sue on his first mortgage and get a decree for sale and sell. We fail to see in principle what possible difference it could make if A is a first and a second mortgagee direct as a consequence of taking one mortgage from B at one date and another mortgage of the same property from B at another date. Different considerations may well arise where the sale is of the subject-matter of the first mortgage. If it be correct to say that on such a sale what is sold is the unencumbered property with all its rights including the equity of redemption then doubtless there is nothing left to be sold a second time; but that is not the position here. What is being sold here is the equity of redemption and what is being purchased is the equity of redemption. The purchaser purchases subject to the mortgage. He has full notice of it and he gets for Rs. 16,000 what he regards as worth Rs. 30,000 because he bought subject to the mortgage. The first mortgage does not amount to Rs. 14,000 but amounts to Rs. 11,000 and odd so that even if the auction-purchaser has to pay off the first mortgage he gets, according to his own evidence, a bargain.

It was argued on the authority in I L R (1939) NAG 665[6] that the purchaser at an auction sale in execution of the second mortgage decree could impeach the first mortgage. That was said because it was argued that he had merely bought subject to notice and not subject to the mortgage. In our opinion he bought subject to the mortgage; but even if he bought only with notice and though he could impeach the mortgage he has not impeached it. That has not yet been done. The result is that the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

First Appeal No. 26 of 1936, Decided on 26th September 1939, from decree of Sub-Judge, First Class, Ellichpur, D/- 20th October 1935.

(a) Transfer of Property Act (1882), S. 54 — Mortgagee's rights are intangible rights in immovable property and cannot be transferred without written instrument.

There is a wide difference between a transfer made by a mortgagor and a transfer made by a mortgagee. What the mortgagor has is the land which is immovable, tangible property and property of which possession can be delivered. What a mortgagee has depends to some extent on the kind of mortgage but as is broadly stated in S. 58 of the Act: "A mortgage is the transfer of an interest in specific immovable property." That interest (at any rate in mortgages which do not involve the immediate transfer of either legal title or possession) is an intangible right in immovable property and cannot be transferred prima facie without a written instrument : 29 Cal 1 (F B); A I R 1930 All 110; A I R 1933 Lah 210; A I R 1924 All 796 and A I R 1928 All 726 (F B), Ref. [P 6 C 1]

(b) Tenants-in-Common—Title cannot be transferred to another except in ways permitted by law.

If the titles are distinct as they are when persons hold as tenants-in-common title cannot be handed on to another except in one of the ways expressly permitted by law. [P 8 C 1]

(c) Mortgage — All parties entitled to share in money due on mortgage not on record — Suit must be dismissed in its entirety.

A mortgage is indivisible and if all the parties entitled to a share in the money due on the mortgage are not upon the record the suit must be dismissed in its entirety : A I R 1916 Pat 310; A I R 1938 Nag 42 and A I R 1933 Cal 621, Rel. on. [P 8 C 1]

(d) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 1, R. 9 — Joinder of parties—Court's power — Plea of non-joinder raised in pleadings — Parties cannot be joined at appellate stage.

Even though the Court has power to join the Court cannot join a party when the litigant in whose interest the joinder is to be made refuses to have the necessary parties joined. If the point of non-joinder is properly taken in the pleadings the parties cannot be joined at appellate stage. [P 8 C 1]

Judgment.—This appeal raises a number of points of law all of which could have been avoided by the joinder of the proper parties. This joinder was refused by the plaintiffs' pleader after the difficulties had been disclosed. On 17th April 1935 the pleader for the plaintiffs refused to make Gulabchand and Dhanraj parties. Now the question is: Are they necessary parties? The suit is a mortgage suit. The plaintiffs obtained, through a third party assignee, the mortgagee's rights by purchase. That purchase, however, was in conjunction with two other persons Premraj and Dhanraj. Premraj died and his estate went to Dhanraj and Gulabchand. Dhanraj and Gulabchand purported to transfer or (as it is put in argument) relinquish their rights in favour of plaintiffs for the sum of Rs. 75. That transaction was oral. The Court has held that it was a valid transfer under the provisions of S. 54, T. P. Act, on the ground that there was delivery of possession, that the consideration was under Rs. 100, that the mortgage debt is immovable property and therefore it can be sold, if of the value of under Rs. 100, by delivery. On appeal it is pointed out that S. 54 is concerned with two kinds of sales (1) where a registered instrument is required (2) where the transfer can be either by registered instrument or by delivery of possession. What is meant by delivery is stated :

> Delivery of tangible immovable property takes place when the seller places the buyer, or such person as he directs, in possession of the property.

What was transferred here were mortgagees' rights. Doubtless those rights are rights in immovable property : 29 CAL 1,[1] A IR 1933 LAH 210,[2] 52 ALL 232,[3] 46 ALL 917.[4] But they are not in our opinion rights of which possession can be taken. There is a wide difference between a transfer made by a mortgagor and a transfer made by a mortgagee: 50 ALL 986,[5] 60 CAL 87.[6] What the mortgagor has is the land which is immovable tangible property and property of which possession can be delivered. What a mortgagee has depends to some extent on the kind of mortgage but is broadly stated in S. 58, T. P. Act ; "A mortgage is the transfer of an interest in specific immovable property." That interest, in our opinion, (at any rate in mortgages which do not involve the immediate transfer of either legal title or possession) is an intangible right in immovable property and cannot be transferred prima facie without a written instrument.

But it is said that this is not a case of transfer but of relinquishment. One starts with the mortgagees composed of the mortgagee-plaintiffs and Dhanraj and Gulabchand. Regard them as partners, or regard them as co-tenants. On either view this, it is said, is a case of relinquishment. Therefore, the rules relating to relinquishment say, by a Hindu widow, apply. There is no transfer of title but merely an obliteration of rights. Consequently the document (there is a receipt) effecting this obliteration does not require registration. Alternatively the obliteration can be orally effected. This question was considered by one of us in A I R 1936 NAG 186.[7] It was pointed out there that we start with this fundamental principle, namely that once a title or an estate has vested in a person he cannot rid himself of it except by death or by one of the modes of transfer recognized by law. Discussing the position of the heir-at-law in England it was said :

> If it had been a statement of the English law as it obtains today, it would, perhaps, be unassailable, but that is because the Land Transfer Act of 1897 has grafted a statutory exception on to the general law, and now vests an intestate's property in his personal representative, that is to say, his administrator and not in his heir-at-law : 14 Halsbury's Laws of England, page 160 (Edn. 2). Thus the heir having no vested interest in the property is free to disclaim the inheritance. But no such disclaimer can be made once the property has vested, for his rights are then different, and the interest once vested is vested irrevocably : (1802) 6 R R 563[8] at pp. 566 and 567. The crux of the matter lies there. The test is the vesting of the estate. It is undoubted that in every other case a man is not bound to take what he does not want, and whether he be given property by a will or a gift or a conveyance, his assent, whether express or implied, is essential to vest the estate in him. Consequently he is free to disclaim it, if he so desires. But the heir-at-law is in a different position. He is the only person in whom the law of England, before the Land Transfer Act of 1897 vested property against his will whether he would or not. No disclaimer that he might make would have any effect, though, of course, he might as soon as he pleased, dispose of the property by an ordinary conveyance: Williams on Real Property, Edn. 24, p. 119, 40 Cal 721[9] at p. 750 and 38 Mad 474[10] at p. 478. The reason is obvious. An estate whether an inheritance or not, cannot remain in abeyance without statutory or other sanction. The seisin to it must reside in somebody during every moment of time and this is the Hindu no less than the English law. Mayne states in his Hindu Law, Edn. 9, page 725, para. 499. The right of succession under Hindu law is a right which vests immediately on the death of the owner of the property. It cannot in any circumstances remain in abeyance.
> It follows there can be no disclaimer or relinquishment either generally or in favour of a particular person, unless it is specifically permitted by some special provision of law. In every other case a title once vested can be divested only by a recognized conveyance, or one of the other means allowed by law. It cannot pass by admission or relinquishment or disclaimer when the law requires a deed : 33 Cal 967[11] at p. 983.

There are two apparent exceptions. One is the case of a joint Hindu family. But that is not really an exception to the general rule because as was explained in the earlier decision,[7] the distinction between a disclaimer of this kind by a member of a joint Hindu family where the seisin of the entire estate resides in each member and one where the seisin resides in the person disclaiming alone, is obvious. When a joint tenant relinquishes his right, there is no transfer or conveyance; only a blotting out of his interest and an enlargement of the inchoate rights of the others to a share on partition. But when a man is seised of the whole fee himself, the title which resides in him has to pass on to another, and that can only be done by one of the recognized modes of conveyance, when no questions of adverse possession or estoppel or part performance arise. This distinction was recognized in 14 N L R 56[12] at page 59 where Drake-Brockman J. C., in dissenting from 11 Mad 406[13] observed : 'I venture to doubt whether the Smritis treated renouncement as equivalent to an alienation.' 16 All 369[14] at page 370 and 25 Mad 149[15] at p. 156 make the same observation. Golapchandra Sarkar Sastri also says in his Hindu law, Edn. 7th, p. 530 : 'Renunciation does not operate as alienation but as extinction of the co-parcener's interest, according to the true intent of the Smritis. If it were alienation, it would be gift ; but it has been held that a member of a joint family cannot make a gift of his undivided share.' This is so even in Madras and Bombay 'where the strict anti-alienation doctrine of the Mitakshara has been departed from in favour of purchasers for value: 27 Mad 162[16] at p. 166 and 19 Bom 803.[17] It is further evident from the fact that the interests of the sons who are then in being are not affected in such cases: 33 Bom 267[18] at pp. 270 and 271. I respectfully agree.

The other exception is that of a limited female owner relinquishing under the Hindu law. But that stands on a special footing and the position is accepted at this date only on the ground of stare decisis and for no other reason. This was also explained in the ruling referred to.

The right of a Hindu widow to surrender her life estate and accelerate the succession has long been recognized. But although founded on the Smritis, their Lordships of the Privy Council have twice observed that it has been settled 'by long practice and confirmed by decision' : 42 Mad 523[19] at page 532 and 47 Cal 466[20] at p. 483. But even so whether the act is in reality a conveyance or not was for some time in doubt. The learned Judges in 43 Mad 855[21] at page 858, seem to have placed it on that footing, though they observe that there can be no surrender without the consent of the next reversioner. Beaman J., disagreed with this in 39 Bom 87[23] at p. 100, on the ground that an acceleration is not an alienation at all, but a mere renunciation, the obliterating of a bar in which the life estate is withdrawn in its entirety, and that after that it is not the tenant of the life-estate, but the law which does the rest. On the other hand, their Lordships of the Privy Council called it a 'conveyance' in 19 Cal 236[23] at p. 241 and used that term again in 42 Mad 523[19] at p. 533 although at p. 532 they described the act as 'the effacement of the widow—an effacement which in other circumstances is effected by actual death or by civil death—which opens the estate of the deceased husband to his next heirs at that date.'

The distinction is of importance, for a conveyance requires a registered document when the property involved is over Rs. 100 in value, whereas an 'effacement' not amounting to a conveyance can be effected orally. Sir Lawrence Jenkins C. J. also refers to this in the Full Bench ruling in 40 Cal 721[9] at p. 750, and Mookerjee J., at p. 780. The latter points out that the right is not grounded on any logical principle but on long usage confirmed by judicial precedent which has confused two distinct ideas. He points out that surrenders have been upheld not only when the widow relinquishes without consideration, but also when she sells the estate to the next reversioner for cash and thus converts it into money 'which may be shuffled out of sight as land can never be', a transaction which by no stretch of language can be deemed a relinquishment of her interest in the estate. Some of the precedents quoted by Mookerji J., at pp. 778 and 779 uphold an alienation to a stranger of the entire estate with the consent of the next reversioner, on the ground that it can be 'deemed to operate precisely in the same manner as two conveyances, one by the widow to the reversioner and the other by the reversioner to the transferee', the question being one of form rather than of substance. Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee, when dealing with this in 42 Mad 523[19] at p. 533, observe that, 'the surrender once exercised in favour of the nearest reversioner or reversioners the estate became his or theirs, and it was an obvious extension of the doctrine to hold that, inasmuch as he or they were in title to convey to a third party, it came to the same thing if the conveyance was made by the widow with his or their consent.'

It is obvious this cannot be done without a conveyance, for however much the widow may be affected neither civil death nor natural death can vest the estate in any but the immediate reversioner, and his title cannot be passed on by mere assent. A conveyance at some stage would clearly be necessary. However these doubts have now been set at rest by the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in 47 Cal 466[20] at p. 483 where their Lordships observe: 'This voluntary selfeffacement is sometimes referred to as a surrender, sometimes as relinquishment or abandonment of her rights; and it may be effected by any process having that effect.'

But they also observe that the question is not free from difficulty, and as I have already pointed out, it is not founded on any logical principle. The limited estate of a female owner under Hindu law is a peculiar one, and I do not think that considerations which prevail there, and which are now applied simply because of long usage, should be extended beyond it.

But none of these rules would apply to tenants-in-common where there is no unity of title. If the titles are distinct as they are when persons hold as tenants-in-common, then we are left with the fundamental position that title cannot be handed on to another except in one of the ways expressly permitted by law. That there is no unity of title when there is a tenancy-in-common is clear from Williams on Real Property, Edn. 24, p. 295. Is the omission of these defendants fatal? As was pointed out in 1 PAT L J 468[24] a mortgage is indivisible and if all the parties entitled to a share in the money due on the mortgage are not upon the record the suit must be dismissed in its entirety : see also I L R (1938) NAG 370[25] at p. 375 and 60 CAL 777.[26]

A nice point in some cases arises as to whether O. 1, R. 9, is subservient to O. 34, R. 1. In the above case 1 PAT L J 468[24] it was held that it was. Here the point does not arise because even though it be held that the Court has power to join (see 52 ALL 134[27] and 60 CAL 87,[6]) a view to which we incline, a Court cannot join a party when the litigant in whose interest the joinder is to be made refuses to have the necessary parties joined, as here. Before us the respondents offered to join but we consider this comes too late. The point of non-joinder was properly taken in the pleadings. The danger was pointed out, and the pleader refused to join these people. If the proper parties have not been joined the plaintiffs cannot succeed to the extent of their share or at all. This being so the suit fails against the appellant for non-joinder and the further question of limitation does not arise. It follows that the appeal succeeds with costs here and below.

Saibanbi w/o Daulatkhan Musalman— Judgment-debtor — Appellant

v.

Kazi Mahamudalli Kazi Mir Basharatalli — Decree-holder — Respondent.

Misc. Appeal No. 223 of 1937, Decided on 7th August 1940, from order of Addl. Dist. Judge, Yeotmal, D/- 7th August 1937.

(a) Mahomedan Law — Dower — Right of retainer—Widow retaining husband's estate under her lien for unpaid dower—Widow's creditor in execution of his decree asking for appointment of receiver and satisfaction of his decree out of profits of property in widow's possession — Receiver held could not be appointed — Proper course to follow is to execute decree by attachment and sale of dower debt — Assignee then should institute administrative suit — Creditors of deceased should sue for administration of deceased's estate — Appointment of receiver in execution proceedings is not proper course.

A Mahomedan widow retaining possession of her husband's property under her lien for unpaid dower is not a secured creditor. She is an unsecured creditor with a special right which exists for a special purpose. That purpose is to compel the payment to her by the heirs of a debt in respect of dower. The debt arising out of unpaid dower is apart from all considerations of lien or right to retain, like any other unsecured debt and can be compulsorily transferred in execution and the assignee thereupon becomes a creditor of the deceased's estate. A dower debt is an actionable claim and not a mere right to sue. Accordingly it does not fall within the exception to assignable property created by S. 6 (e), T. P. Act. It can accordingly be taken in execution like any other debt : 26 All 28 ; 14 M I A 377 (P C); A I R 1920 Mad 666 and A I R 1932 All 345, Ref. [P 9 C 1 ; P 10 C 1, 2]

So far as the creditors of the deceased husband are concerned the proper remedy is for them to file an administration suit and not to seek the appointment of a receiver in execution proceedings. [P 9 C 1 ; P 10 C 1, 2]

(b) Succession Act (1925), S. 218 (3)—"Creditor" in S. 218 (3) includes Mahomedan widow in respect of her unpaid dower debt but does not include her creditors.

The word "creditor" in S. 218 (3) includes a Mahomedan widow in respect of her unpaid dower debt but does not include her creditors who cannot, therefore, sue for administration of the assets of the deceased. [P 9 C 2]

Judgment. — This miscellaneous appeal raises a point of interest and importance and in relation to which, we were informed, there is no authority. In point of fact the matter has been considered from a somewhat different angle in 2 LUCK 408,[1] but the actual point raised in this case seems to be one of first impression. The applicant seeks the appointment of a receiver apparently by way of equitable execution. The application is made on the execution side and its purpose is the realization of a decretal debt obtained against a Mahomedan widow out of the profits of property which the judgment-debtor claims to retain under her so-called lien for unpaid dower. A receiver of the whole of the property, which is very substantial, has been granted for the realization of the decretal debt, which is large. It is said that a receiver cannot be appointed because this right of retention cannot (at least by itself and apart from the dower debt) be assigned and a receiver cannot be appointed for property that cannot be assigned; further, it is urged that it is not just and convenient to appoint a receiver in such a case for two reasons: (1) it would leave the woman without any maintenance, and (2) it would cause her to lose possession and, as a consequence, her lien which is dependent on possession.

We are of opinion that the appeal must be allowed though for reasons other than the above. These proceedings are, in our opinion, misconceived. As the position of a Mahomedan woman claiming the right of retention in respect of dower unpaid does not seem to be properly understood and as there is available an appropriate remedy which will give the decree-holder all he wants we think it right to state broadly what our view of the law is. The matter is considered at length in Mr. Tyabji's work on Mahomedan Law (Edn. 3) p. 185 et. seq. see paras. 108, 108-A, 108-B and 109, also 572. We are of the opinion that the law is there correctly stated. The fundamental position is that the widow is not a secured creditor. She is an unsecured creditor with a special right which exists for a special purpose. That purpose is to compel the payment to her by the heirs of a debt in respect of dower. But, obviously, if she is allowed to retain possession perpetually until her dower is paid and if the payment of the dower is left to the heirs wide scope is offered to the family to shelter the property of all behind this right of retention and the widow is turned, for all practical purposes, into a preferred creditor. This may operate extremely harshly against her husband's unsecured creditors and against her creditors. The proper course, we think, is for an administrative suit to be brought which will result in the husband's estate being administered. This, however, can only be brought by persons interested in the estate as heirs, legatees and the like, and creditors. "Creditor" of course includes the widow but does not include the widow's creditors.

Suppose she is the only creditor of the husband but that she has many creditors. Can she hide indefinitely behind her right of retention neither claiming nor being paid her dower so that the dower debt is never in fact paid and her right or retention lives on? We think not. Her dower debt is like any other debt. It is assignable. It can be attached and sold, (see O. 21, R. 79.) and when sold the transferee is in the position of the widow except that possibly (we express no opinion on this matter) the right of retention (which is personal), would not pass with the debt. But what does pass is the right to have the debtor's (the husband's) estate administered on the suit of the assignee. The assignee of the dower debt accordingly next proceeds (in a case such as this where the widow is in fact in possession of practically the whole estate) to have the estate administered by the Court which will act as an executor would act. That is to say, the creditors of the deceased will first be paid off and then the rest of the estate, if any, will be distributed amongst those entitled to a share in it. This way of going to work seems largely to have been overlooked in these Mahomedan cases probably because the nature of the right and of the interest which passes when a Mahomedan dies has been, by many lawyers, frequently Hindus, misunderstood. This is not a case of survivorship. The estate is burdened with the debts. Those debts ought to be paid and if not paid a creditor can obtain administration by the Court. As to creditors of those entitled to a share they cannot be kept at bay for ever by the estate remaining unadministered. The right of the heir, the legatee, or the creditor, (e. g. widow having a right of retention) to administer can be obtained by the heir's creditor getting, by execution, into the shoes of the heir, the legatee or the widow creditor. Alternatively such creditor can realize money by way of execution by the sale to another of such person's rights so that such other stands in such person's shoes.

By proceeding in this way the widow's creditor gets at what really belongs to the widow: her share and her dower debt. By proceeding as the applicant here has proceeded the widow's creditor gets at a very different thing: the income of all the husband's estate that the widow, for a particular purpose, happens to have got possession of in a way that gives her a right to retain. But that right to retain is for a special purpose—a compulsion to obtain speedy payment of an unsecured debt. The substantive right is the debt and the share; the adjective right is retention. The creditor's right is to payment out of the widow's estate; his right is to sell her claim or share or both. There may well be many interests besides the widow and her creditors. There may be other creditors (a) of the husband (b) of the widow. There may be other heirs of the husband and they may be minors. To allow the widow to go on retaining indefinitely is to allow her to abuse her right. To allow a particular creditor of hers to take all the income until he is paid is to damage third persons, creditors of the husband or heirs of the husband or other creditors of the widow. To administer the husband's estate is to clear everything up. That results in the widow getting paid what is due to her both as shareholder and as creditor.

This solution, however, is dependent on the assignability of the dower debt. Whether the right of retention is or is not assignable is a matter of dispute but this question need not be considered in this connexion. The widow's creditor, like the creditor of any heir, is, of course postponed, as such, and in so far as he seeks to obtain payment out of the husband's estate, to the deceased's creditors: 26 ALL 28[2] at p. 35. But the widow's creditor has available to him (regardless of the existence of creditors of the deceased) the widow's assets and these include the widow's debts against the deceased's estate. The debt arising out of unpaid dower is, for the present purpose and apart from all considerations of lien or right to retain, like any other unsecured debt: 14 M I A 377.[3] Being in the category of debts due to the widow it can be compulsorily transferred in execution and the assignee thereupon becomes a creditor of the deceased's estate. (See 43 MAD 214[4] at p. 237 where the opinion is also expressed that as a widow can assign her dower debt she can also assign the right of retention). A dower debt is an actionable claim: (54 ALL 499[5]) and not a mere right to sue. Accordingly it does not fall within the exception to assignable property created by S. 6(e), T. P. Act. It can accordingly be taken in execution like any other debt. Once this position is reached the rest follows. The appeal accordingly succeeds but on grounds other than those taken before us. We accordingly leave the parties to bear costs as incurred here and below. As this is a matter in execution it is not necessary to state, as was done in 14 M I A 377,[3] that the dismissal is without prejudice to the bringing of a general administration suit.

Criminal Revision No. 143 of 1940, Decided on 8th June 1940, for revision of order of Magistrate with appellate powers, Yeotmal, D/- 21st February 1940.

Penal Code (1860), Ss. 147 and 323 — Seven people charged under S. 147 — Only three found guilty and convicted under S. 323 — Conviction under S. 323 held justified inasmuch as offence under S. 323 was mentioned in charge framed under S. 147 and no prejudice had been caused to accused.

Charges under S. 147 were framed against seven people and the Magistrate found that only three did commit an assault with sticks, while the rest were innocent and as he could not convict three people under S. 147, he convicted them under S. 323. The accused contended that they could not be convicted under S. 323 since they were charged under S. 147. The charge framed under S. 147 ran as follows: "That you on or about the 8th day of April 1939 at Umerkhed were a member of an unlawful assembly, and, in prosecution of the common object of such assembly, in beating the complainant committed the offence of rioting":

Held that in the particular circumstances, there was nothing illegal in the conviction under S. 323 since the offence in respect of which the accused were convicted was mentioned in the charge and no prejudice had been caused to the accused: AIR 1922 All 114, Rel. on; 19 Nag L J 18; A I R 1918 Mad 496 and 30 Cal 288, Disting. [P 12 C 1]

Order. — A challan under S. 147, Penal Code, against seven people was presented in the Court of the Naib Tahsildar and Magistrate, third class, Yeotmal. Charges under that section were framed against all of them and the Magistrate on a close survey of the evidence considered that three of the accused who had pleaded alibi were absent and that a fourth did not participate in the assault on Dinanath and his son Tukaram. He found that the other three did commit an assault with sticks, and as he could not convict three people under S. 147, he convicted them under S. 323, Penal Code, and sentenced them to a fine of Rs. 20 each. The appellate Magistrate was asked to set aside the conviction and acquit the accused on the ground that they could not be convicted under S. 323 since they were charged under S. 147. The Appellate Court declined to accept this contention and dismissed the appeal. The three accused have accordingly preferred a revision application in this Court on this point of law.

It is contended on the authority of several rulings which have been cited before me that the offence of rioting does not of itself connote the causing of hurt and that consequently when the charge is for rioting, there cannot be a conviction for causing hurt since the latter is not necessarily an ingredient of the former offence. As a proposition of law, this is undoubtedly correct. But it appears to me that what really matters is the manner in which the charge is framed and whether the accused were aware of the accusation which they had to meet. Some of the cases which have been cited before me relate to charges under S. 325 read with S. 149, Penal Code, and convictions for causing hurt or grievous hurt after an acquittal of the charge of rioting. It is hardly necessary to say that no such conviction could be sustained on a charge relating only to the constructive liability for the assault of the person charged, and where the charge of rioting sets forth a common object of the unlawful assembly, even if the object set forth is one of causing hurt, I agree that there can be no conviction for causing hurt if it is not indicated in the charge that the person convicted did cause hurt. Ordinarily, in cases of this nature, two charges are framed, one of rioting and one of causing hurt, and the charge is framed under Ss. 147 and 323. In the case before me only S. 147 is mentioned, but the charge is framed in a somewhat unusual manner, and in my opinion clearly indicates to the accused that they are charged not merely with rioting in pursuance of the common object of the unlawful assembly but are actually charged with causing hurt. In each case the charge runs as follows:

> That you on or about the 8th day of April 1939 at Umerkhed were a member of an unlawful assembly, and, in prosecution of the common object of such assembly, in beating the complainant and his son, P. W. 1 Tukaram, committed the offence of rioting.

Here it is not merely stated that the common object of the assembly was to beat the complainant and his son, but it is stated that these persons committed the offence of rioting in actually beating the complainant and his son. That they did do so is certainly established by the evidence, and I do not think there is any doubt that the accused were aware that they had to meet a charge actually of beating, and that they have been in any way prejudiced in their defence by the omission of the figure "323" in the charge-sheet. In 30 CAL 288,[1] the leading case cited before me, the petitioners in revision were charged with rioting and were convicted of house-trespass and causing hurt. The learned Judges say in that case:

> The charge does not set out anything amounting to house-trespass; and although hurt is generally committed in the course of rioting, it does not necessarily follow that hurt is so caused, and indeed from the facts set out in the judgment it does not appear that hurt was caused.

As there was no mention of house-trespass in the charge there could of course be no conviction in respect of house-trespass. The circumstances in the case before me are very much akin to those in the case on which the learned appellate Magistrate relied, although in his judgment he has carelessly mutilated the reference by omitting the name of the Court which gave the decision, thus rendering it difficult to trace. The case is A I R 1922 ALL 114.[2] There the learned Judge declined to follow the view of the Calcutta High Court and held that whereas fourteen persons were charged with rioting and a joint assault on the victim, and it was found that only four actually participated, there was no objection to conviction under S. 323, despite the charge under S. 147, and that the applicability of S. 147 depended on the number of persons concerned. With all respect I would not state the case as simply as that and to my mind the crucial point is whether the applicants did have notice by the frame of the charge that they were on trial for an assault. In AIR 1922 ALL 114[2] it is quite clear that they were, and the charge which is quoted in the judgment, ran as follows:

> That you on 15th August 1921, at 4 p. m. all committed a riot upon Daoo at . . . . the common intention of your unlawful assembly being to assault Daoo and it was in pursuance of this common object that you all moved in a body and did cause bodily injury to Daoo and thereby committed an offence punishable under S. 147, I. P. C.

1. ('03) 30 Cal 288, Yakub Ali v. Lethu Thakur.
2. ('22) 9 AIR 1922 All 114, Hanuman v. Emperor.

In view of the manner in which the charge was framed I concur respectfully in the finding that the number of persons less than the number necessary to constitute an unlawful assembly for causing hurt was permissible and proper. A recent case of this High Court 19 N L J 18,[3] is cited on the applicants' behalf. In that case the actual wording of the charge is not reproduced, and I would respectfully distinguish it on the ground that it must be presumed that the charge stated the common object but did not state that the persons charged had themselves actually and individually committed an assault which caused hurt. An example of a case in which convictions under Ss. 448 and 323 after the charge under S. 147 was set aside—and I am in respectful agreement with the view of the learned Judges who did set it aside—occurs in 41 I C 828.[4] There the charge under S. 147 ran for being members of an unlawful assembly and having in prosecution of the common object of such assembly, viz., to enforce a right or supposed right to the barber's land in Sorobogodo Pubodo in Pattupur committed the offence of rioting at Pattupur.

Here the charge indicated nothing but rioting and there is no mention of trespass or of causing hurt. In the particular circumstances, then, I consider that there was nothing illegal in the conviction since the offence in respect of which the applicants were convicted was mentioned in the charge and no prejudice has been caused. A further point has been raised that the judgment of the appellate Magistrate is no judgment since it is not in conformity with the requirements of the Criminal Procedure Code. The judgment is certainly one which cannot be commended for its form, and it is urged that it is nothing but a philosophical discussion without any reference to the evidence. The alleged philosophical discussion runs as follows :

In a case like this it is perhaps impossible to expect that the version of each prosecution witness would fit into that of the other in every minute detail. To accept the entire evidence at its face value treating suspicious features lightly was besides the risk of doing injustice to put a premium on fabrication of evidence. To reject the evidence wholesale was equally unwarranted. The safest course was not to believe or disbelieve all that a particular witness said but to accept such of his evidence as had received corroboration all through, and fitted in with the probabilities of the case and to reject the rest.

Here the learned Magistrate is merely enunciating what the lower Court had done which was, on an analysis of the evidence, to accept only such facts as proved which formed the least common denominator of what was said by all the witnesses. The Magistrate then proceeds :

The prosecution story is consistent all through so far as the attack with sticks by the three appellants was concerned. Ample corroboration was furnished to this version by the medical evidence which had traced the injuries on the body of Tukaram as described by the eye-witnesses.

This is all entirely correct. The appellate Magistrate has approved of the method of the trial Court and on perusing the evidence found that the conclusion reached according to this method is correct. A detailed discussion of the evidence would possibly have been a repetition of the judgment in the trial Court, and I do not consider that it can be said that the evidence has not been considered or examined. I have perused the evidence myself in view of the objection that has been raised, and I have no doubt that the decision reached is correct. The judgment in appeal is not artistic, but it does satisfy the requirements of the law. The result is that the application in revision fails and is dismissed.

Some fields were attached in execution and the decree was transferred to the Collector for execution. While the proceedings before the Collector were pending the judgment-debtor sold the fields to his judgment-creditor in full satisfaction of the judgment-debt. Judgment. — This is an appeal from the concurring judgment of the First Additional District Judge, Akola, in civil appeal No. 57-A of 1935, decided on 7th November 1936. The question involved in this appeal is whether a sale deed executed by a judgment-debtor while the property was under the management of Collector was invalid under Para. 11, Sch. 3, Civil P. C. The question arises in the following circumstances. The appellant obtained a decree against one Ganpat Mahadeo. Ganpat Mahadeo's adoption having been held invalid in a subsequent suit and his adoptive mother Mt. Dwarki having re-married the appellant took out execution of his decree against Ajanbai the mother-in-law of Dwarki. Some fields besides a house were attached in execution and the decree was transferred to the Collector for execution. While the proceedings before the Collector were pending the judgment-debtor Ajanbai sold the fields to her judgment-creditor, namely, the appellant, on 25th March 1933 in full satisfaction of his judgment-debt. Subsequently on 21st April 1933 the parties applied the Collector for the recording of the adjustment of the decree and the Collector passed an order in these terms : "Accepted. The case will be shown as disposed of now."

The respondent Sheikh Mannu who had also a decree against Mt. Dwarki attached the fields purchased by the appellant during the pendency of the Collector's proceedings. The latter objected to the attachment but his objection was dismissed by the executing Court. The appellant therefore filed the suit for a declaration that the respondent had no right to attach the property. The appellant's contention is that the decree had been, in point of law, satisfied before the sale made in his favour came into operation with the consequence that the Collector's powers terminated and the judgment-debtor Mt. Dwarki recovered her competency to transfer. On these premises, it is argued that it was unnecessary to obtain the Collector's permission. Alternatively it is urged that the subsequent action of the Collector in accepting the adjustment of the decree and striking off the execution proceedings amounted to granting permission so as to validate the sale.

At the earlier hearing of this appeal I felt that it was not clear whether the Collector, when he accepted the adjustment of the decree and struck off the execution proceedings, was aware of the fact that the adjustment had been affected by a sale. I framed an issue "whether the applicant produced the sale deed before the Collector and obtained his permission to the sale by the judgment-debtor," and sent it to the Court of first instance for enquiry and report. That Court examined Mr. Seth, E. A. C., who was in charge of the execution proceedings. Mr. Seth explained the word "accepted," used by him in his order as meaning the lands which were attached in the decree were allowed to be sold in accordance with the compromise and further that such compromise was approved or sanctioned by the Court.

The trial Court has found that the sale deed was actually produced before Mr. Seth and that he passed the order with full knowledge of the sale deed executed by the judgment-debtor in favour of the decree-holder. The crucial point is "when did the Collector's power cease?" In view of the Bench ruling in 13 N L R 130[1] and the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 14 N L R 181[2] it must be recognized that an alienation by a judgment-debtor whose property is under the management of the Collector under Sch. 3, Civil P. C., is void ab initio and not merely voidable at the instance of the decree-holder or the Collector. On the other hand, it has been established by a course of decisions that the Collector's powers cease as soon as the decree is satisfied and become incapable of execution so as to release the judgment-debtor from the disability imposed on him by para. 11 of Sch. 3. In cases of this type it is not always easy to determine the precise point of time when the adjustment operates to extinguish the decree and the Collector's powers terminate in relation to the point of time when the transfer becomes effective. If the adjustment and the cessation of the Collector's powers are found to have occurred before the transfer by the judgment-debtor such a transfer has been held to be perfectly valid.

The learned counsel for the appellant relies on the decisions which fall in this category. As the question is virtually one of fact pure and simple, the case law is not calculated to assist in the decision of this case, but an examination of these cases may serve to show how the principle indicated above was applied in the particular facts of the respective cases. 35 BOM 516[3] is the leading case which has guided the decisions of the Judicial Commissioner's Court, Nagpur. In that case the decree-holder intimated to the Collector on 21st May 1904 that the judgment-debtor had satisfied his decree and that the necessity for sale of the judgment-debtor's property in execution had disappeared. The execution case was finally disposed of on 8th June on which day the Collector returned the C Form to the Civil Court with the connected proceedings. On 31st May 1904 the judgment-debtor had sold his property and the question was whether the judgment-debtor was, on that day competent to alienate his property. It was held that when the decree-holder intimated to the Collector that his decree had been satisfied and that the necessity for its execution by the Collector had ceased to exist the Collector's powers of execution of the decree came to an end. Here it is clear that the sale which had been held on 21st May 1904 was effected ten days after the Collector's power had ceased. In A I R 1930 NAG 220[4] the judgment-debtor executed a mortgage on 11th July 1912 for Rs. 15,000 out of which Rs. 12,610-15-0 were paid into the treasury in satisfaction of the decree which was being executed by the Collector. The deposit of the decretal amount and the execution of the mortgage deed and its registration occurred on one and the same day.

In the course of the argument it was argued that where two transactions take place on the same day it must be presumed that they took place in such order as was necessary to make one of them valid. The learned Judges who heard the appeal, Jackson and Mohiuddin, A. J. Cs., declined to draw this presumption and remanded the case to the lower Court for enquiry and report as to whether the deposit into the treasury was made before or after the execution of the mortgage deed. It is clear from the action taken by the learned Judges that if the deposit was proved to have been made after the execution of the mortgage deed they would have held that the mortgage deed was void. As to what was the ultimate result in the case is not known as the matter, it appears, did not come up again in the Judicial Commissioner's Court. The case reported in A I R 1930 NAG 237[5] is not pertinent as the point decided there was that the incompetency of the judgment-debtor did not extend to property in respect of which the Collector did not choose deliberately to exercise his powers under Sch. 3. In A I R 1933 NAG 238[6] the Collector ordered the property under attachment to be sold on 12th December 1914. The judgment-debtor executed a mortgage on that very day and received out of the consideration of the mortgage Rs. 1050 before the Sub-Registrar for payment to the decree-holder. It appears that the payment was actually made to the decree-holder on that very day. He appeared before the Collector on 14th December 1915 and filed a receipt in satisfaction of his full claim. The proceedings in the Collector's Court had been destroyed and there was no evidence to show that the Collector had given his permission to the judgment-debtor to mortgage.

The learned Judge however assumed that the permission must have been granted. He further was of opinion that the payment made to the decree-holder on 12th December brought the Collector's power to an end. The learned Judge did not go into the question whether the payment had been made to the decree-holder before or after the execution of the mortgage deed, but it is clear from the facts recited in the judgment that the money had been received by the judgment-debtor, that is the mortgagor, before the Sub-Registrar for payment to his decree-holder. That event occurred obviously after the execution of the mortgage. There is nothing to show that the learned Judge's attention was specially drawn to this circumstance but it appears to have been assumed that the payment to the decree-holder preceded the execution of the mortgage. In A I R 1934 NAG 33[7] the judgment-debtor sold his crops and satisfied the decree by payment out of the sale-proceeds and on the date on which the decree was so satisfied the judgment-debtor executed a mortgage of the property under the management of the Collector. The payment to the decree-holder was made in the presence of the Collector and it was held that the Collector's power had terminated before the mortgage came to be executed. It must be noticed that the decree was satisfied by the sale of crops and not with the aid of the mortgage though it was executed on the same day. It was therefore naturally held that the decree having ceased to exist after its satisfaction and the Collector's power having come to an end the judgment-debtor was fully competent to dispose of his property by mortgage. In 18 N L J 134[8] the mortgage was executed on 21st June 1912 and on the next day, that is 22nd June the decree-holder appeared before the Collector and produced a receipt of full satisfaction and the case was, therefore, struck off as fully satisfied; but the mortgage deed was registered in October 1912. That mortgage was held to be valid as it became effective by registration long after the decree had been satisfied and the Collector's power had ceased. The learned Judge who decided the case declined to apply the law that the registration dates back to the time of execution of the instrument to a case of a judgment-debtor's transfer of his property under the Collector's management. When the decree was satisfied and the property was released by the Collector the mortgage was not complete. There was, therefore, no transfer by the judgment-debtor. The mortgage became operative as a transfer only after registration. The learned Judge was of opinion that the transfer was subsequent to the termination of the Collector's powers.

In the present case, the facts are these. The fields had been ordered to be sold on 5th April 1933. On 25th March 1933 the judgment-debtor executed a sale deed in favour of the decree-holder in full satisfaction of the decree. It cannot be gainsaid that on that day the Collector could exercise his powers under Sch. 3, Civil P. C. At what point of time his power should be deemed to have come to an end? The cessation of his power, as held in the cases reviewed above, comes about when the adjustment comes into operation and extinguishes the decree. The question, therefore, is: At what moment was the decree under consideration extinguished? The obvious answer is "when the adjustment became effective." When did it become effective? It became effective when, by the sale, the interest of the judgment-debtor passed to the decree-holder. That event was brought about by the registration. Consequently it must be held that, until the registration, the decree was enforceable and the Collector's power remained unimpaired. The execution of the sale deed and the registration of it indisputably preceded in point of time the extinction of the decree. The former was the cause and the latter was the consequence. But for the one, the other event could not happen. The very purpose of the sale was to satisfy the decree. It must, therefore, follow that the sale having been made before the extinction of the decree, and termination of the Collector's power, the judgment-debtor was incompetent to transfer. The two Courts below were, therefore, right in pronouncing the sale to be void.

The next argument is devoid of force. It is based on the assumption that the Collector can ratify the transaction and validate the transfer. If the transfer was void in its inception, it could not be validated by any subsequent ratification. Implicit in this assumption is the admission that the Collector's power to deal with the attached property affected by the transfer remained intact in spite of the transfer. If so, the transfer took place while the Collector could exercise his power and the judgment-debtor was incompetent to transfer. The fact is that the sale being void, the decree remained executable and the Collector could proceed to hold the sale on the specified day. Since the sale was to be held only to pay off the decree-holder, who was the only decree-holder and the decree-holder declared that his decree had been satisfied the Collector had no alternative but to accept his word and terminate the proceedings. His acceptance, in the circumstances, cannot be interpreted as a permission. He has no power to grant permission after the sale. Nor could he validate the void sale by his subsequent permission. The provision of law is no doubt stringent and occasionally results in apparent injustice. But it must be borne in mind that in cases where there are more than one decree-holder, any laxity in the enforcement of the provision is calculated to open the door for fraudulent preference of one decree-holder over another and nullify the law regarding rateable distribution. The result is that the appeal stands dismissed with costs.

Govind Prasad and others — Accused

Non-applicants.

Criminal Revn. Nos. 413 and 414 of 1939, Decided on 5th February 1940; reference by Sessions Judge, Nagpur.

(a) C. P. Gambling Act (3 of 1867), Ss. 1 and 4 — Place in front of small pan-stall in which customers usually stand is common gaming house if so used.

Where a pan-stall is small, the area in front of it in which customers usually stand should be included in the definition of "common gaming house" when the place is so used. [P 16 C 2]

(b) C. P. Gambling Act (3 of 1867), S. 5 — Description in warrant adequate to identify place —Non-mentioning of boundaries is immaterial.

If the description in the warrant is otherwise adequate to identify the place without ambiguity it is immaterial that the boundaries are not given: Criminal Revn. No. 455 of 1939, Rel. on ; 1939 N L J 357, Disting. [P 16 C 2]

Order. — This order will dispose also of Criminal Revision No. 414 of 1939. The Sessions Judge, Nagpur, refers these cases under the C. P. Gambling Act recommending that the conviction of one of the six non-applicants, Govind Prasad, under Ss. 3 and 4, Gambling Act, be set aside, that the conviction of David under each of these two sections be maintained as also the convictions of and the fines imposed on the other non-applicants. It was pointed out that the money found on the persons of the non-applicants should not have been forfeited. I accept the reference about Govind Prasad. As pointed out by the learned Sessions Judge although it is quite possible that he knew all about the betting which was being conducted by David while managing his (Govind Prasad's) pan-stall, still the other possibility is there that David was doing so without his master's knowledge, and the prosecution has not rebutted that possibility. Govind Prasad at the time of the betting was in the house next door and so beyond the range of the pan-stall and its immediate surroundings which could be designated a common gaming house. There is also nothing definite to prove his knowledge which is an essential element of S. 3. He must therefore be given the benefit of the doubt and acquitted. The written argument submitted by the other non-applicants who appear in person tries to make out that none of them was found in the pan-stall at the time when betting was going on and so they were not found present in the common gaming house. As the learned Sessions Judge points out, the pan-stall is a structure only 8 feet long by 4 or 5 feet broad, and customers never actually enter it as there is no room for them, but they stand in front of it: therefore the area in which customers usually stand should be included in the definition of 'common gaming house' when the place is so used. I do not agree that 37 BOM 651[1] is not applicable to the present case. The principle in Emperor v. Ismail Hirji[2] as stated by the Sessions Judge in para. 7 of his order of reference is also applicable to the present case.

The other point now raised is that the search warrant does not contain a description of the boundaries of the shop to be searched and is therefore ineffective: 1939 N L J 357.[3] This is not one of the reasons given in ground 9 of the revision application why the search was illegal. I have distinguished 1939 N L J 357[3] in a recent case, Criminal Revision No. 455 of 1939 and held that if the description in the warrant is otherwise adequate to identify the place without ambiguity it is immaterial that the boundaries are not given. I see no other reason for setting aside the convictions of the other non-applicants. On the strength of the authorities quoted by the Sessions Judge in para. 3 of his order of reference the monies found on the persons of David (Re. 0-3-0), Laxman Swami (Re. 0-1-0) and Sk. Hussain (Rs. 2-1-9) will be returned. The Sessions Judge has made a mistake in saying that Rs. 4-1-3 were recovered from Narayan Swami. That amount in the seizure memo (Ex. P-6) does not refer to him but is the total of the other amounts. It has already been stated that the convictions of Govind Prasad should be set aside. His fines if paid should be refunded. The convictions and sentences of the others are confirmed.

Shamla Hardeo Teli — Appellant*

v.

Emperor.

Criminal Appeal No. 132 of 1940, Decided on 17th June 1940, from the order of Addl. Sessions Judge, Bilaspur, D/- 29th April 1940.

Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 164 and 533 — Mere inadvertent omission to obtain signature of accused to statement made under S. 164 would not vitiate confession.

Where not only has the Magistrate given evidence to show that the statement was made as recorded by him, but the accused himself has admitted that he made that particular statement, an inadvertent omission to obtain the signature of the accused to a statement made under Sec. 164 would not vitiate the confession. It is exactly for a case of this nature that the provisions of S. 533, Criminal P. C., are enacted. [P 18 C 2; P 19 C 1]

M. Adhikari—for Appellant.

W. Dutt—for the Crown.

Judgment. — The appellant Shamla, a resident of Mungeli, Bilaspur district, has been convicted of the murder of a small crippled boy of 5 years of age and has been sentenced to death. The child was murdered on 24th November 1939, the accused disappeared from Mungeli the same day and was found working in a rice mill in Raigarh State under the assumed name of Itwari and was arrested on 19th December. The child was a cripple, having deformed feet, and the child's mother Mt. Bija deposes that when she went every day to work in the fields she sometimes took the child with her and sometimes left him at home. On the morning in question she had considered taking the child to the fields, but Shamla, who lives close by and who was fond of the child, picked it up and petted it, and so she left the child with him. On her return at midday the child was not to be found, and Shamla on being questioned said that he had left it playing in the lane. Mt. Dasmat, a vegetable seller, deposes that about 9-30 that morning on her way to the market she saw the accused and the child together and that her attention was attracted by the fact that the accused had picked up the child which was crying and she told him to put the child down. As the child was not found by evening, a report was made to the police, and as this happened in Mungeli itself, the Sub-Inspector arrived very soon. As Shamla was the last person to be seen with the child, it was suggested that he should accompany the police to the police station, which he did, but when the party returned, there is evidence that Shamla ran away and disappeared from the village. Meanwhile enquiries has elicited the fact that Shamla had pawned a bracelet with one Sukaluram (P. W. 8) at 10 or 11 o'clock in the morning. The bracelet was seized that day and also Sukaluram's books (vide Ex. P-4 and P-6) which recorded the entry that he had bought the bracelet that day from Shamla. This bracelet has been identified as belonging to the child by its parents and also by Jugul Sonar (P. W. 15) who made it.

The accused admits that the bracelet produced in Court is one which belonged to the deceased and he admits pawning a bracelet with Sukaluram, but he denied that the bracelet in Court is the one which he pawned. Beyond this no explanation is afforded. As it was night time, a watch was kept round the house of Shamla in which his old mother alone lived. The following morning another son of hers who lived in another house was told to question her as to what she knew (she had been away all the previous day), and she admitted that the dead body was in the house. The police then entered and found the body of the child crammed between the grain bin and the wall with minor injuries to the face and head. Death has been established by the medical evidence as being due to asphyxia, and this is not disputed. According to the police the accused when he ran away first went to mauza Baijana, and on being questioned what he was doing there by Hatteram (P. W. 6) and Mahengu (P. W. 7) the latter of whom is a distant relative of his, stated that he had committed a murder and run away and had removed a kara from the deceased child. The learned Additional Sessions Judge has preferred not to accept their evidence as he considered it unlikely that the man would first make his confession to Hatteram who was a stranger and only afterwards to his relation Mahengu, although he does consider it probable that these two persons harboured him for a day and a night and had made no attempt to inform the police when the police came to enquire about him. One would have thought that if the harbouring and the denial to the police is accepted, it would follow that the witnesses did have knowledge that he was a murderer.

The learned counsel for the appellant is unable to offer any explanation as to Shamla's sudden disappearance from the village and his working in a rice mill at Raigarh under an assumed name, and he selects two points in the prosecution story as accepted in the Sessions Court for attack in order to show that the evidence against him is not convincing. The first point is that the child's mother admitted that she returned home once from the field in the course of the morning and found the child playing in the lane, and we are asked to deduce from this, coupled with the fact of Mt. Dasmat's seeing of the child with the accused which must have been earlier than 9.30 as she was a vegetable seller and the market opened at 7 or 8 and it must be presumed that she would be there at opening time, that when the mother saw the child, the child must already have been abandoned by the accused. We are unable to accept the argument, which is in the nature of a forlorn hope. There is nothing in the mother's evidence to show that her statement in examination-in-chief, that she hesitated whether to take the child to the field or not, refers to her first visit to the field or to the second after she returned. The probability is that it refers to the second visit as the desire to take the child to the field would be prompted by the fact that she had found it playing in the lane and this would not be so likely to happen early in the morning, neither would an accosting by her neighbour be so likely to happen then. Even if this is not so and it were to be held that she saw the child playing in the lane after the time when Mt. Dasmat had seen the child with the accused, there is nothing whatever to show that the parting of company between the two was anything more than temporary, and in face of the overwhelming evidence against the accused, the argument has no force whatever.

The other contention raised on behalf of the accused relates to the kada. He relies on a statement by the purchasing goldsmith Sukluram who says, " When the kada was purchased a plus mark was made on it for its identification later on". This, it is claimed, is inconsistent with the statement of Rahiman (P. W. 10) who was a witness to the seizure and who says that when it was seized, the plus mark was put on it by him. The seizure memorandum (EX. P-4) relates that the witnesses have made a plus sign on the kada with a big borer needle as their identification mark. The contention is that if this is the kada which was pawned by the accused, there should be two plus marks on it, and if the goldsmith had put one on it at the time of the purchase, this would have been noted in the seizure memorandum. The kada is not before us and we cannot say whether it bears one plus mark or two. We do not consider it necessary to send for the kada. There is no doubt that a kada was pawned that morning by the accused, and it would indeed be an extraordinary coincidence if the police when seizing this kada should have taken from the goldsmith a kada which was not pawned by the accused and yet which happened to belong to the child as is admitted. No explanation has been given as to what kind of kada the accused pawned or how he obtained it. Also we would observe that it is most unusual for a goldsmith to mark property which is pawned with him for identification in this manner. This is generally done by tying on a piece of cloth or a piece of paper. We also note that the goldsmith refers to the same type of mark being put on at the time of purchase as was put on by the witnesses at the time of seizure, and in our opinion what has happened is that there has been a mistake either by the goldsmith in making his deposition or by the Judge in recording the evidence and that instead of " when the kada was purchased " what was said by the goldsmith or intended to be said by him was " when the kada was seized ". It is to be noted that the goldsmith does not say that he put on the mark himself which he presumably would have done if the mark had been made at the time of purchase.

The learned Additional Sessions Judge has based his conviction on the fact that the accused was last seen with the child, that he pawned on the morning on which the child disappeared a kada with a goldsmith and that kada has been identified as the child's and admitted to be his, that the accused absconded that night when the police were about to begin investigation and that he was found working in Raigarh State under an assumed name. These facts are, in our opinion, quite sufficient to sustain the conviction. There is also, however, an additional piece of evidence which the learned Judge has discarded and, in our opinion, wrongly discarded. We refer to the confession taken by a first class Magistrate at Raigarh in which there is a full confession of the crime. The learned Judge has stated that the confession was recorded with due regard to the provisions of S. 164 and S. 364, Criminal P. C., except in one detail which the learned Judge describes as "one little slip which had inadvertently crept in", namely, that the statement was not signed by the accused himself. This, on the authority of the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 17 Lah 629,[1] the learned Judge considers of necessity vitiates the proceedings and renders the confession inadmissible.

The authority of 17 Lah 629[1] does not extend nearly as far as that. In that case the disregard of the provisions of Ss. 164 and 364, Criminal P. C., was so flagrant that their Lordships held that no question of the consideration of the curability of the admission under S. 533, Criminal P. C., arose at all. If an inadvertent omission to obtain the signature of the accused to a statement made under S. 164 were to vitiate the confession, S. 533 of the Code would be rendered entirely otiose. It is exactly for a case of the nature before us that the provisions S. 533, Criminal P. C., are enacted. The signature is not taken as a proof of the accuracy of the statement to which it is appended but in proof of the fact that the statement was actually made. In this particular case not only has the Magistrate given evidence to show that the statement was made as recorded by him, but the accused himself has admitted that he made this particular statement. That being so, there can be no possible prejudice to the accused in giving proof that the statement actually was made. In holding that the confessional statement should have been admitted, we do not wish to derogate from the structures passed in this Court in I L R (1937) Nag 268[2] and on subsequent occasions. We affirm the principle that no other procedure than that which has been detailed in the Code of Criminal Procedure can be followed, but we also desire to emphasize that the omission to take the accused's signature to a statement is not necessarily fatal to the admissibility of the statement in every case as the learned Judge appears to think. The judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 17 Lah 629[1] does not abrogate S. 533, Criminal P. C., and indeed could not do so. The case throughout has disclosed evidence of such an overwhelming nature that the excessive caution of the learned Judge, possibly in respect of the extra-judicial confession and certainly in the case of the admissibility of the confession recorded under S. 164, Criminal P. C., has not affected the result.

On the question of sentence there can, in our judgment, be no doubt whatever. A crippled child was here murdered for the sake of the value of a silver bracelet. There are no extenuating circumstances whatsoever and we dismiss the appeal and confirm the sentence of death.

Judgment.—This is a judgment-debtor's appeal from an order passed by the Additional District Judge, Chanda, in Civil Appeal No. 30-B/38, on 16th December 1938. The appeal arises out of the execution proceedings in Civil Suit No. 135/31 which was instituted by the respondent against the appellant Pandurang and one Md. Hanif for rendition of the accounts of the village profits for the years 1928-29 and 1929-30. In different parts of the year 1928-29 Pandurang and Md. Hanif acted as lambardars. The respondent's claim for the year 1928-29 was thus against both Pandurang and Md. Hanif. The suit resulted in a decree against the appellant Pandurang for Rs. 77-8-10 and against Md. Hanif for Rs. 259-4-0. That decree was passed on 31st March 1932. Md. Hanif alone preferred an appeal from that decree without impleading Pandurang. The appellate decree was passed on 19th December 1932 and his appeal was partly allowed. The decree-holder (respondent) applied for execution of his decree on 17th December 1935 which was dismissed on 14th March 1936. He filed a second application for execution on 7th January 1938 and attached the immovable property of both Pandurang and Md. Hanif. The appellant Pandurang contested the application on the ground that his (respondent's) first application made on 17th December 1935 had not been presented within three years from 31st March 1932, the date of the original Court's decree. On the other hand, the contention was that the application having been made within three years from the date of the Appellate Court's decree, namely 19th December 1932 was not barred by time. There is no dispute as regards the second application dated 7th January 1938 being within three years from the date of the disposal of the first execution application.

On the contentions of the parties the only question that arises for determination is whether in the circumstances of the present case three years period of limitation as prescribed in Art. 182, Sch. I to the Limitation Act should be computed from the date of the first Court's decree or that of the Appellate Court's decree. Art. 182 runs as follows :

Description of application.	Period of limitation.	Time from which period begins to run.
For the execution of a decree or order of any Civil Court not provided for by article 183 or by section 48 of the Civil Procedure Code.	Three years, etc.	1. The date of the decree or order ; 2. (where there has been an appeal) the date of the final decree or order of the appellate Court, or the withdrawal of the appeal . . . .

The main argument submitted on behalf of the appellant is that the decree under consideration passed in Civil Suit No. 135/31 consisted of two decrees though in form it was only one decree and that Md. Hanif's appeal was not directed against that part of the decree which had been passed against Pandurang and that consequently the period of limitation for execution of the decree as against Pandurang could not be computed from the date of the Appellate Court's decree but from the date of the first Court's decree. Reliance is placed on 13 ALL 1[1] and 19 C W N 287[2] at p. 289 in support of the argument. In the first mentioned case the majority opinion was certainly in favour of the contention that is put forward here but the minority dissented from it. In 19 C W N 287[2] a Bench of the Calcutta High Court followed the majority view in the Allahabad Full Bench case and enunciated the principle that in dealing with the question of limitation in such cases it should be seen whether the original decree was really one decree or an incorporation of several decrees and whether the appeal against it imperilled the whole decree or not. But the majority view in 13 ALL 1[1] did not commend itself to the Judges of the Calcutta High Court in a Full Bench case reported in 25 Cal 594.[3] In 53 Cal 901,[4] 13 ALL 1[1] was again dissented from and 25 Cal 594[3] was approved. In the High Courts of Madras, Bombay and Patna also the majority opinion in 13 ALL 1[1] was not approved. The authority of the Allahabad Full Bench case which was already weakened by the repeated dissents expressed by the other High Courts in India has now been altogether extinguished by the view taken by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 60 Cal 1.[5] In that case it was specifically argued that an appeal, in order to save limitation under cl. (2) of Art. 182, must be one to which the persons affected were parties and that it must also be one in which the whole decree was imperilled. Their Lordships after observing that these contentions were the subject of much difference of opinion in India propounded their view as follows :

> Their Lordships think that nothing would be gained by discussing these varying authorities in detail. They think that the question must be decided upon the plain words of the Article : "where there has been an appeal" time is to run from the date of the decree of the Appellate Court. There is, in their Lordships' opinion, no warrant for reading into the words quoted any qualification either as to the character of the appeal or as to the parties to it; the words mean just what they say. The fixation of periods of limitation must always be to some extent arbitrary, and may frequently result in hardship. But in construing such provisions, equitable considerations are out of place, and the strict grammatical meaning of the words is, their Lordships think, the only safe guide. It is at least an intelligible rule that so long as there is any question sub judice between any of the parties, those affected shall not be compelled to pursue the so often thorny path of execution, which, if the final result is against them, may lead to no advantage. Nor, in such a case as this, is the judgment-debtor prejudiced.

It is clear from the passage quoted above that their Lordships of the Privy Council have expressly disapproved of the majority opinion in 13 ALL 1[1] which was followed in 19 C W N 287[2] at p. 289. An attempt is made on behalf of the appellant to show that the interpretation put upon Art. 182 by their Lordships of the Privy Council could not have been intended to apply to the case such as the present where there are really two decrees incorporated into one. It was in this form that the contention was put forth before their Lordships and that form had appealed to the learned Judges who decided the case reported in 19 C W N 287[2] at p. 289, but that was explicitly and unequivocally overruled by their Lordships of the Privy Council. On the construction put upon the Article under consideration by the Privy Council it is clear that whatever the nature of a decree, whether a decree proceeds upon a ground common to the defendants or not, and whether one defendant appeals from such decree in so far as it affects his own interests or whether all the defendants appeal from only a part of a decree, and whether the parties against whom execution is sought were parties to the appeal or not, the period of limitation under Art. 182 commences to run only from the date of the appellate decree. The appellant's contention must therefore fail. The appeal stands dismissed with costs.

Shamrao — Defendant — Respondent.

Second Appeal No. 306 of 1937, Decided on 6th December 1940, from judgment of First Addl. Dist. Judge, Nagpur, D/- 13th January 1937.

C. P. Land Revenue Act (2 of 1917), S. 188 and C. P. Tenancy Act (1 of 1920), Ss. 2 (7) and 49 — Division of title between cosharers — Transfer of proprietary rights by cosharers — Transferee and not lambardar becomes landlord of transferor ex-proprietary tenant — If however transferring cosharer has not exclusive ownership but only exclusive enjoyment then lambardar is the landlord — Lambardar must however in that case hand over rent collected to transferee cosharer—(Per Full Bench; Stone C. J. and Vivian Bose J. contra.)

An ex-proprietary occupancy tenant holds land of the lambardar if the transferring cosharer had not acquired exclusive ownership over his sir land of which he became the tenant. The ownership of the land still remaining with the body of the proprietors of the village, the ex-proprietary tenant would be deemed to hold land of the proprietary body, but on the other hand if there was division of title so as to make the cosharer exclusive proprietor of the sir land appurtenant to his share he would on the transfer of his proprietary right, become the occupancy tenant of his transferee. The entire proprietary right in the land which before the transfer was sir and after it became an occupancy land would vest in the transferee and he alone would become the proprietor and landlord of it. The transferor to whom occupancy right accrues in pursuance of S. 49, C. P. Tenancy Act, must be deemed to be holding his land from the proprietor of the land, namely the transferee, and would be liable to pay rent to him and to no one else. In such a case the lambardar cannot be deemed to be the landlord of either the sir land which has passed into the exclusive ownership of one of the cosharers or of the ex-proprietary occupancy land when the exclusive owner of it disposes of his proprietary right in his exclusive sir. When however there is no partition involving division of title but only an arrangement for separate enjoyment and appropriation of profits, the lambardar would be bound to hand over the rent collected by him to the particular cosharer entitled to it but since the lambardar does not cease to be a cosharer in respect of land so exclusively held by the other, the tenant of that land will, in point of law, be deemed to be the tenant of the whole proprietary body. Consequently the lambardar as the agent of that body will, by virtue of S. 188 (2), C. P. Land Revenue Act, be entitled to recover the rent: A I R 1928 Nag 39 (F B), Approved; Case law discussed. [P 26 C 1, 2; P 28 C 1]

OPINION

Stone C. J. — I have had the advantage of perusing the opinions of my learned colleagues and I note that Grille, Niyogi and Gruer JJ., consider that 23 N L R 160[1] was rightly decided if by "in severalty" is meant "in exclusive ownership." Bose J., on the other hand, thinks that even so it is wrongly decided; and I am in agreement with the conclusion arrived at by Bose J. I do not propose to reproduce the various arguments that he has used but will state my opinion in a few words.

In my opinion lambardar is an officer appointed, primarily for land revenue purposes, for an area. In respect of that area he is liable to Government for the revenue due to Government from that area. He is, by statute, created a fictional landlord of all tenants within that area. As such he is entitled to collect rents. There may be a difficulty where there are two landlords, (1) the fictional one for purposes of the Land Revenue Act, i. e., the lambardar, and (2) a contractual one for purposes other than the Land Revenue Act. Where, however, as here, we are concerned not only with the fictional landlord but with a fictional tenant of a fictional tenancy, that is to say, an ex-proprietary tenancy that springs not out of contract but out of the statutory provisions of the Tenancy Act, it appears to me to be the better opinion that the only landlord that the Courts should regard in respect of such statutory tenancy is the person that for all purposes of the Tenancy Act the Courts are directed to treat as landlord, that is to say, the lambardar. The lambardar is responsible to Government for the revenue and is empowered, in my opinion, by Government to collect rents. Those rents he will doubtless hold for the person who by assignment of the sir is entitled to receive rents from the exproprietary tenant. That is to say, vis-a-vis the tenant the lambardar is the landlord, but when he has collected the rents he must hand over those rents to the assignee after deducting the assignee's share of land revenue. That is not the majority view, and accordingly it seems to me unnecessary to develop any further arguments especially as those have been stated, in my opinion, so clearly by Bose J., to whose judgment I have really nothing to add.

Grille J. — This appeal deals with a question which has been before the Courts on numerous occasions, and the appeal, which was before Niyogi J. and which was decided in the lower Appellate Court on the principles laid down in 23 Nag L R 160[1] to which it affords a parallel, has been referred to a Full Bench of this Court inasmuch as a recent Divisional Bench decision has doubted the correctness of that ruling. I have had the advantage of reading the opinions of Niyogi and Bose JJ., which express at length the two views which were put before us in the course of argument, and also the opinion of Gruer J. In these circumstances it is unnecessary to recapitulate the facts, and the point for determination is whether 23 N L R 160[1] has been correctly decided. The main points for consideration are the interpretation of the term "held in severalty" and whether the provisions of S. 188 (2), Land Revenue Act, by which the lambardar is deemed to be the landlord within the meaning of the C. P. Tenancy Act, entitle the landlord to collect rents from all tenants in the village including such tenants as hold not from the proprietary body but from one member of that body who is in exclusive possession of the sir land which the tenant in question formerly held and of which he is now an exproprietary tenant.

I do not think that there is any doubt or divergence of opinion that by virtue of the C. P. Tenancy Act an exproprietary tenant of sir land does hold land from his transferee and that the transferee is his actual landlord; the point of divergence is whether despite this the real landlord, the transferee, is debarred from collecting the rent of his tenant and whether that right vests solely in the lambardar as representing the proprietary body. I find myself in full agreement with the opinion expressed by Niyogi J. in so far as the assumption is made that we are dealing with a case where the sir land was in the exclusive ownership of the transferor and the transferee and that the facts as established by the pleadings in the particular case before us indicate that the field was one held in exclusive ownership, and that in that case the lambardar has no right to collect the rent, and that in this view 23 N L R 160[1] (in which it appears to me that the exclusive ownership of the sir land was also assumed) was correctly decided. I would however point out with great respect that the reinforcement of the argument by a reference to 19 N L R 59[2] is not valid since that decision has been overruled by a Full Bench to which myself as Judicial Commissioner and Gruer A. J. C. were parties, in 31 N L R Sup 132.[3] I am unable to concur in the view which was pressed before us on behalf of the appellant that by virtue of S. 188 (2), Land Revenue Act, the lambardar is entitled to collect the rent of every tenant in the village irrespective of the fact whether he holds from the proprietary body as such or no. To clothe him with that power which is one of the essential appurtenances of landlordship would be to clothe him with the power to exercise the other rights of the landlord as well, that is to say, he would have the right to eject a tenant for non-payment of rent and then appropriate the holding for the use of the proprietary body and would be able to object to an unauthorized transfer, both of which functions must by their very nature belong to the landlord from whom the tenant admittedly holds. I am unable to see how one function of the landlord can be dissociated from another function, and I do not consider that S. 188 (2) (a), Land Revenue Act, was intended to have this effect or that it does in fact have this effect.

Clause (a) of S. 188 (2) does no more than legalize by statute a position which had been accepted by convention but was liable by reason of dissidence among the proprietary body to be the subject of continual challenge. It should not be interpreted so as to clothe the lambardar with rights which he never had and which the proprietary body whom he represents never had in respect of the exproprietary tenants of a shareholder who holds sir in exclusive ownership. The result would be that the right of holding sir land in exclusive ownership would be entirely illusory, and no palliative in the way of restoring the rent thus collected to such transferee owner would be any aid, since by collecting rent and in my opinion, of necessity exercising the resultant functions of a landlord if the rent were not paid, the very title of the transferee owner as landlord is denied. I concur in the view which has been epitomized in 23 N L R 160[1] (always on the understanding that the reference is to sir land exclusively owned) that the Act makes the lambardar the landlord only in respect of such land as the body of proprietors whom he represents is the landlord of.

To hold that it is the transferee who is entitled to collect the rent and not the lambardar in no wise damages the financial position of the lambardar in respect of the collection of village profits and the payment of land revenue. The creation of an exproprietary tenant by the transfer of his sir fields to an incoming proprietor does not add an anna to the village profits or increase the liability for the revenue to be paid to Government which has been fixed at settlement. Before the transfer the transferring proprietor had his sir land assessed at a certain figure. This assessment is taken into account in determining the profits to be distributed among the proprietors inter se as it has been taken into account in determining the village assets a proportion of which has to be paid to Government. This assessment, the liability and the right to profits are all equally applicable to the incoming transferee share-holder as they were to the outgoing one. The rent which is fixed on the exproprietary occupancy holding may be more or less than the assessment made on it as sir land. It is of course generally more, but this is quite immaterial and represents the legitimate profit which the incoming share-holder has in lieu of the right of cultivating the land himself. It is, I think, conceded that even if the lambardar were to collect the rent from the exproprietary tenant, he would have to hand the whole of it and not only a proportionate share of it to the transferee landlord; consequently it would not affect the assets which it is his duty to collect in order to pay the Government revenue and to distribute the surplus among the cosharers in any way, and the rent of the exproprietary occupancy tenant is completely outside the economics of village income and village profits as laid down at settlement. The proprietary body and the lambardar suffer no loss if the rent due by the exproprietary tenant is not collected; the only loss would fall on the transferee landlord. It would be not only illogical but in the highest degree cumbersome to lay down that it is the duty of the lambardar to recover the rent from such tenant and the further duty of the lambardar, having recovered such rent, to pay it to the actual landlord, the transferee. The transferee is the only person affected, he is the only one interested in collecting the rent, and it is he who should collect it. If there is a failure to pay the rent, he may then sue his tenant and in default proceed to the other remedies which the law provides. Were the right of collection to be with the lambardar, the only remedy open to the transferee would be a suit against the lambardar who in his turn would have to sue a tenant who is not his tenant and who is not a tenant of the proprietary body and whose rent he has no financial interest in collecting. To impose this duty on the lambardar would be to place an unwarranted burden on him. In view of the chain of decisions of the Judicial Commissioner's Court of which 23 N L R 160[1] is only one, the tenant need be in no fear of being mulcted in a double demand for rent, his position as an exproprietary tenant is very clear and free from complications, he should pay to his actual landlord and to no one else.

There would be, in my opinion, very little hardship or incongruity in holding the decision in 23 N L R 160[1] to be correct even if "holding in severalty" as defined therein were to be interpreted in the manner in which Stanyon A. J. C., has interpreted it in 14 N L R 101.[4] It is there laid down that where co-owners of an undivided property have agreed for their common convenience to take exclusive physical possession of certain defined parts of that property for the purpose of better and more intensive management of that property without however any definite severance of interests, the Court will not interfere with such arrangement at the instance of any one co-owner during such period of common tenure, and that when the parties do agree to a division of the property, the arrangement will only be disturbed in so far as it may be necessary to make an equitable division of that property. This also finds expression in the proviso to sub-s. (1) of S. 173, Land Revenue Act, where it is provided that so far as may be compatible with fairness of partition in the creation of pattis, lands held in severalty shall be left in the possession of parties holding the same. This may be termed, if such an expression is permissible, as severalty of possession as opposed to severalty of ownership. Land held in exclusive possession is not brought into the common stock on a partition, and it must therefore follow that land in severalty as defined in S. 173, Land Revenue Act, is land held in the manner described in 14 N L R 101.[4] It is true that the actual ownership is not individual but common and therefore S. 188 (2) of the Act makes the lambardar the landlord of land so held, but subject to that the management of land so held should remain with those so holding it, and equity would demand that a transferee proprietor of such sir should receive the rent paid by the exproprietary occupancy tenant from the malguzar in the same way as a transferee of exclusively owned sir would be entitled to recover from the tenant, and an incoming transferee co-owner is (vide 14 N L R 101[4]) bound by any such existing arrangement; the body of co-owners is equally bound to respect such an arrangement in their relations with the incoming transferee. I am however in no doubt that where there has been no severance of ownership but only a severance of the mode of enjoyment, the proprietary body and therefore the lambardar is the landlord, and that 23 N L R 160[1] is only good law in such cases where there has been a severance of ownership of the sir land before the transfer.

4. ('17) 4 AIR 1917 Nag 45 : 46 I C 272 : 14 NLR 101, Jagannath v. Ramprasad.

Niyogi J. — This is a plaintiff's appeal from a reversing judgment of the first Additional District Judge, Nagpur, in Civil Appeal No. 13-C of 1936 decided on 13th January 1937. This appeal comes before the Full Bench for the reason that in a judgment of the Divisional Bench delivered on 7th October 1938 the correctness of the decision of a Bench of the late Judicial Commissioner's Court reported in 23 N L R 160[1] was doubted and that the law enunciated in that decision calls for re-consideration. The suit out of which this appeal arises was instituted by the appellant in his capacity as lambardar of mouza Jatlapur to recover rent of certain ex-proprietary occupancy fields held by the respondent. The respondent denied the plaintiff's right to recover the rent on the ground that the appellant though lambardar of the village was not the proprietor of the occupancy fields and landlord of the defendant. The facts on which the respondent founded his plea were these. One Damu Patel was originally the proprietor of eight annas share of mouza Jatlapur comprising the occupancy fields in suit which were then held by him in sir right as appurtenant to his eight annas share. The said Damu Patel died in or about the year 1897 survived by his two widows, Mt. Godubai and Mt. Anandabai and two daughters, Banabai and Kamaljabai, the latter being the respondent's mother. The two widows partitioned the eight annas share which devolved on them from their husband, Damu Patel through Court (Civil Suit No. 15 of 1911, decided on 27th July 1911). Four annas proprietary share including the fields in dispute which were then sir fell to the share of Mt. Godubai. She mortgaged her four annas share including the fields with Bajirao and Gangaram who were the managers of a joint Hindu family consisting of themselves and Atmaram. As a result of the partition the mortgage fell to the share of Atmaram who obtained possession of the four annas share including the fields in pursuance of a final decree for foreclosure in his favour. He obtained possession of the four annas share on 3rd June 1930 with the consequence that the fields in suit which were sir fields became the ex-proprietary occupancy fields of Mt. Godubai. On her death they devolved on the respondent who was her daughter's son. The appellant has become the owner of four annas share of Mt. Anandabai, the co-widow of Godubai, by purchase. The appellant admitted that the fields in suit belonged originally to Damu Patel as appurtenant to his eight annas proprietary share in the village. He also admitted the partition between his widows and Godubai's mortgage in favour of Atmaram and the foreclosure of her four annas share in his fields. He raised other pleas which are not material for the decision of this appeal.

The trial Court decreed the plaintiff's suit on the ground that the appellant being the lambardar of the entire village must be deemed to be the landlord within the meaning of C. P. Tenancy Act, 1898, in view of S. 188 (2) (a), C. P. Land Revenue Act, 1917. That decree was reversed by the lower appellate Court on the strength of the case reported in 23 N L R 160.[1] In that case it was held that an ex-proprietor becoming an occupancy tenant of sir held by him in severalty became the tenant of his vendee and that the vendee and not the lambardar was entitled to claim the rent. From the trend of the pleadings offered by the parties it is clear that there is no contest as regards the fields in suit having been held by Damu Patel as appurtenant to his eight annas proprietary share and later by Mt. Godubai as appurtenant to her four annas share. In view of the clear admission contained in the plaintiff's written statement dated 25th May 1936 that the fields in suit originally "belonged" to Damu Patel, it can well be inferred that they were held by him in severalty as owner of the eight annas proprietary share. The expression "in severalty" is well known in law and it means individual and exclusive ownership as opposed to property held in joint tenancy or tenancy in common. An estate is said to be held in severalty when it is held by an individual without any other person participating in the estate: see Goodeve's Law of Real Property, Edn. 5, p. 227. That expression ordinarily has reference to ownership and not merely to enjoyment. It is however possible that joint owners may, for convenience of management or enjoyment of their joint estate, divide it into parcels and put them in exclusive possession of each of the joint owners without intending disintegration of their joint title.

In such a case although each parcel of land may be enjoyed severally by the joint owners it will not become the exclusive property of the person enjoying it. On the other hand, the joint owners may divide a part of their joint property into parcels and put each parcel into separate possession of each of the joint owners in full ownership. In such a case there is not only division of proprety for enjoyment but also a division of title so as to make each one of the joint owners the sole owner of the property falling to his share. Whether the expression "in severalty" signifies merely individual and exclusive enjoyment or individual and exclusive ownership has to be determined on the facts pleaded and proved in each case. In the absence of any specific pleading to restrict the exclusive possession to mere enjoyment apart from title it must be presumed to mean exclusive ownership. At all events in the present case the admitted facts clearly show that the fields in suit were held in exclusive ownership by Damu Patel and after him his widow Mt. Godubai. As a result of the partition between the two co-widows Godubai became the exclusive owner of the 4 annas share including the fields in suit which were then sir. Her share would not on her death pass to Anandabai: see 10 N L R 51.[5] The appellant who is her representative by purchase cannot therefore claim any right in Godubai's 4 annas share which passed in its entirety to Atmaram the mortgagee. Atmaram must therefore be deemed to be the sole proprietor of the fields in dispute.

The question is whether Atmaram by virtue of being the proprietor should be regarded as the landlord of the respondent. As pointed out in 8 N L R 123[6] the ex-proprietary cultivating or occupancy right in sir land is not something that comes into existence only on the loss of the proprietary right. The cultivating and proprietary rights are co-existing component parts of the full sir right. When Mt. Godubai held the lands in suit as sir lands appurtenant to her 4 annas share both the cultivating and proprietary rights were vested in her. When she ceased to cultivate the land as a proprietor she became the occupancy tenant of the land under S. 49, C. P. Tenancy Act. Inasmuch as the cultivating rights were appurtenant to her 4 annas proprietary share she, after she became an occupancy tenant, must be deemed to cultivate with the consent of her transferee and be liable to pay rent to him. He would therefore become the landlord entitled to recover rent of the exproprietary occupancy land. This has been the consistent view of the Judicial

Commissioner's Court as will appear from 15 C P L R 143,[7] A I R 1924 Nag 381,[8] A I R 1927 Nag 325,[9] 23 N L R 160[1] and A I R 1928 Nag 229.[10]

A doubt is cast on the correctness of this view which was confirmed in 23 N L R 160[1] where the rule was enunciated that the proprietor becoming an occupancy tenant of sir land held by him in severalty is the tenant of his vendee and that the vendee is entitled to claim the rent and not the lambardar. As I already stated above the expression "land held in severalty" is susceptible of a two-fold meaning according as it signifies division of title or not. If that expression is understood as implying division of title the view taken in that case must be treated as sound but not so if it means only separate and exclusive possession held with no intention of disrupting the joint title.

The C. P. Tenancy Act defines landlord as the person of whom a tenant holds land, and to whom the tenant is, or but for a contract would be, liable to pay rent for such land, and a tenant as a person who holds land of another person, and is, or but for a contract would be, liable to pay rent for such land to such other person. Can it be said that an ex-proprietary occupancy tenant holds land of the lambardar? The answer would be in the affirmative if the transferring cosharer had not acquired exclusive ownership over his sir land of which he became the tenant. The ownership of the land still remaining with the body of the proprietors of the village the ex-proprietary tenant would be deemed to hold land of the proprietary body, but on the other hand if there was division of title so as to make the co-sharer exclusive proprietor of the sir land appurtenant to his share he would on the transfer of his proprietary right, become the occupancy tenant of his transferee. The entire proprietary right in the land which before the transfer was sir and after it became an occupancy land would vest in the transferee and he alone would become the proprietor and landlord of it. The transferor to whom occupancy right accrues in pursuance of S. 49, C. P. Tenancy Act, must be deemed to be holding his land from the proprietor of the land, namely the transferee and would be liable to pay rent to him and to no one else. Section 188 (2) (a), C. P. Land Revenue Act, 1917, indeed places a lambardar in the position of the landlord within the meaning of the C. P. Tenancy Act. The landlord comtemplated there of whom the lambardar is the representative is the body of cosharers who collectively are the landlord of the village. Before the Land Revenue Act of 1917 was promulgated the rule that was consistently recognised was that lambardar was the agent or representative of the proprietary body as a whole and not of each cosharer. He was therefore regarded as representing the collective capacity of the several cosharers and was entitled to exercise the unity of right which vested collectively in the body of cosharers as will be evident from 11 C P L R 1,[11] 13 C P L R 113,[12] 10 N L R 5,[13] 10 N L R 93,[14] 11 N L R 164,[15] 12 N L R 24,[16] 13 N L R 96[17] and 19 N L R 59.[2] The lambardar therefore would have the power under S. 188 (2), C. P. Land Revenue Act, to perform all those acts which the cosharers collectively are entitled to perform in respect of the land jointly owned by them. The lambardar has no greater right than the body of cosharers he represents and he cannot assert any claim in respect of any land in which the cosharers as a body have no interest. It must follow that in respect of the land over which the cosharers have parted with their interest in favour of one of themselves they can have no proprietary claim left in that land any more than if it had been transferred to an outsider. It must therefore be held that the lambardar cannot be deemed to be the landlord of either the sir land which has passed into the exclusive ownership of one of the cosharers or of the ex-proprietary occupancy land when the exclusive owner of it disposes of his proprietary right in his exclusive sir.

That the lambardar is a representative of the body of proprietors is clear from the expressions "exercise the powers of the proprietors," "to the proprietors" and "on the common property" occurring respectively in cls. (b), (c) and (d) of sub-s. (2) of S. 188, C. P. Land Revenue Act. It is only in respect of the land relating to which he has to render account of the village profits to the proprietors that the lambardar is entitled to exercise the powers conferred upon him by cl. (a) of sub-s. (2) of S. 188, C. P. Land Revenue Act. When the sir land is divided among the proprietors in exclusive ownership each of the proprietors is entitled to appropriate the profits of the land falling to his share solely to himself without any reference to other proprietors.

Under the old Land Revenue Act of 1881, a person could be appointed as a lambardar for the whole mahal although he had no proprietary share in a patti of the mahal. Section 187 of the Act of 1917 effected a change in that separate lambardar has to be appointed for each patti. Since 1917, no person who has ceased to be a proprietor in a patti can continue to be a lambardar: see S. 189, C. P. Land Revenue Act, 1917, and 19 N L R 59.[2] That proves that proprietary interest is essential for holding the post of a lambardar. It is well-known that a managing partner is entitled to represent his partners only so far as the partnership business is concerned and not the exclusive and separate business or property of any of the partners. The representative capacity of the lambardar cannot similarly extend so far as to entitle him to deal with property which is the exclusive and separate property of one of the cosharers.

The sir land exclusively held by a cosharer is no doubt nominally assessed to revenue, but that is never paid. The cosharer is entitled to cultivate the land and appropriate the profits to himself without contributing a single pie to the land revenue of the mahal, which is ordinarily paid out of the rents recovered from the tenants. If the exclusive sir owner is entitled to appropriate the profits of the land, it is clear that he can also appropriate the rent recovered from the tenant of that land, if he chooses to lease it instead of cultivating it personally. Now if that cosharer were to sell his proprietary interest and thereby become an occupancy tenant of that land, why should the purchaser of the proprietary interest who becomes the exclusive owner of that land be placed in a worse position than his transferor vis-a-vis the lambardar who in reality is the agent of the proprietary body? I have never known of a lambardar having claimed the right to recover rent from a tenant of sir land which is exclusively held by a cosharer. That is obviously because the proprietary body has no interest left in that land and consequently the lambardar cannot deal with it.

If in a case where there is a disruption of the joint title over the sir land the ex-proprietary occupancy tenant is treated as the tenant of the proprietary body it would lead to anomalous results. If the lambardar as representing the proprietary body were to sue for rent it is he who would be entitled to eject the tenant if the latter fails to pay the rent decreed and when the lambardar takes possession of the land after ejectment of the tenant he would be holding it on behalf of the proprietary body who ex hypothesi have no interest left in the land. Similarly the lambardar would also claim the right to accept surrender from the ex-proprietary occupancy tenant and that would be contrary to the view taken in A I R 1924 Nag 383.[18] Again, if the ex-proprietary occupancy tenant sells his occupancy holding the lambardar would assert his claim to apply under S. 13, C. P. Tenancy Act, to set aside the transaction and that would be contrary to the view taken in A I R 1927 Nag 325.[9] If the lambardar is held to be the landlord in respect of a land in which he has no proprietary share, he may go so far as to lay action for recovering rent from the sub-tenant of an absolute occupancy or occupancy tenant. Section 188 is not intended to take away the rights of the sole landlord of any land in the mahal to recover the arrears of rent from his tenant. Unless there is a privity of contract between the landlord and the tenant of the exclusive owner of land in the mahal as there is between him and a tenant of the proprietary body, I fail to see how the lambardar who is the representative of the collective interest of the proprietary body can sue to recover it.

In my opinion the law laid down in 23 N L R 160[1] should be affirmed as sound with this explanation that the expression "in severalty" used there should be understood as meaning "in exclusive ownership". The distinction between the expression "land held in severalty" and "land belonging to a cosharer" was pointed out in a ruling of the Chief Commissioner reproduced at p. 247 of C. P. Revenue Manual, Vol II. When 23 N L R 160[1] was decided the expression " in severalty" was understood to apply indifferently to land held in exclusive ownership or enjoyment only, although in that case the expression appears to have been used in the former sense. By an amendment of Ss. 171, 173 and 175, Land Revenue Act, made in 1931, lands held in exclusive ownership are now put in a category different from those held in severalty. In my opinion no useful purpose is likely to be served by departing from the view taken in that case. In the case of a tenant holding land of several cosharers there arose disputes among the cosharers as to the right to recover rent or to accept surrender. Section 188 (2) was enacted to avoid such disputes. That object would be frustrated if the lambardar were allowed to deal with such lands after division. Even if the lambardar were to recover rents from the tenants of such lands he would have to hand over the whole amount recovered by him to the sole owner of that land. Is it not reasonable that the latter should be left to recover rents from his own tenants ?

A question may well arise whether the principle in 23 N L R 160[1] would apply when there is no partition involving division of title but only an arrangement for separate enjoyment and appropriation of profits. In 14 N L R 101[4] it was held that such an arrangement was binding on the purchaser of an undivided share. In such a case also the lambardar would be bound to hand over the rent collected by him to the particular cosharer entitled to it but since (as pointed out in 14 N L R 101[4] itself) the lambardar does not cease to be a cosharer in respect of land so exclusively held by the other, the tenant of that land will, in point of law, be deemed to be the tenant of the whole proprietary body. Consequently the lambardar as the agent of that body will, by virtue of S. 188 (2), C. P. Land Revenue Act, be entitled to recover the rent.

Gruer J. — This reference involves consideration of the question whether 23 N L R 160[1] has been correctly decided. Relying on it the lower appellate Court has dismissed the plaintiff's suit in which he as lambardar claimed to recover rent of some exproprietary occupancy fields held by the respondent. Some argument was addressed to us about the sense in which the phrase "in severalty" is employed in 23 N L R 160.[1] Does it mean "separate ownership" or merely "separate enjoyment" ? Apparently it was being used in both senses in this province, and the resulting ambiguity called for a ruling of the Chief Commissioner and amendments of certain sections of the Revenue Act in 1931 by which lands held in exclusive ownership are distinguished from lands held in severalty. In 23 N L R 160[1] the expression was more probably used in the sense of exclusive ownership although one cannot be certain about it.

Unless S. 188 (2) (a), Land Revenue Act, has altered the position, the arguments for holding that the lambardar is not the landlord in such a case as the present seem to me to be unanswerable. The shareholder was exclusive owner of the sir land. His sale of his share including that land was a matter between him and his vendee alone. The vendee obtained the proprietary rights, i. e., the sum total of his vendor's rights less the cultivating rights carved out of them. He therefore became the landlord of the exproprietor. He is the landlord as the term is defined in S. 2 (7), C. P. Tenancy Act.

But it is said S. 188 (2) (a), Land Revenue Act, alters all that and makes the lambardar landlord for all tenancy land in the village irrespective of its origin. That, to my mind, is to apply the section too widely. The section was enacted to give statutory expression to the rights and duties of the landlord as agent of the whole proprietary body, and it should be confined to this. He cannot be deemed to be the agent of a single co-sharer so far as the exclusive ownership of that co-sharer is concerned. He cannot therefore be deemed even by fiction of law to be the landlord of a person who in fact is the tenant of the shareholder. He has, no doubt, to collect the village profits. But so far as these fields are concerned that would be done by taking into account the "rental value" of the sir which is part of the malguzari assets: S. 8, C. P. Settlement Act. That is not the same thing as the "rent" of this land after it becomes an occupancy tenancy of the exproprietor. The rent he may pay may be more or less than the rental value, as the fixation of rent is a matter of contract subject to control by the Settlement Officer or Revenue Officer : Ss. 15 and 16, C. P. Tenancy Act.

If the lambardar is landlord of the whole village without restriction he would have the right to collect rents from sub-tenants and to accept surrenders from or eject exproprietary occupancy tenants. This would be an unwarrantable interference with private profits of a shareholder holding exclusive possession of sir land. The lambardar's function is to pay revenue to Government and to distribute the profits of the village. For that it is not necessary that he should collect rent from the exclusive tenant of a shareholder. So far as I am aware, to hold otherwise would be to upset a practice which has worked smoothly and been rarely questioned even after the enactment of S. 188, Land Revenue Act. If the lambardar were entitled to collect rents which were private profits he would have to re-pay them to the true landlord. That would surely be a clumsy and unnecessary procedure.

I have now had the advantage of reading the differing opinions of Niyogi and Bose JJ., and find myself in agreement with the former. Where the land was held in separate enjoyment only I agree that, as it still belongs to the whole proprietary body, the lambardar as their representative would be entitled in law by S. 188 (2) (a) to recover the rent — although even in that case he might in practice allow the shareholders to do so. The distinction between the two cases was recognized in 35 ALL 27.[19] The learned Judges there remarked :

> It is to be noted that this is not a case where the vendor is really the sole owner of the proprietary title in the lands which he holds as sir. There are some such cases.

My conclusion then is that 23 N L R 160[1] is correctly decided, if the words "in severalty" in it mean "in exclusive ownership" but not otherwise.

Vivian Bose J. — Niyogi J.'s order of reference asks that the case before him be heard and decided by a Full Bench, but it was agreed at the hearing that the only question with which the Full Bench should concern itself is whether 23 N L R 160[1] was rightly decided. We have therefore to consider the facts of 23 N L R 160.[1] They are as follows : The plaintiff there, (one G), and the defendant B, were cosharers in a village in the Central Provinces. B owned an eight annas share, and G and two others owned the other eight annas. G was the lambardar. B was in possession of certain sir fields and according to the facts given in the judgment she held this sir in "severalty." In the year 1923, B sold her eight annas share to one M and thus became the exproprietary occupancy tenant of these sir fields. G then sued B for the rent of her holding and the question arose whether G was entitled to sue or M. B pleaded that M was her landlord and that he alone could sue. This contention was upheld.

A great part of the argument before us was directed to the meaning of the word "severalty" as used in the judgment and it was argued that much turned upon this. I do not think it does. But before expressing an opinion on that I will deal with this part of the discussion. The learned counsel for the defendant-respondent (the exproprietary occupancy tenant in the case out of which this reference arises) contended that "holding in severalty" meant holding as exclusive owner, and he relied on the definitions given in Wharton's Law Lexicon, page 789 and in Stroud's Judicial Dictionary. But I do not think it is legitimate to refer to these definitions because we are concerned here with the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act where the word "severalty" is used as a term of art in a special and restricted sense. It has come to acquire this special meaning for historical reasons.

When there are two or more co-owners of a village each can hold land in it in one of three ways. In the first place some particular plot of land can be his exclusive property to which the other cosharers have no right or claim and in which they have no interest. If there is a partition of the village, this piece of property would not be brought into hotchpot and the title of the person owning it would be unaffected by the partition. He would continue to hold it as before. The second possibility is when a plot of land is placed in possession of a particular cosharer for convenience of management. In such a case the plot is still common property. The title of the other cosharers is not displaced but they would not ordinarily be allowed to disturb the possession of the cosharer in possession without suing for partition. In such a suit the plot would be thrown into hotchpot and might or might not be assigned to the share of the same person when the partition was made. This is the kind of possession with which their Lordships were dealing in 18 Cal 10[20] and the Court of the Judicial Commissioner at Nagpur in 14 C P L R 76[21] and 14 N L R 101[4] at page 104. The third possibility is when land is held in common without any division by agreement (express or implied) for convenience of management. In that case each cosharer would be entitled to joint and undivided possession until partition and on partition the land would be thrown into hotchpot as before.

These were the three possibilities with which the revenue authorities of the province had to deal when the C. P. Land Revenue Act of 1881 was passed. That Act drew the above distinctions between these several kinds of property but did not draw them very clearly. It used language which was inapt. It used the term "severalty" in a sense in which it is not ordinarily understood in legal terminology. It used the word "belonging" which has no special legal significance to denote a special legal concept. But it did distinguish between them. Section 136-K distinguished between lands held in "severalty" and in "common." Section 136-L dealt with land held in "severalty" and S. 136-N with sir land 'belonging' to a cosharer. It was clear that these different terms were intended to denote different legal concepts but exactly what the differences were was not properly understood and so it became necessary for the Chief Commissioner who in those days presided over the highest revenue Court to issue a ruling to clarify the position. This is revenue department ruling No. 5175 dated 7th December 1895. It is reproduced as a note to S. 136-N, C. P. Land Revenue Act of 1881 in the C. P. Revenue Manuals of those days and also as an appendix to Revenue Book Circulars VI-5 dealing with the partition of mahals and pattis. The Chief Commissioner said that the word "belonging" used in S. 136-N must be construed to mean land held in "exclusive ownership," that is to say in the first of the three senses which I have set out above. He gave illustrations of this kind of ownership which I need not reproduce, and then said :

> In all the above cases the lands in question have ceased to belong to the joint estate and may be said to belong to the cosharers in possession of them.

He next dealt with the term 'severalty' and said that it referred to the second of the three positions to which I have referred and the word "common" or "shamlat" to the third. This classification held the field down to the year 1917 and then the Chief Commissioner's terminology received legislative sanction in the new Land Revenue Act of 1917 which replaced the Act of 1881. Section 136-K of the old Act was reproduced as S. 171 in the new with a very slight verbal alteration which did not affect the sense. Before making a partition the Deputy Commissioner was told, as before, to record a proceeding specifying the lands held in "severalty," if any, and the lands held in "common." This section was further amended in the year 1931 and the Deputy Commissioner was then told also to record the lands held in "exclusive ownership." But I will ignore this amendment at the moment because it was not in existence in the year 1927 when 23 N L R 160[1] was decided. I will deal with the law as it stood in 1917 when the new Land Revenue Act of that year was passed. Section 136-L of the old Act was reproduced word for word as S. 173 in the new. This was also amended in 1931 but the amendment does not affect the present position. The point is that both sections, the old and the new, used the word "severalty."

Then followed the counter-part of S. 136-N which had created most of the doubt before the Chief Commissioner's ruling. This was reproduced as S. 175 in the new Act, but this time, instead of using the words "belonging to any cosharer" (the language of the old section), the new section said "which is the exclusive property of any cosharer." This section was also amended in 1931 but not this part of it which in my opinion is crucial for present purposes. It is clear then that the concepts of the terms "exclusive ownership," "severalty" and "common" which the Chief Commissioner had defined in the year 1895 were imported by the Legislature into the New Land Revenue Act of 1917 in the year 1917. All the three terms were used, and each was used in a different sense, and they were so interpreted by the revenue Courts in 13 N L J 45[22] at p. 46 after the passing of the new Act. The amending Act of 1931 made no difference to this. Indeed if anything it underlined the distinctions still further. But we can ignore that. It is enough that in the year 1917 it was placed beyond doubt by the Legislature that the term "severalty" as applied to lands affected by the Land Revenue Act, did not mean "exclusive ownership."

Whether that was the sense in which the term was used in 23 N L R 160[1] I do not know. In the ordinary way I would have had no doubt. I would have been clear that it must have been used in the sense in which, as I see it, the Legislature had intended it to be used. But unfortunately the two learned Judicial Commissioners who decided 23 N L R 160[1] used the term in the sense of exclusive ownership in two previous decisions, namely A I R 1924 Nag 381,[8] A I R 1927 Nag 325[9] and again in A I R 1928 Nag 229,[10] so it is possible that they also used it in that sense in 23 N L R 160.[1] But however that may be it makes no difference in the view I take. Whether the term was meant to indicate exclusive ownership or not, I think with respect, either way, that 23 N L R 160[1] was wrongly decided. The decision turns wholly on the difinitions of "landlord" and "tenant" given in the Tenancy Act. And as regards S. 188 (2), Land Revenue Act, (which in my opinion is crucial) it was set on one side as not applicable because "the Act makes the lambardar the landlord only in respect of such land as the body of proprietors whom he represents is the landlord of." With the utmost respect I do not think that that is so. I think it would have been so under the law as it stood before the Act of 1917 was passed, but in my opinion that Act has effected a radical alteration in the position of the lambardar which alteration has completely changed the old law. In argument the matter was also put somewhat as follows. It is permissible for one of several cosharers in a mahal to own sir land as his exclusive property. If it is his exclusive property, then the other cosharers have no rights of any kind in it, and it cannot be made the subject-matter of a partition between them. If that is so, then the lambardar who represents the cosharers as a whole in respect of their common property cannot be the statutory agent of this cosharer in respect of this item in which no other cosharer has any interest.

This sounds logical enough but in my opinion it overlooks the peculiar nature of malguzari tenures under the Central Provinces Land Revenue and Tenancy Acts. The malguzar in this province has not got the ownership of the land : that vests in Government. It has always vested there and is still there. Government has never parted with that fundamental right, and because of that S. 56, Land Revenue Act, states that all land, to whatever purpose applied and wherever situate, is liable to pay revenue to Government, and that neither length of occupation nor any grant made by the proprietor shall release such land from this liability. I have dealt with this at length in the opinion given by me in the Full Bench case reported in I L R 1940 Nag 348[23] at page 371. This fundamental concept results in queer repercussions and has emboldened the Legislature to impose liabilities and make conditions in order to facilitate the collection of Government revenue which it would probably not have imposed upon a true owner of the soil. I will examine first the Land Revenue Act, as it now stands because primarily that is what we are bound by. And here it is necessary to bear two things in mind. The first is that in these matters we are dealing with fictions and not with realities. The law says that for these purposes Courts must "deem" the lambardar to be the landlord whether he is so in fact or not. The second is that though the Land Revenue and Tenancy Acts speak of landlords and tenants the words are used as terms of art to denote special concepts and that the so-called landlord is not really a landlord as ordinarily understood, nor is the so-called tenant a tenant.

I have been at pains to stress this in the opinion recently delivered by me (with which my learned brother Niyogi J. did not wholly agree and with which my Lord the Chief Justice agreed only as to the conclusion without committing himself to the reasons given by me) in the Full Bench case in I L R 1940 Nag 348[23] at pp. 364 and 365 and at 370-377 to which I have already referred ; and I may here also refer to 41 Cal 926[24] at p. 938, where their Lordships of the Privy Council deal with another Indian Act in which the terms "landlord" and "tenant" are used in a special sense. I feel that we are likely to be led astray when dealing with these tenancies unless we place the ordinary law of landlord and tenant on one side and concentrate on the very special and exceptional conditions which the Land Revenue and Tenancy Acts of this province impose on both the "landlord" and on the "tenant." As I said before these Acts create very special tenures which are unknown to the ordinary law and prescribe in detail the rights, remedies and liabilities of the very special type of "landlord" which they create and the very special kind of "tenant." We have therefore to look to those special laws at every step and not to the ordinary law. I have little doubt that the real landlord of the exproprietary tenant is the transferee. I have little doubt that he is the person of whom the tenant holds his land and to whom but for a contract to the contrary he would be liable to pay the rent. I have little doubt that the transferee fulfils the conditions specified in the definition given in the Tenancy Act. I have no doubt that under the ordinary law the landlord is the person entitled to sue the tenant for rent and not another. That is a commonplace. But we are not dealing here with the ordinary law. The Legislature has abrogated that and for reasons which I consider sound and just, but whether good or bad, has imposed special conditions, and it is to those special conditions that we must look.

The relationship of landlord and tenant is ordinarily founded on contract but in these cases though that is one of the ways in which these special "tenancies" can arise, the moment the contract is made the law tears it up and not a term of it can be given effect to. Thereafter the relationship between the parties is not governed by contract but by the special rules and laws which the Land Revenue and Tenancy Acts have made for those very special and exceptional tenures. One of these laws relates to the very special position assigned to the lambardar. Section 2 (6), C. P. Land Revenue Act, says that:

'Lambardar' means the proprietor of a mahal appointed to discharge the duties imposed on a lambardar by this Act.

The appointment is made by the revenue authorities under S. 187 and once made no civil Court can question it. Its jurisdiction in this respect is expressly barred by S. 220 of the Act. It is true the revenue authorities are directed to select one of the "proprietors" for this purpose but they alone can decide whether a man is a "proprietor" for these purposes or not. Even if they select a man who is not a proprietor according to the view of the civil Courts, the civil Courts cannot interfere or question the appointment. Their right to do so is taken away in express terms. Section 220 (p) says they shall not interfere: see also 31 N L R Sup 132[3] at p. 137. It is relevant to point out at this stage that though the lambardar is ordinarily regarded as the agent of the proprietary body he is not so in any strict sense of the term. Agency is a matter of contract. It is a matter of consent and mutual agreement between the principal and the agent. The scope and nature of the agency depends upon what is agreed between the parties. Not so here. The cosharers can protest as vigorously as they please. They can decline to agree to the appointment. It will make no difference if the revenue authorities choose to disregard their wishes and appoint the man against their will. Then again, the cosharers, and indeed the man himself, may desire to delimit the scope of his authority, but that also would make no difference. The Act sets out the exact nature of his duties and the extent of his rights and liabilities. It defines with precision what he may and may not do. Such a man is not an agent in any ordinary sense of the term. It is convenient to refer to him as a statutory agent and it is true that he represents the proprietary body (even though it be against their express wishes and consent) for certain statutory purposes, but in truth and in fact he is not an agent at all. He is a person clothed with authority by statute and empowered to carry out certain statutory duties, and unless we recognize this clearly I fear we may go astray. I stress this because it is here that the law has, in my opinion, been so radically altered by the Land Revenue Act of 1917. My Lord the Chief Justice and I had occasion to deal with this from another aspect in F. A. No. 138 of 1935[25] and I reproduce the following passage from our judgment:

The definition of lambardar given in the Land Revenue Act of 1881 is that he is the person appointed to represent the proprietary body "in its relations with the Government": beyond that no statutory recognition was afforded him and he was merely looked upon as a sort of customary agent of the proprietary body: see 11 N L R 164[15] at p. 168. One result of this was that his powers, except in his dealings with Government, could be withdrawn and the proprietors could, when they so chose, appoint another man, not the lambardar, and not even a proprietor, to represent them in all matters unconnected with Government: see 10 N L R 93.[14] Also that when there were more lambardars than one the consent of all had to be obtained to invest their action with validity unless the proprietors made some express or implied arrangement to the contrary: 12 N L R 24.[16] Now he is to be deemed the proprietor for certain purposes, the landlord for others, and a statutory agent who cannot be removed except by the revenue authorities and whose powers cannot be abrogated for still others.

I still adhere to that view. The effect of the old view was that the cosharers could put an end to the lambardar's powers by common action amongst themselves. Thus, if they partitioned privately, then each became the sole landlord of his patti and the lambardar was completely excluded. In addition to the rulings cited above, this view was taken in two cases which bear a closer resemblance to the facts of the present case, namely, 12 C P L R 66[26] at p. 69 and A I R 1922 Nag 126.[27] But now the position is quite different. The lambardar has been given a statutory status by the new Act which no one can shake, and if the Legislature chooses to say that in respect of these special and peculiar tenures which it has created the lambardar is to be deemed the landlord for certain purposes, even of land in which he has no proprietary interest, no one can do anything about it, especially as even under the old law the cosharers could have appointed such a person to deal with matters which did not directly concern Government by private agreement amongst themselves.

Consider this example. Take the case of a lambardar who sells all his interests in the mahal to another. What happens? He does not cease to be the lambardar, and therefore "the landlord," simply because he no longer has any sort or kind of interest in the mahal and possesses no land in it. He continues until somebody else is appointed in his place. That is the effect of S. 2 (6) and is what was decided in A I R 1928 Nag 123[28] and in A I R 1930 Nag 210.[29]

Take another example. Consider a case in which the mahal is imperfectly partitioned into pattis. The lambardar continues to exercise sway over the entire mahal notwithstanding the partition even though he may have no interest whatever in some of the pattis and may hold no land in them. He continues until he is removed under S. 189. This was decided by a Full Bench of the Nagpur Judicial Commissioner's Court in 31 N L R Sup 132,[3] and if I may say so with respect I think the decision was right. Indeed it was conceded during the arguments that this would be the position but it was contended that that is only a temporary expedient. It may be, but nevertheless the expedient holds good until, as the learned Additional Judicial Commissioners remark, the lambardar is removed under S. 189. After all the remedy is simple. All that a party affected has to do is to apply to the Deputy Commissioner to have any partition or division privately effected, recorded and recognized under S. 47 (2), Land Revenue Act, read with Ss. 66, 77 (1) (a) and 106 (g), have a new patti created and have a new lambardar appointed. The definition of patti has been enlarged in the new Act in order to enable this to be done. Originally it was confined to lands allotted to a cosharer by an imperfect partition made under the Act. Now it is wide enough to include pattis formed by private partition. Even under the old Acts the right of cosharers to effect private partitions among themselves by common agreement was recognized and upheld: see 7 C P L R 54,[30] 7 C P L R 137,[31] 12 C P L R 66[26] at p. 69 and A I R 1922 Nag 126.[27] Now the matter is even clearer. If then with these simple remedies to hand a cosharer does not choose to exercise these rights, or if he prefers to have the lambardar do his work for him (and it may well be that he does), why should the tenant of all persons be allowed to object? What does it matter to him who he pays his rent to provided he does not have to pay twice over?

The opinion of a member in charge is irrelevant in construing an Act and I have reached my conclusion on an analysis of the Act itself, but it is gratifying to note that the view I take about the radical alteration in the lambardar's position under the new Act is shared by that very able and experienced administrator Mr. H. A. Crump who piloted the Land Revenue Bill through the local Legislative Council. In his Statement of Objects and Reasons he said:

> The present definition of 'lambardar' is unnecessarily narrow. The lambardar's duty is no doubt primarily to pay the revenue, but it is not necessary to limit his representation of the proprietary body to 'relations with Government'. The tendency of cosharers to insist on their rights of separate management of their pattis is sometimes both inconvenient to Government and bad for the village, and it is necessary to emphasise and strengthen the position of the lambardars.

But to continue the analysis of the Act, S. 188 (2), Land Revenue Act, sets out the powers with which the lambardar is clothed by the Legislature. And the first of these is this. The Act says that he shall "be deemed to be the landlord within the meaning of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act 1898."

Now what is the force of the word "deemed"? I do not think there can be any doubt, but if there is, it is resolved by their Lordships of the Privy Council. They state in 54 Bom 216[32] at p. 223.

> Now when a person is 'deemed to be' something, the only meaning possible is that whereas he is not in reality that something the Act of Parliament requires him to be treated as if he were. It follows that although the High Court was perfectly right in holding that if section 42 (of the Income-tax Act) stood alone 'agent' in that section would mean an agent in actual receipt of the profits or gains which were to be assessed, they failed to appreciate that S. 43 puts the person who comes within its term artificially into the position of the agent and of assessee under S. 42.

So also here. The Act tells us that though the lambardar may not be the real landlord Courts must disregard the reality and resort to a fiction, at any rate for the purposes of S. 188 (2), and put him artificially into a position which he does not really occupy. Even though another man may in truth and in fact be the real landlord the Court is told to ignore that fact and to look upon the lambardar as the real man and treat him accordingly. The meaning given to 'landlord' in the C. P. Tenancy Act of 1898 is the person of whom a tenant holds land, and to whom the tenant is, or but for a contract would be, liable to pay rent for such land.

(The definition in the new Tenancy Act of 1920 is the same but that is by the way.) Therefore S. 188 (2) (a), Land Revenue Act, tells us that even though the tenant actually holds land of another person and is, or but for a contract would be, liable to pay rent to him, we must ignore these facts and treat the lambardar as the person of whom the tenant holds land and to whom he is, or but for a contract would be, liable to pay the rent. If that is so, and I can see no escape from the clear words of the Act, I find it impossible to hold that Courts can refuse to allow the lambardar to sue, whatever the realities may be. If the Courts must regard him as the person to whom the tenant is bound to pay his rent I find it difficult to see how they can refuse to allow him to sue for the rent when it is not paid.

But to continue. How far does the lambardar's power extend? Section 188 (2) says that he shall be deemed to be the landlord in the mahal or patti for which he is appointed. If he is the landlord, then there cannot be another landlord for these purposes. If he is the person to whom the tenant is bound to pay the rent, then he alone can sue, and all we have to see is whether the land in respect of which the rent is due and in relation to which the tenancy arises is situate within the mahal or patti to which the lambardar in question is appointed.

What then is a mahal and what a patti? Here again we turn to the definitions. Mahal is defined in S. 2 (8) (a) as any area, not being a malik-makbuza plot or a survey number which has been separately assessed to land revenue . . .

I gather that the plot of land with which 23 N L R 160[1] was dealing was not separately assessed to land revenue, and it is clear that it was not a malik makbuza plot, therefore it must have been a part of the mahal (unless there were pattis, and that does not seem to have been the case) for which G had been appointed lambardar. If that was so, then clearly, as I see it, G was the person entitled to sue for the rent.

Turning next to the definition of patti we find it defined in S. 2 (12) as "the lands in a mahal held by any cosharer or body of cosharers in separate ownership."

At first sight this appears to lend some support to the view taken in 23 N L R 160.[1] It will be remembered that the reason why S. 188 (2) was placed on one side was because according to the view taken there "the Act makes the lambardar the landlord only in respect of such land as the body of proprietors whom he represent is the landlord of." But even so, if A is appointed the lambardar of a mahal, then however wrong that appointment may be, and however many pattis there may be in the mahal he remains, as I see it, the landlord for that mahal. Therefore all that is left is to see whether the land in question falls within that mahal. And that is what the rulings which I have cited above hold.

Now there can, in my opinion, be no doubt that the sir land of a mahal forms part of the mahal whether it be held in exclusive ownership or in severalty or in common, and whether the mahal be divided into pattis or not. The test under the definition of a mahal is to see whether the land is separately assessed to land revenue, and we find from S. 81 that only three units are separately assessed, namely, estates, mahals and malik-makbuza holdings. We also find from S. 56 that all land is liable to the payment of land revenue unless it has been expressly exempted, and even in the case of exempted lands a camil jama, that is, the amount which would be payable but for the exemption, has to be recorded: see S. 73). It follows that sir land is also liable to the payment of land revenue whether it is the separate and exclusive property of one of the cosharers or not. Under S. 82 the assessment is offered (1) in the case of an estate, to the proprietor, (2) in the case of a mahal, also to the proprietor unless there are more than one, and in that event to the lambardar, and (3) in the case of a malik-makbuza holding, to the malik-makbuza. It follows from this, and from S. 81, that sir land is not separately assessed, and that the share of the revenue recoverable from it is included in the lump sum to which the mahal as a whole is assessed; also that no separate assessment is offered to a cosharer having exclusive possession of a plot of sir land as it is to the malik-makbuza. Therefore even in respect of sir plots which belong exclusively to a cosharer the lambardar represents that cosharer and accepts the assessment on his behalf even though he has no right or interest of any kind in the plot. If then he can represent these persons in their relations with Government there is no reason why he should not also do so in their relations with tenants.

The truth of the matter is that though the status of malguzars as farmers of revenue has been considerably blurred by the passage of time and by the various modifications introduced by the Legislature from time to time, fundamentally it has remained the same, and whatever rights they may have been given and whatever privileges they may have acquired, they have all been subject to their fundamental obligations in respect of the collection of Government revenue. That fundamental conception underlies everything and it explains much which on the face of it appears absurd and incongruous. Viewed in this light, matters which seem obscure in the relations of the so-called landlord with his so-called tenant and of the lambardar with both become easier to understand. Under S. 188 (2) (a) the lambardar is deemed to be the landlord within the mahal or patti for which he is appointed, and under sub-clause (b) it is he who has to collect the village profits and, if necessary, to institute suits to enable him to do so. Now the rent payable by the tenants of the mahal or patti is part of the village profits. Therefore it is the lambardar who has to collect them and it is to him alone that the tenants need and indeed must pay. The reason why he is given these powers is because he is the man who has to pay Government its quota of the land revenue from the profits so collected. That he does so in practice and sues for arrears in all ordinary cases is beyond dispute and his right to do so has never been questioned. Unless therefore this right is inherent in the nature of his office the only other source from which his powers can be derived is S. 188 (2) (b)

An indication of the nature of these village profits is to be obtained from S. 8, Central Provinces Settlement Act, which says that the "malguzari assets" of a mahal include "the rents of holdings fixed by a settlement officer." It is true the term used is "malguzari assets" and that these assets may not cover as wide a field as the village profits, but unless the matters included as the malguzari assets are included in the term "village profits" there will be very little left for the malguzar to recover, so little indeed that it will be impossible for him to pay the land revenue. The rent collections usually form by far the largest item in the lambardar's accounts, and in the very nature of things, village economy being what it is, that must be so. There is also an intimate connexion between the lambardar, the rental collections and the assessment of the land revenue. Section 1, Settlement Act, says that that Act shall be construed together with the C. P. Land Revenue and Tenancy Acts and states that in so far as it relates to land revenue it shall be deemed to be a part of the Land Revenue Act of 1917 and in so far as it relates to tenancy it shall be deemed to be a part of the Tenancy Act of 1920. Section 9 states that the land revenue assessed on a mahal shall be 50 per cent. of the malguzari assets of such mahal. And we know from S. 188 (1) (a), Land Revenue Act, as well as from S. 123 that one of the duties of the lambardar is to pay the land revenue to Government and that if it is not paid it can be recovered from him under S. 125 as well as from the other cosharers. Seeing therefore the intimate connexion which there is between the land revenue and the malguzari assets, and seeing that the bulk of these assets usually consist of rent collections, and seeing that the lambardar has to pay the revenue, I think it is legitimate to infer that he has been given the right under S. 188 (2) (c) to collect that part of the assets which constitutes its main item.

I think that fundamentally the reluctance of the learned Additional Judicial Commissioners in 23 N L R 160[1] to give effect to the plain language of S. 188 (2), Land Revenue Act, is grounded in an unexpressed fear of perpetrating a two-fold injustice, that of exposing the unfortunate tenant to a double liability for rent, and that of depriving the unfortunate transferee who is the real landlord of the fruits of his purchase. I think with respect that both fears are ungrounded. Under the view I take the tenant would not have to pay twice over because if he pays to the person appointed by the law to collect his rent, his obligation is discharged just as effectively as it would be if he paid to an agent expressly authorized by the landlord in that behalf. And as for the transferee, the fiction imposed by the law is not to be carried further than the Act warrants. The lambardar is not to be deemed the landlord for all purposes but only for the special purposes indicated in the Act. Once we travel beyond that, then we leave the realm of fiction and enter a world of realities. We are at liberty to face facts again. This means that the relations of the cosharers inter se (including of course those of the transferee who by reason of his purchase is now one of them) and their rights and liabilities as between themselves are regulated according to the ordinary law and not according to some statutory fiction.

I will illustrate what I mean by a concrete example. Let it be assumed that there are four cosharers in a mahal and that one of them is the newly acquired transferee of a sir plot which was held in exclusive ownership by the transferor. And let it be assumed that the revenue authorities have appointed only one lambardar for the whole mahal and have not appointed a separate lambardar for the separate patti which this sir plot held in exclusive ownership may constitute. Let the total village profits of the mahal, after deducting the costs of collection, the land revenue, and other items of expenditure, be X, and let the rent fixed for the sir plot in question be Y. Then the matter will work out thus. The lambardar will collect the rent Y from the ex-proprietary tenant and he will pay over to the transferee, not 1/4 of X plus 1/4 of Y (which is what a person holding in "severalty" would get in such circumstances), but 1/4 X plus the whole of Y. This inflicts no hardship or injustice on the transferee. It gives him his entire dues. It preserves to him his rights intact and at the same time protects the tenant and simplifies the task of village administration. The only difference it makes to anybody is that it changes the agency of collection. In my opinion this is the only reasonable way to view these sections. If not, either the unfortunate ex-proprietary tenant is exposed to a double action for rent, or, if he is saved from that, then the unfortunate lambardar is made powerless to make a part of his recoveries without in any way being relieved of his obligation to Government. In my opinion it is no use saying that he can sue the transferee. That is not the quick powerful remedy which the Act gives him. Moreover, if the transferee has no land and is otherwise a pauper, it would be pointless to sue him.

The other view would open up an easy way for a needy proprietor in exclusive possession of sir to evade his obligations. All he would have to do would be to transfer his holding to an obliging relation who had no money of his own and then refuse to pay either rent or revenue. The relation would refuse to sue and would refuse to eject him. The lambardar would have to pay Government and would have no remedy left over except the doubtful one of sending the transferee to a civil jail and of having to pay for his upkeep while there. It would create an impossible situation. Apart from this, I can see nothing fantastic in the idea of a man who has no interest in the land being appointed an agent for the collection of another man's rent. It is true that that does not make him a landlord but then he is not the landlord anyway; he is only deemed to be one for certain specified purposes. The whole thing is a fiction. Once it is realized that this is by far the easiest way for Government to get its revenue collected, then there is no reason why the Legislature should not introduce these fictions and impose terms of this nature on persons who at bottom are mere farmers of the Government revenues, however, much their status and dignity may have been enhanced in other ways. In my opinion 23 N L R 160[1] was wrongly decided and should be overruled.

ORDER OF REFERENCE.

Stone C. J., and Vivian Bose J. — A preliminary objection is raised here which must, we think, fail. The appeal arises out of proceedings in execution of a decree obtained in the Court of the Additional District Judge, Wardha, upon a mortgage executed by the judgment-debtor in favour of the decree-holder. The mortgage comprised property situate in Wardha in the Central Provinces and also property situate in Yeotmal in Berar. The suit was brought in the Wardha Court and the decree was against both sets of property. It was for foreclosure. After the decree-holder had obtained possession of the Wardha estate the decree was transferred to the Court of the Additional District Judge at Yeotmal for execution in respect of the Yeotmal property. The judgment-debtor thereupon raised an objection and contended that the decree was a nullity in so far as it affected the Berar property because Berar was foreign territory and so no Court in British India had jurisdiction to entertain a suit in respect of property situate there. The objection was allowed by the Yeotmal Court and execution refused, so the decree-holder has appealed here. At the same time, in order to have two strings to his bow, he has also instituted a separate suit in the Yeotmal Court upon his judgment for foreclosure of the Berar property.

The learned counsel for the judgment-debtor respondent contends that the decree-holder having done this has either accepted the soundness of the lower Court's finding or has elected to pursue the other remedy ; in either case he cannot continue this appeal so long as the separate suit is in being. He must withdraw either the suit or the appeal. We agree that it would be undesirable to have both proceedings going on at the same time as that might lead to conflicting decisions, but we cannot agree that it is either illogical or wrong for the decree-holder to do his utmost to safeguard his own position. If he were to fail here, a separate suit on the British Indian judgment would be the right remedy, but it might well be that by the time the appeal was decided the limitation for that would have gone, consequently the appellant decree-holder was well within his rights in instituting that suit at an early opportunity. Of course that suit ought, as a matter of practical convenience, to be stayed pending the decision of this appeal, and that we gather has been done, but that is no bar to the prosecution of this appeal. The preliminary objection therefore fails.

On the merits we do not think that the lower Court is right. We are prepared to agree, in accordance with the Full Bench decision in 31 N L R Sup 57[1] that in certain special and exceptional circumstances the executing Court can question the jurisdiction of the Court which passed the decree under execution on the ground that it is a complete nullity; and we are further prepared to accept the decision of another Full Bench of the Judicial Commissioner's Court (31 N L R Sup 43[2]) that in general, (though not in this particular case), Courts in British India lack territorial jurisdiction in respect of property situate in Berar. But beyond that we are not prepared as at present advised to go. With the utmost respect to the learned Judicial Commissioners who decided the earlier Full Bench (the later of the two just cited) we cannot agree that that concludes the matter. In our opinion want of territorial, as opposed to inherent jurisdiction is not a fatal defect to a suit. It is only an irregularity and it is curable. Section 21, Civil P. C., states that :

> No objection as to the place of suing shall be allowed by any appellate or revisional Court unless such objection was taken in the Court of first instance at the earliest possible opportunity and in all cases where issues are settled at or before such settlement and unless there has been a consequent failure of justice.

This makes it clear that want of territorial jurisdiction is not one of those defects which renders the Court so totally void of power as to make its decree a nullity; and we gather this from S. 18 as well. When there is want of inherent jurisdiction nothing can cure it, neither consent nor waiver nor estoppel. As opposed to this, the wrong place of suing is such a trivial defect that not only must it be ignored unless objection is taken at the earliest possible opportunity but even if it is taken then and overruled (except where the order is set right at once by a higher tribunal) the objection cannot be repeated at a later stage unless there has been a consequent failure of justice. The word connecting these two phrases in S. 21 is "and" and not "or." See in this connexion 42 ALL 74[3] at p. 76, 49 Cal 37[4] at p. 41 and 25 N L R 104[5] at page 106 also 11 Lah 15[6] which deals with a corresponding provision in S. 11, Suits Valuation Act, relating to the pecuniary jurisdiction of the Court. The earlier Full Bench, 31 N L R Sup 43[2] considers that S. 21 does not apply for two reasons : (1) because it relates to domestic tribunals and not to "foreign Courts," (p. 53), and (2) because S. 21 is confined to appellate and revisional tribunals having jurisdiction over the Court in which the defect occurred and does not extend to a Court dealing with the question in a separate suit (page 54); and this reasoning would extend to execution proceedings in the same suit as well. With the utmost respect we are unable to agree.

As regards the first objection what the learned Judicial Commissioners have overlooked is that though Berar is foreign territory Berar Courts are not "foreign Courts" within the meaning of the Civil Procedure Code and are therefore on the same footing as other domestic tribunals. So also Courts in British India are domestic tribunals within the meaning of the Berar laws. The term " foreign Court " is defined in S. 2 (5). It means :

> A Court situate beyond the limits of British India which has no authority in British India and is not established or continued by the Governor-General in Council.

Here again the conjunction is "and" and not "or". Moreover, Berar Courts are established by the Governor-General in Council and they are not wholly devoid of authority in British India for, as will be shown later, their decrees can be executed there.

It is well known that Berar used to be administered (before the Government of India Act, 1935 which does not apply to this case; but more of that later) under the Indian (Foreign Jurisdiction) Order in Council of 1902: see 26 N L R 326[7] at pp. 328 and 329. Under that order His Majesty acting under the terms of a treaty with His Exalted Highness the Nizam delegated the right to administer the territories of Berar to the Governor-General in Council, and also the right to set up and continue Courts and other tribunals there. The Court of the Additional District Judge at Yeotmal was one of the Courts so established. Therefore it is not a foreign Court within the meaning of this definition. It is true their Lordships of the Privy Council appear to have decided otherwise in respect of a Secunderabad Cantonment Court in 56 Mad 405[8] at

p. 410. But their Lordships did not refer to the definition in S. 2 (5) nor was it cited before them, so we can only conclude that on the facts before their Lordships it did not apply. Their Lordships refer to a Calcutta decision 21 Cal 177[9] at p. 179 and state that it is not suggested that the position of Secunderabad has altered from that stated by the Foreign Office to the Court.

All that we can gather from that decision is that the Secunderabad Cantonment "is still the property of the Nizam and is not considered to be within British India", also that "the British Government exercises in the Cantonments of Secunderabad powers similar to those which it exercises in British India" but that they are exercised under Ss. 4 and 5, Foreign Jurisdiction and Extradition Act of 1879 which sections regulate the exercise of any power or jurisdiction which the Governor-General in Council has within any country or place beyond the limits of British India.

The Foreign Jurisdiction and Extradition Act of 1879 is "an Act to provide for the trial of offences committed in places beyond British India and for the Extradition of criminals". It has nothing to do with the establishment and constitution of Courts of Justice. The question before the Calcutta High Court was whether security for costs ought to be demanded from the plaintiff under S. 380, Civil P. C., 1882. That turned upon whether the plaintiff resided outside British India and whether he had property within British India independently of the property claimed in the suit. The plaintiff contended that he resided within the British Cantonment of Secunderabad and so was resident in British India. Therefore the question narrowed down to this: was the British Cantonment of Secunderabad a part of British India? It was held that it was not. We cannot gather either from this, or from their Lordships' decision, that the Court in question before their Lordships had been established by the Governor-General in Council, and that of course is the deciding factor here.

Sections 43 and 44, Civil P. C., 1908 draw a distinction between Courts in the territories of any foreign prince or State which have been "established or continued by the authority of the Governor-General in Council" and those which have not. In the former case British Indian decrees are executable as in a domestic tribunal, while in the latter, though they are to be executed in the same way when the necessary notification has been issued, the executing Court remains a "foreign Court" and does not become a domestic one : see 15 Bom 216[10] at p. 219. Therefore unless it can be shown that the Court in question before their Lordships was so established or continued (and that has not been done) we are unable to regard their Lordships' decision as relevant to the question at issue here. It follows that, in our opinion, from the point of view of British Indian Courts, the Court of the District Judge at Yeotmal is not a "foreign Court" within the meaning of the Civil Procedure Code and so it must be regarded as a domestic tribunal for all present purposes. This is also evident from the fact that the Berar laws have been framed so as to make these provisions reciprocal.

The Civil Procedure Code, 1908, with certain modifications, was applied to Berar on 3rd November 1913 by Notification No. 3510-I. B. of that date. It may, therefore, for the sake of convenience, be regarded as the Berar Civil Procedure Code though that is not what it is officially called. The modifications are given in item No. 92 of Sch. 1 to the notification. The ones relevant to the present case relate to S. 29 (proviso) and Ss. 43 and 78 (b). The first enables summonses issued in British India to be served in Berar and vice versa. The second enables decrees to be executed in either place (and this is important in the present case) and the third commissions. The result is that Courts in British India and in Berar are not "foreign Courts" vis-a-vis each other but are domestic tribunals for all these purposes. That being so, S. 21 must, in our opinion, apply as between British India and Berar just as much as it does between one part of British India and another.

It also means that we dissent from the view taken in 4 N L R 61[11] because although that decision was under the old Code of Civil Procedure (that of 1882) the definition of "foreign Court" given in S. 2 of that Code was in all essential respects the same as the present one, and the Courts then in existence in Berar were established by the same authority.

Turning now to the second reason given by the Nagpur Full Bench there is a conflict on this point between Calcutta and Allahabad on the one hand and Madras and Lahore on the other. But before dealing with these cases, we will refer to two decisions of the Privy Council which, in our view, enunciate the principle underlying this question. The first is 9 ALL 191[12] at p. 203. It states that > when the Judge has no inherent jurisdiction over the subject-matter of a suit, the parties cannot by their mutual consent, convert it into a proper judicial process . . . . . But . . . when, in a cause which the Judge is competent to try, the parties without objection join issue and go to trial upon the merits, the defendant cannot subsequently dispute his jurisdiction upon the grounds that there were irregularities in the initial procedure which, if objected to at the time, would have led to the dismissal of the suit.

The second is 11 Mad 26[13] at p. 36. Their Lordships quote the above passage and state:

> In the present case there was an inherent incompetency in the High Court to deal with the question brought before it, and no consent could have conferred upon the High Court that jurisdiction which it never possessed.

It is clear that their Lordships draw a sharp distinction betweeen inherent incompetency and a mere irregularity in procedure. The former can never be cured. The latter may be. Which then does the wrong place of suing amount to? When the Legislature itself states that the defect is curable, (and it indicates this not only in S. 21 but also in S. 18), we are unable to see how it can be placed on the same footing as an inherent incompetency which, as their Lordships point out, can never be cured. Support is lent to this from the language of their Lordships in still another case, 42 Mad 813[14] at p. 820:

> This is not an objection to the place of suing; it is an objection going to the nullity of the order on the ground of want of jurisdiction.

This also suggests that the two are not the same thing. It will be seen from the decisions of the Privy Council on this point that an objection to a want of inherent jurisdiction can be taken at any stage and at any time, even in the course of the same suit. It must follow that when S. 21 states that an objection to territorial jurisdiction cannot be taken at the appellate or revisional stage unless the conditions mentioned there are fulfilled, that it is not an inherent lack of capacity.

We agree with the decisions in 43 Mad 675[15] and 49 Mad 746[16] at pp. 749 and 750 that to sue in the wrong place is a mere irregularity which is curable for all purposes and not merely for the purposes of appeal and revision in the same suit.

In the former case, which was a decision of a Full Bench, Wallis C. J., pointed out at p. 686 that:

> The ordinary way of questioning a decree passed without jurisdiction is on appeal or in revision, and if this is forbidden, a Court of first instance cannot in execution do that which the appellate or revisional Court is precluded from doing.

The reasoning would apply, in our opinion with even more force to the powers of a Court in a separate suit. But however that may be, it certainly applies, we think, to execution proceedings in the course of the same suit. It was, we think, unnecessary to carry the matter further in the Code, because once the principle is laid down that the defect is a curable irregularity and that it cannot be attacked even in appeal or revision all that is necessary to be said has been said. It shows that the matter is final. It is, we feel, impossible to regard the Legislature as having enacted that while the proceedings in the suit are good so far as that suit is concerned, and can be continued right up to the appellate stage, nevertheless a party who has taken the chance of obtaining a decision in his favour can turn round and challenge it either in a separate suit or in execution proceedings when he loses. There would clearly be no point in saying that a suit is good and can be continued right up to the appellate stage if the decree can be challenged as a nullity for want of jurisdiction at the execution stage. If the proceedings are good throughout all its stages, so far as that suit is concerned, they must, we think, be good for all purposes.

The principle is much wider than S. 21. It is also to be found in S. 531, Criminal P. C., and was so applied in 9 Rang 338.[17] There, a conviction of the Mandalay Courts was upheld even though they had no territorial jurisdiction over offences committed in the Shan States to which the Code of Criminal Procedure applied. The problem was much the same as here and was solved in the same way.

Even the Allahabad High Court which later took a different view, indicated in 52 ALL 947[18] at p. 949 that the principle underlying S. 21 might be applied to cases where the section itself was not expressly applicable, and we find the Bombay High Court applying it in 2 Bom H C R 374[19] at p. 375 long before it found legislative enactment in a Code. We think the position has been correctly stated by Phillips J., in 47 M L J 448[20] at p. 459 which was quoted with approval in 49 Mad 746[16] at p. 760.

> The principle underlying the section is that waiver of territorial jurisdiction is recognized by law, whereas it has been consistently held that other forms of jurisdiction cannot be waived by consent of parties.

The only modification we would make is that this must be read subject to S. 11, Suits Valuation Act, as well. Phillips J., explains at p. 451 that:

> The jurisdiction of a Court consists in its power to entertain suits. . . . . and when once a suit has been entertained the remaining proceedings taken therein are not taken by reason of any particular territorial jurisdiction but in the exercise of powers vested in the Court to try suits generally and consequently the only time at which the territorial jurisdiction comes into operation is at the time of the filing of the suit.

If then the Legislature says, as it does in S. 21, that the jurisdiction is valid throughout all the subsequent stages of that suit unless objection is taken immediately it must mean that it was valid when the suit was entertained and once that is accepted, then it follows that it is valid for all purposes thereafter. As regards decisions which take the other view, the Calcutta Full Bench in 53 Cal 166[21] did not consider either S. 21, Civil P. C., or S. 11, Suits Valuation Act, and although we do not dissent from the actual decision we consider that the law has been laid down too broadly there. In that case a British Indian Court purported to deal with property situate in the Sonthal Perganas, and the executing Court declined to execute the decree, and we think rightly, for, as their Lordships of the Privy Council point out in 42 Cal 116[22] at p. 143, the jurisdiction of all Courts regarding land in the Perganas was taken away and was conferred exclusively upon particular Courts in the Sonthal Perganas by a special regulation. These Courts were therefore constituted special Courts with exclusive jurisdiction, and of course S. 21 cannot be invoked to confer jurisdiction where the Legislature states in express and explicit terms that there shall be none. To use again the language of their Lordships in a case we have just cited:

> This is not an objection to the place of suing; it is an objection going to the nullity of the order on the ground of want of jurisdiction.

The actual decision of the Calcutta Full Bench was therefore, in our view, right but in giving their decision they have, we think, stated the law too broadly and have not considered either S. 21 or S. 11.

The decision of their Lordships in 42 Mad 813[14] has been considered in 43 Mad 675[15] at p. 686 and in 49 Mad 746[16] at p. 752. We agree with the learned Judges of the Madras High Court that all that their Lordships decided there was that when the Code of Civil Procedure does not apply to any particular territory, then the principles of S. 21 cannot be invoked. Of course the British Indian Code does not apply as such in Berar, nor what we may term the Berar Code in the Central Provinces. But both Codes are identical except for the necessary changes which substitute the word "Berar" for "British India" and which make the provisions for execution and the like reciprocal; except for that the British Indian Code has been applied mutatis mutandis in Berar. Therefore since the laws of both places contain identical provisions in this respect and since they consider the Courts of each other domestic tribunals this decision of their Lordships is clearly distinguishable.

As regards the other two decisions upon which the Nagpur Full Bench relied, namely 53 ALL 560[23] and 27 C W N 542,[24] both proceed upon the assumption that territorial considerations are vital to jurisdiction, that is to say, that they affect the inherent jurisdiction of a Court and that S. 21 is an exception to this rule and consequently must be construed strictly. As we have already pointed out we are with respect unable to agree with the initial assumption upon which the subsequent reasoning is founded.

In our view there can be no validation of an inherent lack of jurisdiction in any circumstances and the very fact that the Legislature treats venue either as a matter of procedure, or as something analogous to it, shows that the two are not the same.

There is also another point with which we are unable, again with due deference, to agree with the Nagpur Full Bench. Even if it be assumed that we are wrong, because of their Lordships' decision in 56 Mad 405,[8] in thinking that the Berar and British Indian Courts are not "foreign Courts" vis-a-vis each, even then, in our opinion, the question of submission to jurisdiction remains. The Full Bench considers that there can be no submission, or rather that the question of submission is immaterial the moment it is shown that the foreign tribunal acted without jurisdiction. Up to a point of course this is correct, but, in our opinion, only up to a point. Stated in that broad form the rule is we think misleading.

Here again the general rule is well-known and forms one of the rules of private international law. It has been incorporated into the Civil Procedure Code in Ss. 13 and 14. The usual method of enforcing a foreign decree (and this would apply to Berar as well because of the "Berar Civil Procedure Code") is by suing upon the foreign judgment in the domestic Courts within six years : see Mulla's Civil Procedure Code, Edn. 10, p. 92 and Art. 117, Limitation Act. When that is done a decree follows as a matter of course, unless the exceptions specified in S. 13 apply, because under the body of that section the foreign judgment is conclusive, that is to say, it operates as res-judicata though it is not usual to call it by that name. One of the exceptions is when the judgment sued upon "has not been pronounced by a Court of competent jurisdiction," and here the rule about submission to jurisdiction comes into play. The question whether the foreign Court had or had not jurisdiction is of course to be determined in accordance with the law of the country in which the foreign Court pronouncing the judgment is situate, that is to say, it is a matter of foreign law. Now all matters of foreign law are questions of fact in the domestic tribunal and not ones of law. They have to be established just as any other fact by the production of expert witnesses (S. 45, Evidence Act, and its replica in Berar), foreign law books (S. 38) and the like. But when it appears that the defendant had submitted to jurisdiction and invited a verdict the domestic tribunals apply the rule of estoppel and prevent the defendant from pleading that the foreign Court had no jurisdiction. Section 14, Civil P.C., states that:

> The Court shall presume, upon the production of any document purporting to be a certified copy of a foreign judgment that such judgment was pronounced by a Court of competent jurisdiction, unless the contrary appears on the record; but such presumption may be displaced by proving want of jurisdiction.

This proof the domestic Courts shut out when they find that there has been a submission to jurisdiction, and so the presumption remains. We observe that 22 Cal 222[25] is distinguishable because, as their Lordships emphasise at p. 237, the defendant in that suit never appeared in the foreign Court and did not otherwise submit himself to its jurisdiction. It is important to bear in mind that the question about the jurisdiction of a foreign Court is a question of fact and not one of law and consequently there is room for applying the rule of estoppel; the usual difficulties about estoppel against a statute or a rule of law do not arise. It is this important distinction between the jurisdiction of a foreign and a domestic tribunal that the Nagpur Full Bench has, we feel, failed to observe.

That, as we have said, is the usual method of enforcing a foreign decree according to private international law. But the Code of Civil Procedure makes two exceptions. One is given in S. 43 which, as we have pointed out above, makes decrees of the British Indian Courts executable in Courts "established or continued by the authority of the Governor-General in Council in territories of any foreign prince or State," in the same way as in the domestic tribunals because, as we have also shown, they are, according to the definition in S. 2 (5), domestic tribunals, and their judgments are, under S. 2 (6), domestic decisions.

The second exception is contained in S. 44 and it applies to foreign Courts situate in the territories of any Native Prince or State in alliance with His Majesty which have not been established or continued by the authority of the Governor-General in Council but which have been notified in the Gazette in India. These Courts remain "foreign Courts", but their decrees are executable in the Courts of British India "as if they had been passed" by those Courts. Here the notification fulfills the functions of S. 2 (5) though in a different manner and with a slightly different effect. The Berar replica of the Civil Procedure Code contains corresponding provisions making these previleges reciprocal. It is clear then that it is not necessary in the case of these Courts to sue again upon the judgment. All that is necessary is to ask for execution in the ordinary way, but it is equally clear that if S. 21 does not apply, and if all the principles applicable to foreign Courts do, then among them must be placed the rules relating to submission to jurisdiction. It is impossible to claim for these Courts all the privileges of a foreign Court and yet not to subject them to what we might term its disabilities.

25. ('95) 22 Cal 222 : 21 I A 171 : 6 Sar 503 : (1894) A C 670 (PC), Gurdyal Singh v. Raja of Faridkot.

There is also another point. The incompetency contemplated by S. 13 is an inherent incompetency of a kind which cannot be waived, therefore if lack of territorial jurisdiction is not an incompetency of that kind, and that is our view, then the rule about submission must apply in any event. The rule itself is so well-known that we need not cite authorities in support of it. Even the Nagpur Full Bench, which we feel has come to a wrong conclusion on these points, accepts the rule though it limits its operation. We turn now to another matter. We have so far treated the question on general lines, but cases relating to immovable property, such as mortgage cases, are governed by rules which go even further along the lines we have indicated when part of the property is situate in one jurisdiction and part in another. These rules have not been considered by the Nagpur Full Bench because of course the situation did not arise there. They are to be found in S. 17, Civil P. C.:

> Where a suit is to obtain relief respecting ..... immovable property situated within the jurisdiction of different Courts, the suit may be instituted in any Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction any portion of the property is situate.

Of course we realise that an enactment which turns a Court in Berar into a domestic tribunal does not thereby make Berar British territory, nor does it invest Courts in British India with jurisdiction over property in Berar by reason of that alone. But when the definition of "foreign Court" in S. 2 (5) is read along with S. 17, then we think the same result follows as when the property is situate wholly within British India.

Section 16 (c) states that mortgage suits shall be instituted "in the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the property is situate," and the explanation states that "in this section 'property' means property situate in British India." Section 17 brings in an exception and it is important to note that it does not give the same restricted definition to the word 'property': that is expressly restricted to S. 16 alone. The difference is, in our opinion, deliberate and we think it was made to introduce a well-known principle of private international law. Therefore, under S. 17 the British Indian Courts are, in our opinion, empowered to entertain suits relating to immovable property, including of course mortgage suits, situate in Berar, provided some portion of the property mortgaged is situate within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Courts in which the suit is instituted.

From that we turn to the fact that British Indian Courts are domestic tribunals in Berar because of the definition in the "Berar Civil Procedure Code" and that therefore their decrees are executable in Berar in the same way as a Berar decree. But here again, even if we are wrong in thinking that the Berar Courts are not "foreign Courts" the result is the same because the rule embodied in S. 17 is, as we have said, only a particular application of a wider principle which extends to foreign territory as well. The rule, in so far as it relates to property wholly situate in British India, is referred to in 49 Mad 716[16] where a long series of decisions of the Calcutta High Court are given from p. 753 onwards. We need not requote them here. It is enough to point out that they regard mortgage suits as an exception to the general rule relating to territorial jurisdiction and hold that special rules apply in such cases. This special rule was applied by a Division Bench of this Court to which one of us (Stone C. J.) was a party in F. A. No. 47-B of 1935[26] in a case where part of the property was situate in British India and part in Berar. It is to be found in Dicey's Conflict of Laws, Edn. 5, p. 207 in the exception to R. 53.

There is one more matter upon which we shall touch. It was argued that in mortgage cases, whatever the form of the mortgage and whether foreclosure or sale was sought, the Court acts in personam and so this decree is executable in Berar: 51 Bom 516[27] was relied upon. That decision was not followed in 31 N L R Sup 43.[2] The Bombay decision was one which was very fully considered by seven Judges and covers a wide range. Before disagreeing with the conclusions of such a Bench we should feel it our duty very carefully to consider the law in all its aspects. On the view we take, and bearing in mind that we are at present referring the questions we feel are in doubt, it is not necessary to consider whether the kind of mortgage suit then under consideration is or is not a suit in personam: 51 Bom 516[27] depends, on this point, very largely on the fact that the suit was for sale and not foreclosure. This is a suit for foreclosure. 51 Bom 516[27] relies largely on equity cases in England whereas here one is concerned with rights which exist in law and not only in equity. We are content so far as this branch of the case is concerned to follow 31 N L R Sup 43.[2] The result then is that, in our opinion, the decree in the present suit is executable in Yeotmal as it stands. But we cannot give effect to this view if the Full Bench decision in 31 N L R Sup 43[2] is right. But since, with the utmost respect, we consider that it has been wrongly decided so far as the matter raised in the following questions is concerned, we refer those questions to another Full Bench for further and fuller consideration. They are :

"(1) Are Courts in Berar which have been established or continued by the authority of the Governor-General in Council "foreign Courts" within the meaning of the Code of Civil Procedure in British India and vice versa? (2) Can the rule limiting the territorial jurisdiction of Courts to property situate within their territorial limits be validly waived by submission? (3) Is the rule embodied in S. 21, Civil P. C., limited to appeals and revisions in the same suit or does it also apply to separate suits and to execution proceedings in the same suit as well? (4) Can a mortgage decree obtained in British India in respect of property situate in Berar as well as within the local limits of the Court in which the suit is instituted be executed in Berar as it stands without the necessity of suing again upon the British Indian judgment?"

We observe in conclusion that the difficulty about Berar being foreign territory will not arise hereafter because of S. 47, Government of India Act, 1935 but that will not prevent the present impasse from arising again because, according to the decision of the Full Bench, the same result follows when the properties are situate in different jurisdictions in different parts of British India. As this is likely to have serious consequences which will affect a large number of important cases, we feel that the matter should be reconsidered.

Stone C. J. — Having already been a party to the order of reference and having perused the judgments of my colleagues it is not necessary for me to quote authorities for the following propositions which, in my opinion, can hardly be doubted :

(1) A defect in jurisdiction may be inherent or procedural. The former cannot be waived, the latter can. (2) If a defect in jurisdiction is procedural and is waived, whether by absence of objection or otherwise, up to judgment an objection cannot be taken in execution. (3) Even where objection to a decree lies on the ground of its being a nullity there is a difference between suing to set the decree aside and seeking to go behind the decree without suing, e. g., in execution. (4) A Court can, by the law of a country, be directed to be deemed, by the Courts of that country to be a Court of that country though not situate in that country. (5) An example of (4) is, and at all times has been, the High Court of Judicature, Nagpur. (6) Berar is foreign territory viewed from the angle of a British Indian Court and the Central Provinces is foreign territory viewed from the angle of a Berar Court. This proposition relates to the period in question and is not concerned with the position that arises under the Government of India Act, 1935.

I now pass to propositions about which I entertain more doubt. Before coming to these I consider it necessary to say that if ever a point called for breadth of treatment it is this. It is in the highest degree desirable, so far as the Central Provinces and Berar are concerned, to make the Courts sitting in both areas as near alike as may be. For a long while now these areas have been administered together. The same Chief Justice has judicial administrative control over both. The District and Subordinate Judges are freely moved from this area to that. The Courts are organized in the same way and are equal in jurisdiction and are controlled by the same appellate authority and are now, by the Government of India Act, put formally on a parity. For a long while so far as execution is concerned, these Courts vis-a-vis each other have not been foreign Courts. The execution of part of the decree we are considering was transferred to a Berar Court and the objection was taken before a Berar Court and was to the effect that a Court situate in the Central Provinces had no jurisdiction to adjudicate in respect of immovable property situate in Berar. That objection was based on the view that such Court was a foreign Court. I proceed with the propositions: (a) The Civil Procedure Code as applied to Berar makes British Indian Courts not foreign Courts and therefore domestic Courts and therefore in any argument addressed to a Berar Court a Berar Court. (b) The objection taken would fail had the lack of jurisdiction been territorial, i. e., had the Court been a domestic Court dealing with a subject-matter (land) outside its jurisdiction. (c) Granted that the Court situate in the Central Provinces must be regarded by a Berar Court as a Berar Court, there is no difference between the objection taken here and an objection that, say, a Court in Akola District (Berar) had entertained a suit partly in respect of land situate in Amraoti Distrjct (Berar) at the place where the execution Court is situate. Both objections would fail for the same reason viz., that the defect in jurisdiction was territorial merely.

It has been suggested that there is a wide difference between the two cases in that the British Indian Legislature has not and cannot give jurisdiction to British Indian Courts to adjudicate on land situate in foreign countries, i. e., in Berar, and the Governor-General in Council has not given and cannot give jurisdiction to a Berar Court to sit in British India and has not turned and cannot turn a British Indian Court into a Berar Court. In my opinion, however, the Governor-General in Council legislating for Berar can make and has made it necessary for every Berar Court to treat any British Indian Court as a domestic Court, i. e., as a Berar Court. The result, so far as this case is concerned, is that the rules relating to foreign judgments do not apply. My answers to the questions put are accordingly : (1) No. (2) Yes. (3) First part, No. (4) Yes.

Grille J. — I have had the advantage of seeing all the opinions expressed in this appeal and I find myself in respectful and decided agreement with the conclusions reached by the majority. The vital point for determination is whether Courts in Berar are foreign Courts in respect of Courts in the Central Provinces. If the conclusion is in the affirmative, the answers to the other questions fall into line.

In the application of the Code of Civil Procedure to Berar the modification appears inter alia, that in S. 2, sub-s. (5) which contains the definition of a foreign Court, the words "British India" shall be read as referring to British India and Berar. That definition then reads: "'foreign Court' means a Court situate beyond the limits of British India and Berar which has no authority in British India and Berar and is not established or continued by the Governor-General in Council." Now, the object of the amendment was undoubtedly to place civil Courts in Berar in the same relationship to foreign Courts as civil Courts in British India bore to foreign Courts. The particular wording of the alteration of the Code of Civil Procedure in its existing form has, however, had other effects, although possibly not intentional. The effect which is pertinent to the case under consideration is this that for the purposes of Berar a civil Court in British India is not a foreign Court and must therefore be a domestic Court. I do not consider any other interpretation of the definition possible, and consequently an executing Court in Yeotmal refusing to execute the decree of a Court in Wardha is refusing to execute the decree of a domestic tribunal and is wrong in refusing to do so under the terms of the Civil Procedure Code as applied to Berar. The consideration of the unamended Code of Civil Procedure as applied to British India does not in fact arise. Accordingly I would answer the first question in the negative and the second and fourth questions in the affirmative. On the third question which lies somewhat apart from the main question, I agree with the conclusion reached by my Lord the Chief Justice and Bose J.

Niyogi J. — The undermentioned questions have been referred to the Full Bench for consideration :

(1) Are Courts in Berar which have been established or continued by the authority of the Governor-General in Council "foreign Courts" within the meaning of the Code of Civil Procedure in British India and vice versa ? (2) Can the rule limiting the territorial jurisdiction of Courts to property situate within their territorial limits be validly waived by submission ? (3) Is the rule embodied in S. 21, Civil P. C., limited to appeals and revisions in the same suit or does it also apply to separte suits and to execution proceedings in the same suit as well ? (4) Can a mortgage decree obtained in British India in respect of property situate in Berar as well as within the local limits of the Courts in which the suit is instituted be executed in Berar as it stands without the necessity of suing again upon the British Indian judgment ?

The facts of the case out of which these questions arise may be briefly stated. In civil suit No. 51 of 1930 a preliminary decree for foreclosure was passed in the Court of the second Additional District Judge, War-dha, affecting property situate partly in Wardha and partly in Yeotmal District. The Yeotmal District is in Berar. That decree was made final on 12th October 1933 and on a certificate of non-satisfaction issued by the Wardha Court to the Yeotmal Court the decree-holder on 18th December 1935 applied for execution of the final decree obtained by him. He was countered by the objection that the Wardha Court had no jurisdiction to pass any foreclosure decree affecting property in Berar and that it was null and void. The discussion which follows must be understood as having reference to Berar as it stood before the Government of India Act of 1935 came into force. The first question is whether the Court in Berar is a foreign Court vis-a-vis the Court in British India and vice versa. The first part of the question is answered by the express terms of the definition of 'foreign Court' as contained in S. 2 (5), Civil P. C., as it applies to the Central Provinces. It says: "'Foreign Court' means a Court situate beyond the limits of British India which has no authority in British India and is not established or continued by the Governor-General in Council." The Indian (Foreign Jurisdiction) Order in Council, 1902 (vide Berar Code, Part III, p. 13) defines in para. 2 the limits of the order in these terms: "The limits of this order are the territories of India outside British India etc." Berar is thus declared to be one of the territories of India outside British India, but unless it has authority in British India it cannot be taken out of the ambit of the definition of "Foreign Court." Notification No. 3510-I-B dated 3rd November 1913 (vide Berar Code, Part IV, p. 19) applies to Berar certain British Indian enactments including British Indian Codes with certain modifications. Item 2 against entry No. 92 (page 29 Berar Code) in the schedule to that notification modifies S. 2 (5), Civil P. C., by the direction that the words "British India" shall be read as referring to British India and Berar. It must be borne in mind that this modification is valid only within the limits of Berar.

Section 2 (5), Civil P. C., will as a result of this modification be read in Berar (not in Central Provinces) as follows: "'Foreign Court' means a Court situate beyond the limits of British India and Berar which has no authority in British India and Berar and is not established or continued by the Governor-General in Council." This altered definition only means that those Courts which are foreign Courts vis-a-vis the Court in British India are also foreign Courts vis-a-vis the Courts in Berar and if rightly construed so far from abolishing the distinction between the Courts in British India and Courts in Berar goes to emphasise it. It does not purport to make a British Indian Court a Berar Court or vice versa, nor would the Governor-General in Council acting in his executive capacity have the power to amend the definition of the Civil Procedure Code so as to affect the British Indian Courts. The definition of the foreign Court as amended in its application to Berar can no more be regarded as seeking to extend the jurisdiction of the Berar Courts to Central Provinces than it seeks to extend that of the British Indian Court to Berar. Not only are the British Courts in Berar kept distinct from those of Central Provinces, but also the High Court for Berar from the High Court of judicature at Nagpur: vide Notification No. 41 dated Nagpur 20th January 1936 amending Part II of the Indian Foreign Jurisdiction Order in Council, 1902, (Berar Code p. 14). Were the Berar Courts British Indian Courts, S. 39, Civil P. C., would automatically apply to them and there would be no necessity to take recourse to S. 45, Civil P. C., in the matter of the decree for execution.

Section 45, Civil P. C., empowers a Court to send a decree for execution to another Court established by the authority of the Governor-General in Council in the territories of any foreign Prince or State to which the Governor-General in Council had declared by notification in the gazette of India this section to apply. The decrees of the Berar Courts would not be executable in British India but for the modification of S. 45, Civil P. C., as applied to Berar (Berar Code p. 29) which inserts the words "situate in British India" or after the words "any Court" in that section. In 26 N L R 326[1] their Lordships of the Privy Council pointed out that the Governor-General in Council administers the Assigned Districts of Berar under a delegated authority from the Crown and is empowered to legislate in respect of the territory of Berar. When he exercises that power and either makes any legislation for Berar or extends the enactments in force in British India, he thereby affects rights of persons within the territory of Berar, but nothing that he does in that capacity can be valid to affect the British Indian territory. The amended definition of S. 2 (5), Civil P. C., as applied to Berar, can in no way enlarge the authority of the British Indian Courts; nor does it purport to extend the authority of the Berar Court to British India.

It must be observed that the Courts in Berar are not Courts which are "established or continued by the Governor-General in Council (S. 2 (5), Civil P. C.,) but are Courts established or continued by the authority of the Governor-General in Council in the territories of the foreign Prince of State" (Ss. 43 and 45, Civil P. C.). The Court of Political Agent was held to fall into the latter category of Courts: 38 Cal 859.[28] That Berar Courts also fall into the same category is clear from the amended wording of Ss. 43 and 45 as applied to Berar: vide p. 29, Berar Code. The Governor-General in Council by virtue of his appointment may have political authority over the Indian States but he does not enjoy any authority over the internal administration of the States. The paramountcy of the Crown does not impair the internal sovereignty enjoyed by the Ruling Prince in his own territory: see L R 1912 P 92[29] at p. 95. His Exalted Highness the Nizam of Hyderabad has transferred the right to administer the territory of Berar to the Crown and the Crown has delegated its prerogative authority to the Governor-General by the Indian (Foreign Jurisdiction) Order in Council, 1902. Upto and under the Government of India Act of 1919, the Governor-General in Council was the authority through whom the Crown exercised its authority in the Indian States. Now by the Government of India Act, 1935 his two capacities are separated and clearly defined: vide Ss. 2 and 3, Government of India Act, 1935. It makes clear that the Governor-General acts as Crown representative in the Indian States. The expression Crown representative is actually used in the amended S. 43 as applied to Berar: see p. 29, Berar Code. The Berar Courts have the status of the Courts in Ceylon which is a Crown colony and they have been held to be foreign Courts: 32 Mad 469.[30] The Berar Courts are situated in foreign territory and are not established or continued by the Governor-General in Council. The question is whether they have authority in British India. They have no authority in British India because the explanation appended to S. 16, Civil P. C., read with proviso 1 to para. 1 of the notification No. 3510-I-B, dated 3rd November 1913 (inserted by Amendment No. 60 dated 7th August 1937, vide p. 19 of the Berar Code) makes it clear that all references to British India occurring in the enactment applied to Berar should be read as referring to Berar. Section 1, Civil P. C., which lays down the limits of the operation of that Code and the explanation appended to S. 16, Civil P. C., similarly limits the inherent authority of the British Indian Courts.

It is true that the decrees passed in Berar are executable in British India and vice versa, but that does not imply any authority of one Court in the local limits of the jurisdiction of the other Court. Under S. 44, Civil P. C., decrees passed by Courts situate in the territories of any Native Prince or State are executable in British India. That cannot obviously mean that those Courts have authority in British India. A British Indian Court is not bound to execute a decree of a foreign Court: 39 Mad 24.[31] It can refuse to execute its decree on the ground specified in Ss. 13 and 4, Civil P. C.: 39 Mad 733,[32] A I R 1933 Mad 112[33] and also for other valid grounds: A I R 1925 Mad 788.[34] Sections 43, 44 and 45, Civil P. C., only embody a rule of private international law founded on the comity of States. In 56 Mad 405[8] their Lordships of the Privy Council held that an order passed by the District Court at Secunderabad to which the Provincial Insolvency Act of 1907 was made applicable by the Governor-General in Council adjudicating persons insolvents was an order of a foreign Court for the reason that Secunderabad was a part of the Hyderabad State and the property of His Exalted Highness, the Nizam. Their Lordships observed that the administration of justice according to British enactments by the District Court established in Secunderabad did not render the orders of that Court anything but the orders of a foreign Court in relation to the Courts at British India. On the principle so stated by their Lordships of the Privy Council, it is evident that the Berar Courts cannot acquire the status of the British Indian Courts for the simple reason that certain enactments in force in Berar are made applicable to that territory.

The modification of the definition of foreign Court contained in S. 2 (5), Civil P. C., in its application to Berar does not in any way affect the principle laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council. Dicey in his Conflict of Laws at page 54, Edn. 5, says that the word "foreign" means simply not English and foreign country means any country except England and applies as much to Scotland, Northern Ireland, New Zealand, etc., as to France or Italy. In 26 N L R 326,[7] their Lordships of the Privy Council defined foreign country as a country or place outside His Majesty's dominons. The territory of Berar though administered by the Governor-General in Council on behalf of His Majesty pursuant to a treaty with His Exalted Highness the Nizam does not become a part of British India. It remains a foreign territory. The Berar Courts are indeed British Courts but not British Indian Courts. As such they are foreign Courts.

For the foregoing reasons it is evident that the modification of the terms of S. 2 (5), Civil P. C., does not result in assimilating the Berar Courts to British Indian Courts so as to entitle them to be treated as domestic Courts. Similarly, the British Indian Courts are foreign Courts in Berar as they have no inherent authority in Berar. In this connexion I may refer to the relevant provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, the agreement concluded between His Majesty and His Exalted Highness the Nizam on 26th October 1936 and the amendments made on 7th August 1937 of the notification dated 3rd November 1913 issued by the Governor-General in Council under the Indian Foreign Jurisdiction Order in Council, 1902, which, in my opinion, tend to confirm the conclusion to which I have reached. Section 47 (1) (a) and (b), Government of India Act, 1935, now incorporates Berar into British India. It runs as follows :

> (a) Berar and the Central Provinces shall, notwithstanding the continuance of the sovereignty of His Exalted Highness be deemed to be one Governor's Province by the name of the Central Provinces and Berar.
> (b) Any reference in this Act or in any other Act to British India shall be construed as a reference to British India and Berar . . . . .

It is pertinent to observe that this extended definition of British India is intended to be in force only during the currency of the agreement between His Majesty and His Exalted Highness the Nizam as is clear from the words "while any such agreement is in force" which precede clauses (a) and (b) and sub-s. (2) which follows them. That sub-section is indeed full of significance for the present discussion. It says :

> If no such agreement is concluded . . . references in this Act to the Central Provinces and Berar shall be construed as references to the Central Provinces . . . . .

That shows that before the agreement the Courts in Central Provinces were treated as distinct from the Courts in Berar being under two separate administrations, and further that British India did not include Berar. This is made more explicit by S. 3 (7), General Clauses Act, 1897, as substituted by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937. It says :

> British India shall mean as respects the period before the commencement of Part III, Government of India Act, 1935, all territories and places within His Majesty's dominions which were for the time being governed by His Majesty through the Governor-General of India or through any Governor or officer subordinate to the Governor-General of India and as respects any period after that date means all territories for the time being comprised within Governors' Provinces and the Chief Commissioners' Provinces except that a reference to British India in an Indian law passed or made before the commencement of Part III of the Government of India Act, 1935, shall not include a reference to Berar.

This conclusively shows that before 1st April 1937 on which day Part III, Government of India Act, 1935 came into force, Berar was never regarded as a part of British India. It must further be noticed that even after Part III, Government of India Act, came into force a reference to British India in an Indian law passed before 1936 is not to include a reference to Berar notwithstanding that Berar merged in the Governor's Province known as the Central Provinces and Berar by virtue of S. 47 (1) (a), Government of India Act, 1935, read with Art. 3 of the agreement between His Majesty and His Exalted Highness the Nizam.

I looked round to find some such means of overcoming the difficulty felt by me as would enable me to apply the extended definition of British India contained in S. 47 (1) (b), Government of India Act, 1935, and incorporated as proviso 1 to para. 1 of the Governor-General's notification of 1913 (Berar Code p. 19) to pending proceedings but that course also is barred by para. 2 of that notification which runs as follows :

The notifications of the Government of India specified in Sch. 2 hereto annexed are superseded to the extent noted against each:

Provided that all civil and criminal proceedings pending at the date of this notification shall be carried on as if this notification had not been issued but that save as aforesaid, all proceedings commenced .... things done under any of the enactments specified in the notification hereby suspended in Berar shall be as far as may be, deemed to have been respectively commended.... and done under the corresponding enactment specified in this notification.

The next question is whether the rule limiting the territorial jurisdiction of the Court to property situate within the territorial limits can be validly waived by submission. The question seems to assume that the Courts contemplated there have inherent jurisdiction in respect of property situate outside the territorial limits of their jurisdiction. If the Courts contemplated in this question have no authority to adjudicate on a matter relating to such property the judgment of the Court cannot be validated by submission. Jurisdiction means the legal power or authority of hearing and determining the dispute for the purpose of administering justice and the Court of competent jurisdiction means a Court which has a right to adjudicate upon a given matter: vide Dicey p. 391, Edn. 5. The word jurisdiction is ordinarily used in two senses. Jurisdiction over the subject-matter and power to give an effective judgment. If a Court has no jurisdiction respecting the subject-matter of the litigation its judgment however technically correct is not merely voidable but is null and void. It cannot operate as res judicata and is liable to be declared void: see 38 Cal 639[35] at pp. 668 and 669.

In the light of these general considerations it has to be seen whether or not the British Court has jurisdiction to adjudicate in regard to any property situate out of British India. The Courts established in British India have under S. 16, Civil P. C., the power to try any suit for the recovery of immovable property situate in British India. The explanation appended to that section restricts the authority of the Courts in British India to property situate within the limits of British India. This restriction is not for convenience of judicial administration as is the case with local jurisdiction of the Courts, but is fundamental. It circumscribes the inherent authority or power of the Court. Similarly, proviso 1 to para. 1 of Notification No. 3510-I-B, dated 3rd November 1913 issued by the Governor-General in Council (p. 19, Berar Code, 1931) limits the authority of the Berar Court to property situate in Berar, since in the enactments applied to Berar it directs that reference to British India shall be read as referring to Berar. It is, therefore, clear that the British Courts do not possess the inherent authority to adjudicate on a matter relating to property situate in Berar and vice versa. As pointed out in 48 Cal 138,[36] there is a distinction between existence of jurisdiction and exercise of jurisdiction. When the Court has no inherent jurisdiction over the subject-matter of a suit, the parties cannot, by their mutual consent, convert it into a proper judicial process, although in a cause which the Judge is competent to try, the parties may without objection join issue and go to trial upon the merits: see 9 ALL 191[12] at p. 203. In other words, the question is, can the parties by their mutual consent nullify S. 16, Civil P. C., so as to confer jurisdiction on a British Court which the law itself refused to do? The answer must categorically be in the negative.

Under the principles maintained by the British Courts in the province of private international law the word "jurisdiction" means "the right or authority of a Court" and it is not used as meaning "area of territory over which a Court has jurisdiction": vide Dicey, p. 191. In India the area of territory over which any particular Court has jurisdiction is fixed by the local Acts. Sections 15 to 25, Civil P. C., regulate the venue within British India and apply only to those places where the Civil Procedure Code proprio vigore applies. They deal with matters of domestic concern and prescribe rules in matters within their compass and do not apply to a suit on a cause of action which arose wholly outside British territory: see 9 Lah 455.[37] The explanation appended to S. 16, Civil P. C., denies the British Courts jurisdiction in respect of property situate outside British India and to that extent it must be predicated that they have no right or authority to try any suit for the recovery of such property. Even under the rules of private international law submission can give the Court jurisdiction only to the extent of removing objections thereto which are purely personal to the party submitting as, for example, the objection in the case of a defendant that he has not been duly served with a writ, or that service of a writ outside England has been allowed in a case not within the letter or the spirit of O. 11, R. 1: submission cannot give the Court jurisdiction to entertain an action or other proceeding which in itself lies beyond the competence or authority of the Court: Dicey p. 222. Section 17, Civil P. C., is supplementary to S. 16, Civil P. C., and, it applies to properties situate only in British India and not to those outside it, as pointed out by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 42 Mad 813.[14] Their Lordships of the Privy Council in 54 Bom 495[38] made it clear that the words "situate within the jurisdiction of different Courts" in S. 17, Civil P. C., 1908, referred solely to Courts in British India. A Court devoid of inherent jurisdiction over the subject-matter cannot possibly acquire authority over the parties; their consent cannot therefore confer jurisdiction. My answer is that if the Court has inherent jurisdiction the irregularity in the exercise of it will be cured by submission, but if it has no inherent jurisdiction submission cannot validate its judgment.

The next question is whether the rule embodied in S. 21, Civil P. C., is limited to appeals and revisions in the same suit or does it also apply to separate suits and to execution proceedings in the same suit as well? Section 21, Civil P. C., postulates the existence of inherent jurisdiction and precludes objections in appeal or revision as to the place of suing only. That means that it only leaves open to a party to waive irregularity in the exercise of jurisdiction which a Court has, an enquiry into the existence of facts necessary to give jurisdiction such as residence of the defendant or the occurrence of the cause of action within the limits of the Court's jurisdiction. Objections precluded by S. 21, Civil P. C., cannot be raised in execution proceedings of the same suit because the execution proceedings are the continuation of the same suit. An objection on the ground of the absence of the inherent jurisdiction can however be raised for the first time in appeal: vide 20 N L R 33,[39] 42 Mad 813[14] or in second appeal see 47 Bom 843,[40] or in Letters Patent Appeal 54 ALL 573,[41] or in revision, 52 ALL 947,[18] 33 Bom 664,[42] or in an appeal after remand 23 Bom 22,[43] 8 Cal 678,[44] or even in the course of argument before the Privy Council 13 All 300,[45] 42 Cal 116[22] and also in execution proceedings of the same suit 58 Cal 1018,[46] 38 Mad 682[47] and 26 N L R 60.[48]

In so far as the objection relates only to the place of suing as opposed to the absence of inherent jurisdiction of the Court, S. 21, Civil P. C., operates directly to preclude objection to jurisdiction of the Court deciding the suit, either in appeal or revision. That section does not mention a fresh suit or execution proceeding arising out of the same suit. Consequently, there has been a divergence of opinion among the various High Courts in India. The Allahabad High Court in 53 ALL 560[23] held that where a decree has been passed by a Court having no territorial jurisdiction over the matter in controversy, the defendant was entitled to maintain an independent suit for its avoidance. The reason given was that S. 21, Civil P. C., does not provide against the question of jurisdiction being agitated by means of an independent suit and that there is no provision in the Civil Procedure Code which either expressly or by necessary implication deprived the plaintiff of his right of suit. A different view was taken in 37 M L J 349,[49] 47 M L J 448[20] and 11 L L J 306.[50] I find it difficult to persuade myself, with due respect, to accept the Allahabad view. It is pertinent to observe that the question of jurisdiction of a Court deciding a suit can be called in question in another suit under the limitations prescribed by S. 11, Civil P. C., and S. 44, Evidence Act. Both these enactments contemplate "competency to try" a suit. In 9 Cal 439[51] at p. 444 their Lordships of the Privy Council refer to the observations of Sir Barnes Peacock in 8 W R 175[52] which were as follows :

> In order to make the decision of a Court final and conclusive in another Court, it must be a decision of a Court which would have had jurisdiction in the subsequent suit in which the first decision is given as evidence, and, after discussion, conclude that concurrent jurisdiction should be taken to mean concurrent as regards the pecuniary limits as well as regards the subject-matter: see 9 Cal 439.[51] That shows that competency of Court means pecuniary jurisdiction and authority over the subject-matter of the suit but does not imply territorial jurisdiction. In A I R 1925 Mad 1167[53] it was clearly pointed out that competency of Court mentioned in S. 11, Civil P. C., has no reference to territorial jurisdiction. In 37 ALL 1[54] certain claimants of the estate of a deceased person which was situated partly in the Bareilly District (British India) and partly in the State of Rampur sued in the Bareilly Court to recover the portion situated there and obtained a decree. Other claimants filed a similar suit in Rampur State in respect of property situated there. It was held, on a suit by the plaintiffs in the Bareilly Court for a declaration, that the judgment of that Court operated as res judicata in respect of the suit in Rampur and for an injunction restraining further proceedings in the Rampur Court, that neither relief could be granted. Their Lordships observe at p. 4 that if all the property was situated in British India, the decision of the Bareilly Court would operate as res judicata but as the subject-matter of the suit was situate outside British India, the decree of the Bareilly Court could not operate as res judicata. The principle of the decision was that the British Court had no inherent jurisdicton to try a suit affecting rights in property outside British India and consequently the decision of the British Court was not final and conclusive so as to affect that property. In 54 ALL 824[55] it was held that the expression "competent to try and dispose of the same" occurring in S. 24, Civil P. C., has no reference to territorial jurisdiction and it was observed that for purposes of res judicata it is not necessary that the Court which decided the previous suit should have concurrent territorial jurisdiction with the Court in which a fresh suit is filed. It would thus be clear that the competency in S. 11 has no reference to territorial jurisdiction so far as Courts in British India are concerned. The effect of S. 11 is to bar the plea of res judicata if it relates only to the absence of territorial jurisdiction of the previous Court. By necessary implication it must follow that no judgment or decree of any Court is capable of being invalidated on the ground that the Court had no territorial jurisdiction.

The expression "place of suing" simply means venue of trial and has no reference to the competency of the Court in the sense of its general authority to adjudicate on any matter in controversy. Consequently, it must be held that if a defendant fails to raise an objection to the place of suing and suffers a decree to be passed against him he would be precluded from questioning the validity of the decree by an independent suit. It must therefore logically follow that he cannot raise the objection in the execution proceedings arising out the same suit. In 31 N L R Sup 43[2] a different view was expressed. But it was not strictly necessary for the decision of that case in view of the other finding that the Bombay High Court had no inherent jurisdiction and that its decree was a nullity.

As to the fourth and last question, the case reported in 54 Bom 495[38] provides a conclusive answer. The question is whether or not a suit to enforce a mortgage is a suit to recover land. If it is, a Court in British India is, as already shown, incompetent to try the suit and pass a decree affecting land out of British India. In a mortgage for conditional sale, there is no covenant of personal liability as was finally decided in a Full Bench case of the late Court of the Judicial Commissioner in a case reported in 25 N L R 187.[56] As to a simple mortgage, the majority of the Judges in 51 Bom 516[27] took the view that a suit by a mortgagee to enforce his mortgage by sale was not a suit for land. That view however cannot prevail against 54 Bom 495[38] where their Lordships of the Privy Council declared the words "a suit to obtain relief respecting immovable property are wide enough to cover the suit in the present case which included prayers for foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged property" (ibid pp. 501-502). Then their Lordships pointed out that the words in S. 17, Civil P. C., "within the jurisdiction of different Courts" must mean within the jurisdiction of different Courts in British India. In that view they set aside the decree passed by the Satara (British Indian) Court in so far as it affected property situate in the State of Kolhapur (out of British India). A decree passed by a Court in British India ordering sale of mortgaged property situate outside British India is one passed without "authority". The decree is therefore a nullity. It cannot therefore form a legal basis for a suit in any Court out of British India. The mortgagee will perforce have to file a fresh suit to enforce his mortgage and not the judgment obtained by him in a British Court.

The answer to the question is that mortgage decree obtained in British India in respect of property situate in Berar (out of British India) is incapable of being executed in any Court in Berar; nor can a suit be maintained on the basis of the judgment of a Court in British India, which is null and void. The only course left is to institute a fresh suit in the Court in Berar to enforce that mortgage. There is no doubt an anomaly in the administration of justice in such cases as the present but that is inherent in the situation and it appears to me impossible judicially to remedy it, particularly in view of the trend of the legislation referred to above.

Gruer J. — I agree with the conclusions reached by my Lord the Chief Justice and Bose J. The points involved have been exhaustively discussed by them and by Niyogi J., in his dissenting opinion. I desire to say only that, once it is found on a consideration of the definition of "foreign Court" in S. 2 (5), Civil P. C., and for the other reasons set forth that Courts in Berar are not foreign Courts vis-a-vis those in the Central Provinces but are domestic Courts then the answers to the other questions, especially to the last question, would follow more or less as necessary corollaries. My answer to the first question and to the first part of the third question is "no" and that to the second and fourth questions is "yes".

Vivian Bose J. — I adhere with certain modifications to the view I expressed in the referring order and with respect disagree with Niyogi J. I do not intend to repeat what has been said there nor to re-examine the cases dealt with. This opinion is supplementary. In my opinion the position must be viewed exclusively from the point of view of a Berar Court and the fact that there is a Civil Procedure Code for British India must be placed on one side. Here we have a decree from a Court in British India brought for execution to a Court in Berar. The Berar Court has to deal with the matter from the point of view of its own domestic laws and therefore can only look to what has been termed for convenience the "Berar Code of Civil Procedure" in the referring order. The fact that it is identical in terms with the Civil Procedure Code obtaining in British India except for certain modifications does not matter: in fact it is just that which leads to much confusion of thought. The modifications are vital.

What does that Code (the "Berar Code of Civil Procedure") say? The notification which introduces it into Berar states in proviso 1 that except where the context otherwise requires references to British India or the territories subject to a local Government shall be read as referring to Berar. It also states that in S. 2 (5) of the British Indian Code of Civil Procedure, the words "British India" shall be read as referring to "British India and Berar," that is to say, that the two together are to be looked upon as one unit for these purposes in the same way as the Central Provinces and Berar now form one province under S. 47, Government of India Act, 1935, for all purposes. That means that S. 2 (5), "Berar Civil Procedure Code" which defines foreign Court runs as follows :

> Foreign Court means a Court situate beyond the limits of British India and Berar which has no authority in British India and Berar and is not established or continued by the Governor-General in Council.

Does this include a Court in British India? Clearly not. A Court in British India is situate in this unit known as British India and Berar and therefore is not beyond its limits; and that is the first test which a foreign Court has to fulfil. Then again a British Indian Court has authority in at least a part of this unit, namely the British Indian part of it, therefore having authority in that unit it does not fulfil the second test either, that test being that it should have no authority in any part of this suit known as British India and Berar. I am assuming for the moment that British Indian Courts have no authority in Berar, though as has been shown in the referring order in point of fact they have because their decrees can be executed there. But even if it be assumed that they have none, they certainly have authority in the combined unit and therefore do not fall within the purview of the definition. That being so, a British Indian Court is not a foreign Court from the point of view of a Berar Court, and if it is not a foreign Court it must be a domestic tribunal.

The fact that it is situate in British India which is foreign territory from the Berar point of view makes no difference. It is open to a State to set up Courts of its own beyond its own boundaries, or to recognize those of other administrations if it so chooses. The co-operation of the other side is of course also necessary. The consent of the other administration to allow its Courts to occupy their time with foreign matters must naturally be obtained, otherwise these Courts would refuse to act and no Berar authority could compel them to do so. But so far as the clothing them with authority is concerned, that is within the competence of all sovereign States. Certain Cantonment Courts in Native States may be quoted as examples, and during the present world crisis we have whole administrations and Government functioning on foreign soil, but for present purposes, the most important illustrations are the Privy Council and the Court of the Judicial Commissioner and later of the Nagpur High Court until the new Government of India Act came into force. Until then there were not two Judicial Commissioners' Courts at Nagpur and later two High Courts, but only one. The jurisdiction of these British Indian tribunals was extended to Berar and thus we had in those days British Indian Courts (and not separate Berar Courts) exercising jurisdiction over foreign territory. The Privy Council is also situate in foreign territory from the point of view of Berar but it is not a foreign Court from the point of view of a Berar Court, because it exercises jurisdiction in Berar. It also exercises jurisdiction in British India but there are not two Privy Councils: there is only one Privy Council.

It is important to recognize that there was only one Court of the Judicial Commissioner in those days and not two, and that the Court which exercised jurisdiction over Berar was a British Indian Court and not a separate Berar Court composed of the same personnel, because that furnishes the key to the rest of the problem. For judicial purposes the Central Provinces and Berar were administered as one compact unit and not as two and each Court was constituted a domestic tribunal, and not a foreign one, vis-a-vis any other civil Court in that area.

Because of its importance it will be necessary to track this down to its sources and deal with the matter at length because it was urged that there were in those days two High Courts at Nagpur. I read the various Acts and Notifications in just the opposite sense and in my opinion the view urged would have the most appealing consequences. The Court of the Judicial Commissioner at Nagpur was first established by the Central Provinces Courts Act of 1865. There was no legislature in those days and the Act was passed by the Governor-General in Council acting in its legislative capacity. The decision to establish such a Court was made by a resolution of the Governor-General in Council dated 2nd November 1861 and the Act which actually brought the Court into existence was passed four years later. Till then there was no Court of the Judicial Commissioner who assisted "the Chief Commissioner and Agent to the Governor-General for the Central Provinces" in his administration of that area. He exercised certain judicial functions but not in his capacity as Judge of a Court. When the Court was first constituted, the Judge, (in the beginning there was only one), and later the Judges, appointed to this Court were appointed in the ordinary way by the Executive Government.

The original Act was repealed and replaced (from time to time) by other Acts. It is not necessary to examine them all. It will be enough to refer to the ones of 1904 and 1917. The important point to notice is the manner in which the Judges of that Court were to be appointed. Section 4 of the Act of 1904 provided that the Judicial Commissioner was to be appointed by the Governor-General in Council and the Additional Judicial Commissioners by the Local Government with the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council by notification in the local official gazette. Soon after this, in the year 1905, the judicial system of Berar was amalgamated with that of the Central Provinces. This was done by the Berar Courts Law of 1905 which was enacted by the Governor-General in Council on 16th

June 1905 in exercise of the powers conferred upon him by the India (Foreign Jurisdiction) Order in Council of 1902. Section 3 of that Law is as follows :

3. (1) The Court of the Judicial Commissioner of the Central Provinces shall be the highest civil Court of appeal, and, except in reference to proceedings against European British subjects and persons jointly charged with European British subjects, the highest Court of criminal appeal and revision in respect of Berar.

(2) The said Judicial Commissioner may exercise in any part of the Central Provinces any jurisdiction conferred upon him by this law or any other law for the time being in force in Berar.

(3) Where, on the application of any enactment of the Governor-General in Council to Berar, words signifying the Court of the Resident have been substituted for an expression signifying a High Court in British India, those words shall, after the commencement of this law, and subject to the provisions thereof, be construed to mean the Court of the Judicial Commissioner.

Stopping there. These words do not in my opinion constitute a new Court. They merely invest a Court which already exists in British India with an additional extra-territorial jurisdiction. I think the wording of the section indicates that but in my opinion two tests place this beyond doubt. Before however dealing with that I draw attention to S. 5, Government of India Act of 1916 (6 and 7, Geo. 5 Ch. 37) which authorizes the Governor-General in Council to confer extra-territorial jurisdiction upon Courts. Up till the passing of this Act the Governor-General in Council acting, or purporting to act, under the authority conferred upon him by certain orders of His Majesty in Council made under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act of 1890, had been doing this. Doubts arose about the validity of, these actions, so the British Parliament made it clear in S. 5 of this Act that the Governor-General in Council had always had authority to make these orders and that he would continue to have this authority. The section is general and is in these terms :

An order of His Majesty in Council heretofore or hereafter made under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890, empowering the Governor-General of India in Council to make rules and orders in respect of Courts or administrative authorities acting for any territory shall not be invalid by reason only that it confers or delegates power to confer on Courts or administrative authorities power to sit or act outside the territory in respect of which they have jurisdiction or functions, or that it confers or delegates power to confer appellate jurisdiction or functions on Courts or administrative authorities sitting or acting outside the territory.

When the consolidating Government of India Act of 1915 was amended in 1919 a similar power was conferred upon Local Governments by S. 71 (3) (a), the only limitation being that in their case the approval and assent of the Governor-General in Council was necessary, as also publication in both the Gazette of India and the local official gazette. The Act of 1916 was not repealed and so the power of the Governor-General in Council to act as before was not affected. Even now, although the new Government of India Act of 1935 repeals the Act of 1916, or rather those portions of it, it continues these powers by incorporating S. 5 into S. 294 (5) with certain necessary modifications. It was argued that these actions of the Governor-General in Council amount to acts of legislation in British India and it was contended that so far as the Code of Civil Procedure is concerned, the Governor-General in Council cannot do that and cannot alter or amend the Code. This, in my opinion, confuses the "Berar Code of Civil Procedure" with its British Indian counterpart. It may be that a British Indian Legislature cannot create or set up a Court or other authority in territory which lies beyond the boundaries of the area over which it has jurisdiction and control, nor can the Governor-General in Council, but both can by mutual agreement with the sovereign authority in territory beyond their respective jurisdictions, or with some lesser authority deriving power so to act from such source, confer extra-territorial jurisdiction upon foreign Courts and authorities in certain matters and agree to regard them as domestic tribunals for all these limited purposes.

This is what the British Indian Legislature had done in the British Indian Code of Civil Procedure by its definition of foreign Court in S. 2 (5). It has not thereby set up any Court or authority in foreign territory, it has merely regarded certain foreign tribunals established or continued by the Governor-General in Council as domestic ones. And that it had every power to do. Turning next to the foreign territory, that is to say, in this case, Berar, the Governor-General in Council acting under an order in Council of His Majesty made under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act has power to legislate for Berar. In the exercise of those powers that authority enacted the "Berar Code of Civil Procedure." In that Code it has stated that any Court situate in the unit known as British India and Berar shall be regarded as a domestic tribunal. In doing this it has not legislated for British India, it has not affected British Indian territory, nor has it touched the British Indian Code of Civil Procedure. The Governor-General in Council has merely conferred a certain extra-territorial jurisdiction upon British Indian Courts. It has not created those Courts, but has only conferred extra-territorial powers upon Courts created by the British Indian Legislatures, and this S. 5 of the Act of 1916 to which I have referred tells us it has power to do and has always had power to do when the requisite order of His Majesty in Council is present, as it is in the present case; and the moment that is done the Berar Code of Civil Procedure constitutes these British Indian Courts domestic tribunals by its definitions. The relevant order of His Majesty in Council is the one dated 11th June 1902. Paragraph 4 (c) empowers the Governor-General in Council to make rules and orders for determining (not creating) the Courts, authorities, Judges and Magistrates, by whom, and for regulating the manner in which, any jurisdiction, auxiliary or incidental to or consequential on the jurisdiction under this order, is to be exercised in British India.

This, in my opinion, quite clearly, does not empower the Governor-General in Council to create a Berar Court in British India but only enables him to confer extra-territorial jurisdiction upon British Indian Courts created by the British Indian Legislatures and thus enables such Courts, sitting in British India and exercising jurisdiction there, to extend their powers and authority beyond the limits of British India into the foreign territory of Berar. With the utmost respect I am unable to see how this can be looked upon as amendment of the British Indian Code of Civil Procedure.

But turning back to the Berar Courts Law of 1905, I said that I considered two tests as conclusive of the fact that the Governor-General in Council was not creating a separate Judicial Commissioner's Court for Berar at Nagpur but was merely conferring extra-territorial jurisdiction upon a Court which had been created by a British Indian Legislature. If we turn to S. 4, Central Provinces Courts Act of 1904, we find that though the Judicial Commissioner was to be appointed by the Governor-General in Council the Additional Judicial Commissioners were to be appointed by the Local Government subject to the previous sanction of the higher authority. There is no corresponding provision for the appointment of Judges to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner in the Berar Courts Law, nor has the Governor-General in Council ever appointed the Additional Judicial Commissioner for that Court, nor had it up till 1917 authorized the Local Government to do so on its behalf. No part of the Central Provinces Courts Act of 1904 was ever applied to Berar. I give a typical order of appointment below:

GOVERNMENT OF THE CENTRAL PROVINCES, APPOINTMENTS DEPARTMENT.

Order.

Nagpur, the 16th April 1932.

No. 1267/670/III

Mr. R. E. Pollock, I.C.S., District and Sessions Judge, Legal Remembrancer, Secretary Legislative Council, Central Provinces, and Judicial Secretary to Government, Central Provinces, is appointed to officiate as Additional Judicial Commissioner, Central Provinces, Nagpur.

No similar notification was issued in respect of Berar.

Now it is clear that it is not enough for a Court to be created. It is necessary for the creating authority also to make provision for the appointment of Judges to that Court. That this was not overlooked in the case of Berar is clear from Ss. 17 to 20 of the Berar Courts Law of 1905 which are headed "Appointment of Judges and ministerial officers of subordinate Courts." It is equally clear that not only did the Judicial Commissioner exercise authority over Berar after 1905 but so also did the Additional Judicial Commissioners who had been appointed by the Local Government. What power had they to do so if the law of 1905 had created a separate Judicial Commissioner's Court for Berar? They had never been appointed as Judges to that new Court. But, if the British Indian Court, as a Court, had been invested with extra-territorial jurisdiction, then of course its authority to act through its own Judges is clear.

When the Central Provinces Courts Act of 1917 was passed, the Local Government was given power to appoint both the Judicial Commissioner as well as the Additional Judicial Commissioners without reference to the Governor-General in Council. This Act was applied to Berar by item No. 115, schedule 1, with the direction that the words "the Province" in that Act should be construed as meaning the Central Provinces and Berar. But even that did not authorize the Local Central Provinces Government to appoint Judges to a Berar Court. The authority to create Courts and Judges for Berar was conferred by His Majesty in Council upon the Governor-General in Council and not upon a Local Provincial Government. The extent to which the Governor-General in Council can delegate his powers is given in para. 3 of His Majesty's Order in Council. It is limited to delegation to "any servant of the British Indian Government." It is difficult to see how a Local Government can be regarded as a servant of the British Indian Government especially when none of its members individually was a Government servant; but in any case where was the delegation?

Section 134 (4), Government of India Act, 1915, defined Local Government as "the Governor in Council or the Governor acting with Ministers as the case may require." Now the Governor and his Executive Councillors were appointed by His Majesty under the Royal Sign Manual (S. 47 (1)), and as such held office during the pleasure of the Crown: see 6 Halsbury's Laws of England, Hailsham Edition, para. 782, p. 608. Therefore though they were servants of the Crown they were not servants of the British Indian Government; nor were the Ministers, because being an integral part of the British Indian Government they could not be servants of themselves. But however that may be, even if it be possible to argue that there was the necessary delegation in 1917, that would only affect Judges appointed after that date and would not apply to the Additional Judicial Commissioners who were appointed and functioned under the Act of 1904. It is important to observe that there were no fresh appointments in 1917; the old Court continued as before and so did its Judges. The logical result of the contention under consideration would be that all the thousands of orders passed and decisions made by the Additional Judicial Commissioners in that interval were mere nullities: a staggering conclusion. The position is even clearer when we come down in 1936 when the present High Court was constituted at Nagpur. It was created by His Majesty by Letters Patent and all the present Judges were appointed under that Letters Patent. There has been no fresh appointment of Judges by the Governor-General in Council to a High Court in Berar and consequently if the contention is sound, under what authority do we function in Berar? The order of the Governor-General in Council relied on relates only to a Court and not to Judges. If that creates a new High Court for Berar, then it is necessary to appoint Judges to that Court and none of us has been so appointed.

Other complications will also arise. The High Court functions under its Letters Patent and as such possesses powers which the Judicial Commissioner's Court did not have. If the order of the Governor-General in Council dated 20th January 1936 on which reliance was placed really creates a separate High Court for Berar, then that High Court is not of the same status or kind as the Nagpur High Court. It is not a Court created by His Majesty nor are the Judges, His Majesty's Judges. Consequently it cannot have the powers which His Majesty alone can, in the absence of statutory authority, confer. The Governor-General in Council acting as the legislative authority for Berar has not conferred these wider powers upon any Berar High Court; it has done no more than enact a "Berar Code of Civil Procedure". That means that the powers of the Berar High Court would be strictly limited by the "Berar Code of Civil Procedure" and therefore to mention only one consequence, no letters patent appeals would be possible. In my opinion, the consequences of accepting the contention under consideration would be appalling. I am quite clear that there was only one Judicial Commissioner's Court at Nagpur and not two and thereafter only one High Court. Once that is accepted, then the difficulties of regarding the subordinate Courts in the Central Provinces as domestic tribunals from the point of view of the Berar Courts largely disappears because the underlying principle is exactly the same in their case as well.

I said that to my mind two tests were conclusive of this matter. The first I have just dealt with. The second is this. In applying the various British Indian enactments to Berar why has the Governor-General in Council deemed it necessary to substitute the phrase "Central Provinces and Berar" or "British Indian and Berar" for the words "Central Provinces" and "British India" respectively? One would have thought that the word "Berar" alone would have been enough. The phrases used are necessary only on the view that extra-territorial jurisdiction is being conferred on certain British Indian Courts. Then again turn to notification No. 3510-I. B., dated 3rd November 1913. In applying the enactments referred to above to Berar the Governor-General in Council states that:

> In the enactments so applied references to a 'High Court' (shall be read) as referring to the Court of Judicial Commissioner of the Central Provinces.

What about the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Berar if there is such a separate Court? What has the British Indian

Court of the Central Provinces got to do with Berar if there are two such Courts and why should this important Berar institution which alone would have any authority in Berar if it existed be ignored in this way? To my mind the answer is plain: there is no such institution. It is the British Indian Court which functions in Berar. Difficulties were raised in argument about ss. 16 and 17, Civil P. C. These difficulties have been dealt with by my learned brother Niyogi J., and he has been impressed with them. In my opinion they can only arise on the assumption that the British Indian Court and the Berar Courts are foreign Courts vis-a-vis each other. I think with respect that the discussion here has omitted to separate the Berar Code of Civil Procedure from its British Indian counter-part. We are dealing in this case with a decree passed by a British Indian Court in respect of property situate in Berar and with a Berar Court which is asked to execute that decree. As I observed before, we have got to look at the matter from the point of view of the Berar Court and to confine our attention to the Berar laws, that is to say, in this case, to the "Berar Code of Civil Procedure". I agree with my learned brother for the reasons given by him that the explanation to S. 16 "Berer Code of Civil Procedure" must be read as follows: "In this section 'property' means property situate in Berar." Therefore what we have to see is whether under this Berar section a British Indian Court can pass a decree in respect of property situate in Berar. That depends upon whether these Courts are to be regarded as foreign Courts or as domestic tribunals. I have already explained at length that they are not foreign Courts from the point of view of a Berar Court. Therefore the position narrows down to this.

Section 16, Berar Code says that suits for the recovery, partition, etc., of immovable property situate in Berar must be brought in the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the property is situate. This of course can only be a Berar Court. But what happens if it is not brought in such a Court? In my opinion the rule which S. 21, "Berar Code of Civil Procedure" illustrates covers the defect as effectively as it does when the suit is instituted in a wrong Court (from the territorial point of view) in Berar. The reason for this has been given in our referring order. A defect of this kind does not affect the inherent jurisdiction of the Court and therefore when the wrong Court is a domestic tribunal, and in certain cases even when it is not, consent, or what is the same thing, absence of objection, can confer the necessary jurisdiction. If this result flows, as it does, in the case of Berar Courts because they are domestic tribunals vis-a-vis each other, and if by special Berar enactments British Indian Courts are also to be regarded as domestic tribunals vis-a-vis Berar Courts, then the same results must, in my opinion, follow in their case as well. It must be remembered that if a British Indian Court has inherent lack of jurisdiction to exercise authority in foreign territory in all cases, then the objection must apply equally to the High Court and probably also to the Privy Council. I agree that ordinarily there is want of inherent jurisdiction but in my opinion not so when the foreign power chooses to clothe British Indian Courts with the necessary authority by recognizing them as domestic tribunals. After that the question of jurisdiction becomes territorial and must be dealt with accordingly. The matter has been dealt with in the referring order but there is a decision of the Privy Council in 12 Cal 225[57] which has not been referred to there and as it supports my view it would perhaps be as well to refer to it now. That decision was given under the Civil Procedure Code of 1859, where there was no section which corresponded to S. 21 of the present Code. At p. 237 their Lordships say:

> It may be observed that the Court of the 24-Pergunnahs dealt with Alumpur, which is in Nuddea, and that the Court of Nuddea dealt with the three mouzahs twice mortgaged which were in the 24-Pergunnahs. The defendant, who succeeded in both suits, raised no question upon this, and each of the District Courts must be taken to have tried the whole suit before it by consent.

When, however, their Lordships dealt with the position in the High Court where there was no consent and the High Court attempted to confer without consent territorial jurisdiction upon a Court which had none, their Lordships said that the High Court had no power to do that. This also indicates that the rule applies even when S. 21 is not available. As regards the Privy Council cases in 42 Mad 813[14] and 54 Bom 495,[38] which were relied on, the former has already been distinguished in the referring order. In that case a British Indian Court passed an order under the Civil Procedure Code for the sale of properties of which a part was situate within the local limits of its jurisdiction and part in a tract known as the Agency tracts. The Code of Civil Procedure has been expressly excluded from operation in these tracts by S. 1 (3). Therefore their Lordships held that as the sale was ordered under a provision of law whose operation had been expressly excluded from the tract in question, the order was a nullity.

But that is not the case here. Under the "Berar Code of Civil Procedure" all British Indian Courts have been placed on the same footing as the Berar Courts vis-a-vis each other and all made subordinate to the one British Indian High Court at Nagpur. Therefore as I see it, whenever an order or a decree made by a Berar Court without the necessary territorial jurisdiction would not be a nullity vis-a-vis another Berar Court, then a corresponding order of another domestic tribunal, a British Indian Court, made in like circumstances, would not be a nullity either. To the extent that it is necessary to confer this limited extra-territorial jurisdiction upon British Indian Courts and make them domestic tribunals for the purposes of the Berar Courts, the "Berar Civil Procedure Code" does apply to British Indian Courts, and it has been so applied by an authority recognized by S. 5 of the Act of 1916, namely the Governor-General in Council. Therefore the decision of their Lordships in 42 Mad 813[14] does not, in my opinion, apply to a case of this kind.

As regards the other decision, 54 Bom 495,[38] the position was this. A British Indian Court passed a decree which embraced not only property within its own territorial jurisdiction but also property beyond British India in the Kolhapur State. Now the State of Kolhapur is not administered by the Governor-General in Council and therefore the Courts of British India and the Courts of Kolhapur are foreign tribunals vis-a-vis each other. It was contended before their Lordships that S. 17, Civil P. C., saved the situation but their Lordships held that it did not because they said the different Courts referred to in that section must mean "Court to which the Code applies, that is to say, Courts in British India," and of course after their Lordships pronouncement it must be accepted that that is so. But I do not see that that makes any difference.

I agree with Niyogi J., that S. 17 must now probably be regarded as supplementary to S. 16, though we thought otherwise in the referring order. This point was pressed before their Lordships at p. 501 and though they did not actually say that this was so I think they indicated that in their opinion it would be. But what follows? Section 16 deals with territorial and not with inherent jurisdiction, that is to say, with a kind of jurisdiction which is curable by consent. If S. 17 is supplementary to S. 16, then it follows that S. 17 falls within that class. Therefore, it may well be that S. 17 cannot be applied when the properties are situate partly in British India and partly in Berar any more than S. 16 can be applied when the property is wholly situate beyond the limits of territorial jurisdiction. But that does not touch the point at issue here. The question here is not whether Ss. 16 and 17 can be invoked to confer jurisdiction when the parties object but whether consent can; and that, as I see it, is covered by the principle which S. 21 illustrates. Their Lordships did not refer to S. 21 or to the principle underlying it because clearly in that case it could not have been invoked. The objection to jurisdiction had been taken in the first Court itself, before decree, and an issue had been framed about it. Of course the rule cannot cure an irregularity as to the place of suing under S. 17 when the objection is raised in the first Court any more than it can under S. 16, unless the matter is decided against the objector and is not set right in revision or appeal in which case it would be res judicata. But that is not the case here. Here the objection was taken for the first time in execution. Their Lordships did not consider any such position.

The force of Ss. 16 to 20 was considered by the Judicial Commissioner's Court at Karachi in A I R 1931 Sind 47.[58] The learned Additional Judicial Commissioners pointed out that these sections deal > with the forum or proper place where a plaintiff is required to institute his suit. These sections contain a direction to the suitor and not to the Court and do not purport to deal with the inherent or general jurisdiction of a particular Court or purport to deprive any such Court of its jurisdiction in the event of their non-compliance.

The learned Additional Judicial Commissioners relied on 23 Mad 367[59] at page 371 where rules of this kind were treated as procedural and then they continued :

> And not only that, but as already observed S. 21 of the Code makes it abundantly clear that a non-compliance with these provisions is in no way fatal to the jurisdiction of the Court and does not render the decree passed by a Court of competent jurisdiction a mere nullity so as to empower the executing Court to refuse to execute it on that ground.

I entrirely agree. My Lord the Chief Justice and I have dealt with this in our referring order and I will not cover the same ground, but I think that the opinion expressed there requires modification in respect of its treatment of S. 17. In view of the Privy Council decision to which I have just referred I do not think that it can be contended any longer that S. 17 can be applied to cases of this kind though the referring order suggests that it can. This decision of their Lordships was not cited before us then and I had overlooked it. There is also another modification which I think it desirable to make and that is as regards our treatment of the Privy Council decision in 56 Mad 405.[8] On looking into the matter further I find that their Lordships were dealing with an insolvency matter arising under the Provincial Insolvency Act. The District Court at Secunderabad was consequently acting as an insolvency Court and not as an ordinary civil Court. The Preamble to the Civil P. C. shows that the Code is regulating the procedure of "Courts of Civil Judicature" and consequently the Courts referred to in S. 2 (5) are civil Courts and not criminal or insolvency or any other kind of Courts. That being so, there can be no doubt that an insolvency Court situate in foreign territory is a foreign Court from the point of view of a British Indian civil Court. It is also to be observed that S. 5, Provincial Insolvency Act, does not import the definitions given in the Code of Civil Procedure into the Act and adopt them as its own. All it says is that:

> Subject to the provisions of this Act the Court, in regard to proceedings under this Act, shall have the same powers and follow the same procedure as it has and follows in the exercise of original civil jurisdiction.

That being so, the definition of "foreign Court" given in the Code of Civil Procedure does not apply to insolvency matters. It is clear throughout pp. 411 and 413 of their Lordships' judgment that their Lordships were there concerned with bankruptcy matters and adjudication orders, and the House of Lords' decisions on which they rely make that even clearer. That being so, it is clear why the definition in S. 2 (5), Civil P. C., was neither cited nor referred to: it did not apply to that case. But it does apply here. I would also like to add 29 N L R 342[60] at p. 348 to the authorities already cited in the referring order relating to S. 21, Civil P. C., and the rule of law which it illustrates. That leaves outstanding a difficulty which was raised as regards S. 45, Civil P. C. It was contended that this section would be otiose if a Berar Court was a British Indian Court and vice versa and that the Courts could then proceed directly under S. 39. I do not think that is so. The reason why Ss. 43 to 45 are necessary is because a British Indian Legislature cannot extend the operation of its law into foreign territory any more than a foreign authority can legislate for British India.

It is competent for a Legislature either in Berar or in British India to say that it will recognize Courts situate in the territory of the other as its own domestic forums but that in itself will not clothe those Courts with authority to act, nor will it serve to regulate their procedure. It is necessary for the sovereign power of the territory in which those Courts are situate, or some delegate from it clothed with the necessary authority, to allow its Courts to spend their time over these foreign matters and to determine the procedure which they should follow when doing so. The Governor-General in Council, legislating for Berar, has passed the "Berar Code of Civil Procedure" and has told Berar Courts by Ss. 2 (5) and 45 to recognize British Indian Courts as domestic tribunals and to send its decrees to those Courts for execution instead of leaving the successful party to sue on them as he would ordinarily have to do. But its authority stopped there. It could not legistate for British India and therefore could not compel British Indian Courts to recognize Berar Courts as domestic forums and could not compel them to accept their decrees and execute them. It was necessary for a British Indian Legislature to do that, and we find that a British Indian Legislature had done so. British Indian Courts are told in S. 43, British Indian Civil Procedure Code that they are to recognize Berar Courts as domestic forums and to execute their decrees. An exactly similar position is reached in respect of decrees passed by British Indian Courts and sent for execution to the Courts in Berar by reversing this process. I cannot see how this alters the matter. The important point is that these decrees could not be so executed unless the two Courts were domestic forums vis-a-vis each other. If they were foreign Courts, then it would be necessary to sue afresh upon the foreign judgment.

Some cases which have not been considered in the referring order were cited in the discussion before the Full Bench. I do not think two of them are in point : 15 Pat 567[61] related to the Sonthal Parganas which are a part of British India and the decision turned upon the competency of a settlement officer to send a certain matter for trial to a Court in Gaya (also British India) under S. 5A, Sonthal Parganas Settlement (Amendment) Regulation (3 of 1908). Their Lordships of the Privy Council held that he had this authority and that the Court to which the matter was sent had the necessary jurisdiction when the matter was so transferred: I L R (1938) Bom 529[62] interprets S. 41, Evidence Act, and holds that the Courts referred to there include Courts which are not British Indian Courts. I L R (1937) Bom 895[63] is in point but with respect I am unable to agree with it. The learned Judges considered that the decision of the Judicial Committee in 54 Bom 495[38] relating to S. 17, Civil P. C., settled the question. I have already dealt with this question. I agree with the learned Bombay Judges that after their Lordships' decision, S. 17 ought to be interpreted in the sense in which the Bombay High Court has interpreted it, but the learned Judges do not go on to consider the further question whether the defect is procedural (and so curable) or goes to the root of jurisdiction. In the case before their Lordships the matter was not curable because the Kolhapur Court with which they were dealing was unquestionably a "foreign Court." In our case, and in the case before the learned Bombay Judges, the Court was, in my opinion, and apparently in theirs as well, a domestic tribunal. I adhere to the view taken in the referring order and my replies to the questions put are the same as those given by my Lord the Chief Justice.

Civil Revn. No. 8 of 1939, Decided on 19th July 1940, from order of 2nd Sub-Judge, 1st Class, Khandwa, D/- 5th November 1938.

(a) Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 78 (2)—Applicability—Absolute discharge granted to insolvent — S. 78 (2) cannot be applied even by analogy.

S. 78 (2) excludes time only in the case of annulment of an order of adjudication ; and therefore it cannot be applied even by analogy to a case where an absolute discharge has been granted to the insolvent. [P 60 C 2]

(b) Limitation Act (1908), Art. 182 — Phrase "made in accordance with law to the proper Court" in Art. 182 should be read also with concluding words "to take some step-in-aid of execution"—Insolvency Court is not proper Court within meaning of Art. 182—Steps-in-aid taken in aforesaid Court do not extend period — Time between adjudication and discharge of insolvent judgment-debtor cannot be excluded.

The phrase "made in accordance with law to the proper Court" in Art. 182 is to be read also along with the concluding words "to take some step-in-aid of execution". The insolvency Court is not the proper Court for execution and therefore any so-called steps-in-aid taken in that Court cannot extend the period. Time between the adjudication and discharge of an insolvent judgment-debtor against whom limitation for execution of a decree had already commenced prior to his insolvency cannot be excluded: AIR 1931 Pat 357, Disting.: AIR 1919 Mad 656 and AIR 1923 Bom 33, Ref. [P 61 C 1]

(c) Limitation Act (1908), S. 15 — Insolvency may act as stay of proceedings only when leave is refused.

An order of adjudication adjudging the defendant as an insolvent is not an order staying suit against the defendant because its effect is not to stay proceedings against the defendant-insolvent but merely to impose on the plaintiff the necessity of obtaining leave from the Court : it is is only when leave is refused that it can be said that there is an injunction and an order staying the institution of the suit. Order. — The question is whether this execution application of the applicants-decree-holders was in time. They first of all rely on S. 78 (2), Insolvency Act, read with Art. 182, Sch. 2, Limitation Act. But S. 78 (2) excludes time only in the case of annulment of an order of adjudication : so it cannot be applied even by analogy to the present case where adjudication was not annulled but an absolute discharge was granted to the insolvent. The decree-holders then say that under Art.182 itself they are entitled to deduct the time spent in proceedings in the insolvency Court because these proceedings were steps-in-aid of execution of the decree or order. The lower Court has discussed the interrelation of the closing clauses of Art. 182, col. 3 of para. 5—"the final order passed on an application made in accordance with law to the proper Court for execution, or to take some step-in-aid of execution of the decree or order"—and has in my opinion correctly interpreted it to mean that the phrase "made in accordance with law to the proper Court" is to be read also along with the concluding words "to take some step-in-aid of execution." As the Insolvency Court was not the proper Court for execution, it follows that any so called steps-in-aid taken in that Court do not extend the period. Here the decree was dated 4th October 1929 and was against two brothers Hiralal and Ramlal jointly. It was Hiralal alone who went to the insolvency Court and he was adjudged insolvent on 7th September 1934. He was discharged on 23rd October 1936.

Reliance is now placed on 10 Pat 422,[1] but the facts there were different. The decree against the insolvent was obtained some months after he had been so adjudicated and therefore S. 28 (2), Provincial Insolvency Act, had already come into force, and it was held that limitation did not begin to run until leave to proceed against the person of the judgment-debtor has been granted. In the case before us limitation had already begun to run, and I have not been shown any provision of law by which time between the adjudication and the discharge could be excluded. It is not contended that S. 14, Limitation Act, is applicable. The decree-holders could have applied to the Insolvency Court for permission to proceed in execution, but they did not do so. They could also have proceeded against the other brother Ramlal without permission and executed the decree fully against him, but they did not do so.

Section 15, Limitation Act, seems more promising, but no mention of it was made by either side in argument. Its effect was considered in 42 Mad 319[2] and 47 Bom 244.[3] It was held that an order of adjudication adjudging the defendant as an insolvent is not an order staying suit against the defendant because its effect is not to stay proceedings against the defendant-insolvent but merely to impose on the plaintiff the necessity of obtaining leave from the Court: it is only when leave is refused that it can be said that there is an injunction and an order staying the institution of the suit. For the above reasons I concur with the finding that this execution was barred by time. The present application is dismissed with costs. Counsel fee Rs. 20.

Haji Abdul Karim Ibrahim Kachhi — Decree-holder — Opposite Party.

Civil Revn. No. 425 of 1939, Decided on 28th August 1940, for revision of order of 1st Sub-Judge, 2nd Class, Nagpur, D/- 25th April 1939.

(a) Deed — Construction — Surety bond—Rule of construction stated — Plaintiff applying for attachment before judgment—Surety undertaking to produce property or deposit its equivalent value in Court on plaintiff's claim being decreed — Suit dismissed under O. 9, R. 8, Civil P. C., and subsequently restored and decreed — Dismissal of suit under O. 9, R. 8, Civil P. C., held was not decree and did not terminate surety's liability under terms of bond—Surety was liable under bond on suit being restored and decreed.

Surety bonds should be construed primarily upon the terms used in the document and, in respect of any matter on which the bond is silent or ambiguous, by a reference to the various rules and laws and practice which apply in such cases. [P 63 C 1]

On the plaintiff's application for attachment before judgment the surety executed a bond and undertook to produce the property or deposit its equivalent value in Court on the plaintiff's suit being decreed. The suit was dismissed for default under O. 9, R. 8, Civil P. C., but was subsequently restored and decreed. The plaintiff sought to enforce the surety's liability under the bond:

Held that the dismissal of the suit for default was not a decree within the meaning of S. 2 (2) (b), Civil P. C., and therefore did not terminate the liability of the surety and that the surety was liable under the bond on the suit being restored and decreed. The surety could however be absolved if the plaintiff failed to apply for restoration within the prescribed period: Case law referred. [P 63 C 1]

(b) Deed — Surety bond—Surety undertaking to produce property or deposit its value in Court — Surety is entitled to his option.

Where the undertaking given by the surety is either to produce the property in Court or deposit its value in Court, the surety has a right to exercise his option either to produce the property or to pay the money. [P 63 C 2]

Order. — This application for revision raises an interesting point. The decree-holder as plaintiff applied for attachment before judgment. On 21st January 1938 it was ordered that the attachment should be effected unless the defendant furnished security for the due production of the property sought to be attached when required. The applicant before me stood surety and executed a bond on 30th January 1938. On 14th February 1938 the case was dismissed for default because the plaintiff did not appear whereas his opponent did. This dismissal was under O. 9, R. 8, Civil P. C. It subsequently appeared that the omission of the plaintiff to appear on the 14th was not due to any fault of his. The case had been fixed in his presence for the 17th and it had been so published in the public cause list. The plaintiff had also signed the order-sheet fixing the next date of hearing as the 17th. But it so turned out that the table clerk behind the back of the plaintiff and without informing him altered the date to the 14th, and of course the plaintiff not knowing anything about it did not turn up on the 14th but turned up on the 17th. The case was naturally restored to file and eventually ended in a decree for the plaintiff. In execution the plaintiff has proceeded against the surety upon his bond and the lower Court has made an order against the surety calling upon him to pay the Rs. 150 mentioned in the bond. The surety applies in revision and claims that the order dismissing the suit in default operated to discharge him. He relies upon three cases. None of them is exactly in point but according to him the principle laid down there will govern a case of this kind.

The first case relied upon is 10 ALL 506.[1] That decides that when a suit is dismissed the attachment before judgment comes to an end and is not revived if the suit is subsequently decreed on appeal. The next ruling relied on is 9 Rang 472.[2] That is more like the present case and decides that when a suit is dismissed for default all interim and ancillary orders in the proceedings, such as attachments before judgment, fall to the ground with it and that consequently an attachment before judgment does not revive if the suit is subsequently restored to file. The third decision upon which reliance is placed is a decision of the Judicial Commissioner's Court at Nagpur and is A I R 1934 NAG 169.[3] There Grille J. (J. C. as he then was) held that when a Court holds that a suit as framed is not maintainable and allows the plaintiff to amend his plaint and the plaintiff does so without objection, then any proceedings, such as attachments before judgment, prior to the amendment automatically fall to the ground and are not revived when the amendment is made. Reliance is also placed upon Mulla's Civil Procedure Code, Edn. 10, p. 1041, where it is stated that no interim order can survive the main litigation. It was argued that the security was furnished to avoid an attachment and that if the attachment, had it been made, would itself have come to an end upon the dismissal in default, then clearly the surety bond which is fundamentally based upon the right to attach must also come to an end.

On the other side reliance is placed upon a decision of a Full Bench of the Madras High Court reported in 58 Mad 721[4] which, in a case relating to a surety, holds that when a suit which has been dismissed for default is restored to file, all ancillary orders are also restored. The learned counsel for the non-applicant also relies upon A I R 1934 Mad 49[5] where it is held that the question turned upon the intention of the officer ordering restoration. If his intention was to revive the proceedings completely in such a way that they must be deemed never to have been terminated, then all ancillary matters prior to the order of restoration do not fall to the ground but continue in the same way as they would have done if no order for dismissal had been made. In my opinion none of these rulings is in point. We are concerned solely with the construction of the surety bond. That bond has not been officially translated but an agreed translation was given to me by the parties. That translation is as follows :

Whereas Haji Abdul Karim plaintiff in this case having applied for attachment before judgment and the Court having granted the same for production of the property worth Rs. 150 or to give security to that extent I, Pannalal, (the applicant here) of my own accord stand surety and state that I shall either cause that property to be produced or its equivalent value to be deposited in Court upon such decree as the Court will pass in this case whenever ordered.

Now it will be seen that the undertaking in the bond is that either the property will be produced when the claim is decreed or its equivalent value will be deposited in Court. The stress is upon the word decree. When a claim is dismissed for default under O. 9, R. 8, that dismissal does not amount to a decree. This is to be gathered from S. 2 (2) (b), Civil P. C. It states that a decree shall not include an order of dismissal for default. Consequently, if a claim is dismissed for default it has not been decreed, and as the liability under the bond is to continue until the claim is decreed it is clear it cannot be brought to an end because something has happened which does not result in the claim being decreed. Of course this does not mean that the liability of a surety in circumstances like these would continue for ever if no application for restoration is made or if made, is dismissed. It would of course be unreasonable to construe a bond in that sense, but it has often been held, not only by this Court but also by their Lordships of the Privy Council, that these surety bonds are to be construed primarily upon the terms used in the document and in respect of any matter on which the bond is silent or ambiguous, by a reference to the various rules and laws and practice which apply in such cases. When a case is dismissed for default, the law is that the plaintiff can apply for restoration within a certain time. If he does not apply, then, of course, as soon as the time passes the surety is absolved. He does not have to keep his money tied up for ever. But the understanding clearly is that the plaintiff has a right to apply in such a case and that if he does apply, the suit will continue and may end in a decree as here. Consequently upon a construction of this bond I am of opinion that the liability did not terminate when the claim was dismissed for default and that as the claim has now been decreed the surety is liable upon his bond.

It was then argued that if this is to be the case, then the bond is not a surety bond in the sense that the surety has undertaken to pay a sum of money. It was argued that the so-called surety is only a supratdar and that his undertaking is either to produce the property in Court, or cause it to be produced, or deposit its value in Court. The learned counsel for the applicant contends that he has not been given an opportunity of producing the property and wants me to remand the case to the lower Court and afford him an opportunity. That, in my opinion, is undoubtedly a true construction of this bond. He has the right either to produce the property or to pay the money and it is clear that he ought to have been given an opportunity of exercising the option given to him under the bond. But I see no point in remanding the case, because I asked the learned counsel whether if remanded he would undertake to produce the property, and he replied that he was not in a position to do so because the defendant had already taken possession of it. In these circumstances a remand to enable him to fulfil an option, which he himself admits he cannot, would be idle. The application is consequently dismissed with costs. Counsel's fee Rupees 10.

Panmal Keshrichand Javheri, managing partner of firm Ramkaran Hiralal — Appellant

v.

Dhanalal Laxmichand Karnawat, Decree-holder and another, Judgment-debtor — Respondent.

Misc. Appeal No. 182 of 1937, Decided on 2nd August 1940, from order of 2nd Addl. Dist. Judge, Nagpur, D/- 3rd May 1937.

Partnership — One of partners overdrawing his account with partnership—Judgment-creditor of such partner cannot enforce his decree against overdrawn partner's share of profits before sum due to firm is fully paid up — Firm is entitled to set-off under O. 8, R. 6, Civil P. C.

A judgment-creditor of the overdrawn partner cannot enforce his decree against the overdrawn partner's share of the profits before the sum due to the firm has been fully repaid. The remaining partner or partners are entitled to priority over the overdrawing partner's assignee (or judgment-creditor) in the sense that the other partners are entitled to reimburse the firm out of the overdrawing partner's share of the profits (and in the case of dissolution, of his assets as well) before handing any part of such share over to the overdrawing partner or his judgment-creditor or assignee. The firm would be entitled to a set-off under O. 8, R. 6, Civil P. C. : A I R 1932 Pat 15, Ref. [P 66 C 1]

Y. S. Tambe — for Appellant.

G. S. Brahmarakshas and S. R. Mangrulkar— for Respondent 1.

Judgment. — Respondent 1 Dhanalal, obtained a decree for Rs. 11,983 against respondent 2, Mt. Dhanabai. Dhanabai is interested in the firm of Ramkaran Hiralal on very special terms which mark this out from an ordinary partnership case. She has obtained under a compromise decree an interest not in the partnership assets but in the partnership profits as indicated below. This results in her creditors having no right to the assets of the partnership because she has no such right. The managing partner of the firm is the appellant Panmal. Originally the decree-holder who incidentally is the son-in-law of the judgment-debtor attached a three annas share in all the partnership property. The appellant Panmal objected on two grounds. He said first of all that the decree obtained by the son-in-law against the mother-in-law was a fraudulent and collusive decree obtained in order to obviate the effects of a decision of the Judicial Commissioner's Court in a suit between the judgment-debtor and the appellant. The judgment-debtor who is related to the appellant had sued the appellant's father for partition and separate possession of the family property in the year 1919. This ended in a compromise which formed the subject-matter of further litigation. The Court of the Judicial Commissioner held that under the compromise decree the judgment-debtor was not entitled to partition and that all that she could get was a three annas share in the profits of the business. In order to get round this the son-in-law sued his mother-in-law as above, obtained a consent decree and now wants to partition the property under the guise of executing the decree. That was the appellant's case. The objection succeeded to this extent, namely that the attachment was raised and the lower Court directed the decree-holder to amend his execution application and to proceed under O. 21, R. 49 (2), Civil P. C. This was done and a receiver was appointed and the decree-holder is now attempting to proceed against Dhanabai's share in the profits of the firm. The question is what do these profits come to. The answer depends upon the solution of another problem.

It appears or rather the appellant alleges that the judgment-debtor withdrew sums of money from time to time from the partnership funds and is indebted to the firm. The Commissioner who was appointed to go into the accounts finds this to be the fact. The exact figure is in dispute: the appellant puts the indebtedness, after making allowance for the profits which have accrued to the judgment-debtor at Rs. 20,914-3-3, whereas the Commissioner places it at Rs. 1646-5-3. But the fact that the judgment-debtor has taken money from the firm and now owes it a certain sum has been found. It may be added that the Commissioner has not challenged any of the figures given in the appellant's books. On the contrary he finds that the books are regularly kept and that a profit and loss account has been made every Diwali. The difference arises out of the manner in which items have been appropriated to one account or the other. Thus, items which have been debited to the judgment-debtor's personal account ought in the opinion of the Commissioner to have been debited to the shop account and so on. But for the moment we are not concerned with this difference. It does not form a part of this appeal. The problem we are called upon to solve is a legal one. If one partner overdraws his account with the partnership, are the remaining partners, or rather the firm, entitled to recoup itself from the overdrawn partner's share of the profits before handing over any of the profits to him? And to carry the problem a step further in order to bring it into line with the facts of this case, can a judgment-creditor of the overdrawn partner enforce his decree against the overdrawn partner's share of the profits before the sum due to the firm has been fully repaid? In other words does the judgment-creditor get priority or the firm?

Order 21, R. 49 (2), does not help much. It empowers the Court to do a number of things : (1) to make an order charging the interest of the judgment-debtor partner in the partnership property and profits with the payment of the amount due under the decree, (2) to appoint a receiver of the share of such partner in the profits or other money which may be coming to him in respect of such partnership, (3) to direct the taking of accounts, (4) to make an order for the sale of the said partner's interest in the property, and so on. But none of that solves the present problem. Who is to have priority — the judgment-creditor or the firm? We have no doubt that in all ordinary cases the equitable solution would be to direct sale of the judgment-debtor's interest in the partnership properties, because ordinarily the overdrawn account would not exceed the overdrawing partner's interest in the total assets. But when, (as may be the case here owing to the consent decree and the Judicial Commissioner's judgment, though we decide nothing about that in this appeal), the overdrawing partner has no interest in the assets aside from the profits, or when the sum owing to the firm exceeds the partner's interest in the total assets, then such a direction does not solve the problem, or the whole of it, as the case may be. Dissolution has not been asked for or ordered here and so we have to proceed on that basis.

Unfortunately the Partnership Act does not deal with this point. In 10 Pat 792[1] the Patna High Court applied the English law. That case was not on all fours with the present but the following principles are deducible from it. (1) That one partner cannot confer all the rights and privileges which he possesses in the partnership upon a stranger by transferring his interest without the knowledge and consent of the other partners. The reason given is that the relationship between partners inter se is a fiduciary one and is one of mutual confidence. (2) That the assignee obtains no right to interfere with the management or administration of the partnership business or affairs during the continuance of the partnership, nor is he entitled to require any accounts of the partnership transactions, or to inspect the partnership books. The only right he obtains is to receive the share of the profits to which the assigning partner would otherwise be entitled and he is bound to accept the account of profits agreed to by the partners. This is the rule in S. 31, English Partnership Act, and according to the Patna decision it is the one which ought to be applied in India. As a matter of fact, it has been subsequently applied in S. 29 (1), Indian Partnership Act. (3) That after dissolution the assignee can claim an account against the remaining partners, and is entitled to receive the share of assets to which the transferring partner is entitled. (now S. 29 (2), Indian Partnership Act.) (4) That partners are not, as regards partnership dealings, considered as debtor and creditor inter se until the concern is wound up or there is a binding settlement of accounts.

But Fazl Ali J. also recognizes at p. 801 that there are exceptions to these rules and that in special circumstances strangers to the partnership have been held entitled to an account. Some of these exceptions are set out in 24, Halsbury, Hailsham Edition p. 480. In our opinion it will be necessary to balance the rights of the other partners against those of the stranger assignee or judgment-creditor. A rule will have to be devised which will do the maximum of justice with the minimum of inconvenience. We think it is clear that the judgment-creditor cannot be placed in a better position than his judgment-debtor. He cannot claim higher rights vis-a-vis the other partners than his own assignor has. The question therefore reduces itself to this. Can a partner demand as against his other partners that his share of the profits (or in the case of a dissolution, of the profits plus the assets) be paid over to him before he has made good moneys which he owes to the firm? In answering this question the most important rule to bear in mind is the last of the four quoted above. The rule as applied in England is to be found in Halsbury's laws of England (Hailsham Edition) Vol. 24, p. 481. After setting out the rule the learned authors continue :

> It follows that one partner has no right of action against another for the balance owing to him until after final settlement of the accounts.

Lindley in his work on Partnership, Edition 10, p. 655, in giving a summary of the law as it stood in England before the Judicature Acts, says that an action would not lie at the suit of one partner against another for money lent to the firm of which the plaintiff was himself a member, for the advance only formed an item in the partnership account.

In our opinion, the converse would also apply. These debits and credits between the partners and the firm are all items in the general account and there can be no true settlement without taking them into consideration. The matter can also be viewed from another angle. Let it be assumed for the moment that a suit would lie at the instance of an overdrawing partner for his share of the profits, and that he could in that suit ignore his indebtedness to the firm because of his overdraft. We think the firm would be entitled to a set off under O. 8, R. 6, Civil P. C. The sums overdrawn are ascertained and the parties would both fill the same character as in the plaintiff's suit, namely that of partners. If then the position is that the assignee has no better rights than his assignor he would also be subject to the same rule. The result would in the end be the same as if this were done in the present proceedings. The plaintiff would not get anything unless the sum due to him exceeded that due by him to the other side. If he could not get more than that, then it follows that his assignee cannot be in a better position. In the result then we think that the remaining partner or partners are entitled to priority over the overdrawing partner's assignee (or judgment-creditor) in the sense that the other partners are entitled to reimburse the firm out of the overdrawing partner's share of the profits (and in the case of dissolution of his assets as well) before handing any part of such share over to the overdrawing partner or his judgment-creditor or assignee. It follows then that the receiver cannot claim to receive any portion of the second respondent's share in the profits of the firm until the sums due by her to the firm on account of overdrafts are fully liquidated.

The learned Judge of the lower Court in reaching the opposite conclusion had been impressed by a practical difficulty. He is afraid that if the rule we have enumerated is correct, then it will be possible for partners in a firm to defeat the claim of a judgment-creditor of one of them by colluding together and allowing the partner against whom a decree has been obtained to overdraw his share of the profits during the course of a year and thus leave nothing for the receiver to receive. This impressed us also for a time but we think the answer is that if this is done fraudulently, then the Courts will be astute to circumvent the fraud. Once the receiver is appointed, then it becomes his right and part of his duty to see that frauds of this kind are not committed. He has a right to accounts under O. 21, R. 49, and has the right to demand that enquiries be made. It is true he cannot interfere in the management of the business of the firm but he can insist that nothing be paid over to the judgment-debtor partner for his private and personal purposes as distinct from payments made in the ordinary course of the business for business purposes in order to enable the business to be carried on. In fact the very object of his presence there as receiver is to receive moneys payable to the judgment-debtor partner (except moneys entrusted to him for the carrying on of the business) whether these be paid as advances or otherwise. If the other partner pays to the judgment-debtor direct in such circumstances it would be contempt and would be punishable as such quite apart from other remedies. Therefore we think that the learned Judge's difficulties are more apparent than real.

The appeal is allowed and the order of the lower Court is set aside. The appellant will furnish to receiver with accounts from time to time and will assist him in all enquiries relevant and proper to this matter, and further he will not pay to respondent 2 any money or moneys except such as are payable strictly for the purposes of the partnership business in order to enable such business to be carried on. The receiver will be informed of all such payments and will be entitled to challenge them before the Court and in the event of his challenge being upheld, the appellant will be personally responsible for the payments and will have to make them good and hand them over to the receiver personally on application being made therefor in these proceedings. But apart from this the appellant will be entitled to set off respondent 2's profits against the sums legally and properly due by her to the firm until these sums are fully satisfied. The accounts will be made periodically and the profits for each year settled annually as hitherto. Any balance due to respondent 2, and indeed any sum payable to her apart from those payable for strictly business purposes as aforesaid, will be paid to the receiver and not to respondent 2. The costs of this appeal will be paid by the respondents.

Criminal Revn. No. 304 of 1939, Decided on 7th November 1939, from order of Sess. Judge, Akola D/- 31st July 1939.

(a) Penal Code (1860), S. 361 — Expression 'lawfully entrusted' — Meaning.

The expression "lawfully entrusted" signifies that the care and custody of a minor should have arisen in some lawful manner so as to show as if the person having the custody of the minor had been entrusted with the care and custody of the minor. The entrustment may be by a legal guardian; it may be written, oral, express or implied. In the absence of a legal guardian the entrustment may be presumed from the course of conduct of the person actually taking upon himself the duties of the care or custody of a minor. Guardianship connotes maintenance, protection and control of a minor. The word used in the explanation is "lawful" and that must be distinguished from the term "legal". A guardian may be lawful without being a legal guardian : 8 Cal 971, Rel. on.

(b) Penal Code (1860), S. 361—Lawful guardian — Illegitimate daughter marrying when three years old but living with her parents on account of her not having attained puberty — Her husband dying and girl continuing to live with her parents — Father-in-law not bringing her to his house — Guardianship held remained with parents.

An illegitimate daughter had been married when she was 3 years old and she had been always living with her parents except at intervals when she used to go to her father-in-law's place on festive occasions. She had not attained puberty when her husband died, and she was living with her parents at the time of her husband's death and she continued to live there subsequent to it. The father-in-law never brought her to his place after her husband died:

Held, that the parents never lost their guardianship as the girl did not attain puberty and even if they had lost it by her marriage, that was revived in consequence of the failure of the father-in-law to take up the responsibility of a guardian. At all events the father-in-law must be deemed to have "entrusted" the guardianship to the parents. [P 69 C 2]

(c) Penal Code (1860), S. 361—Lawful guardian — Custom — Married girl does not leave parents' house before attaining puberty.

According to a well-recognised custom among Hindus a married girl does not leave her parents' house before she attains puberty. [P 69 C 1]

T. J. Kedar — for Applicants.

W. R. Puranik, Advocate-General — for the Crown.

Order.—The applicants Nathusing, Dama and Bhulabai were tried on the charge of kidnapping a minor girl from lawful guarnianship, Nathusing for the substantive offence and the other two for abetment thereof. All of them were found guilty and Nathusingh was sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for nine months, Dama to undergo rigorous imprisonment for four months and Bhulabai was released on probation of good conduct under S. 562 (1), Criminal P. C. Their appeals failed and they have moved this Court in revision. The girl Jaiwanti was 14 years and 4 months of age when she was enticed away by the applicants. She was the daughter of Baina and Sadu who lived together as a man and wife without their relation being hallowed by marriage. The girl was therefore the illegitimate daughter whose legal guardian would be her mother if not her father. She had been married to one Pundia when she was an infant of three years and had the misfortune of losing her husband before she attained puberty. Except that she was occasionally going to stay in her husband's family she continued to stay as before her marriage with her mother and her putative father Sadu. This man was an agricultural servant of the applicant Nathusingh. The girl Jaiwanti and her mother also worked as agricultural labourers on his farm. Nathusingh seduced the girl and was cohabiting with her without the knowledge of her parents. As she was on the verge of puberty the parents thought of getting the girl remarried. There was apparently some difference of opinion between the parents as to the prospective son-in-law. It was while the negotiations for marriage were in progress that Nathusingh enticed the girl away from her parents' house on the evening of 10th February 1939, and moved her from place to place with the help of the other applicants and once sent her away as far as Seoni in C. P. Nathusingh was shrewd enough to write out a report, Ex. P-7, to say that the girl had attained majority and sent it to the police when she was made to leave the village in a tonga. On enquiry by the head constable who turned up to verify the report Nathusingh confirmed it by saying that the girl was a major.

An attempt was made here to demolish the convictions. The plea of the defence that the girl had been removed from her house with the express or tacit consent of her mother was overruled in view of the testimony of the mother Baina (P. W. 4). On the strength of 61 Cal 168[1] it is argued that the explanation given by the accused should have been accepted in view of the circumstances that there was a disagreement between the parents as to the selection of the bridegroom, and that the mother was inclined to break off the match arranged by the father of the girl. This explanation cannot stand in the face of the clear and unequivocal statement made by the mother that she never consented to the girl being taken away from her house and that it was all done without her knowledge. That statement of the mother has been believed by the two Courts below in view of the other evidence on record.

The question of law which has been argued here goes to the root of the case. If the applicants succeed on this point the convictions must be set aside and their acquittal ordered. The point is: whether the girl was under lawful guardianship of either Sadu her putative father, or Baina her mother, when she was enticed away from her house. It is argued that as she was a widow her lawful guardian was her father-in-law, and that in the absence of specific evidence that he had entrusted her guardianship to her parents, they would not be her lawful guardians. Reliance is mainly placed on a case reported in 4 Pat L J 74[2] for the proposition that the word "entrusted" occurring in the explanation appended to S. 361, I. P. C., means giving, handing over or confiding of something by one person to another so as to involve necessarily three persons; the person imposing the confidence or trust, the person in whom the trust is imposed and the person constituting the subject-matter of the trust. It is contended that a declaration of trust by the girl's father-in-law handing her over or confiding her to the care and custody of Sadu or her mother was essential on the true construction of the explanation to S. 361.

The support which this case gives to the applicants is more apparent than real. In the first instance the facts of this case are quite different from those in the present case. In the cited case the kidnapped girl Masudia was in no way related to Chhote Begum. Masudia's mother was a servant in the employ of Chhote Begum. When she died in her service Masudia was an infant 1½ year old. Masudia, when she grew in years, began to work as a servant with Chhote Begum. Atkinson J., who was disposed to put a very restricted construction on the word "entrusted" himself conceded at p. 89 that neither the declaration of trust itself nor its acceptance need be necessarily in writing. In his opinion it was sufficient if the declaration was verbally made and given, or if it arises from a course of conduct consistent only with the existence of such an antecedent declaration and accepted verbally or by necessary implication from the conduct of the party so entrusted with the duty imposed. Thus it is clear that although the expression "lawfully entrusted" presupposes a declaration of trust, that declaration may be oral or such as is inferrable from a course of conduct. Manuk J., who was a party to the Bench was of opinion that "entrustment" contemplated by the explanation to S. 361 could be inferred in the absence of proof of an express declaration written or oral from well defined and consistent course of conduct governing relations of a person alleged to be the lawful guardian of the minor. It is pertinent to observe that the narrow interpretation put upon the word "entrusted" by Atkinson J., did not commend itself to a later Bench of the same Court as is evident from 15 Pat 817.[3] The explanation appended to S. 361 runs as follows: The words "lawful guardian" in this section include any person lawfully entrusted with care or custody of such minor person. The wording no doubt differs from the wording of S. 55, English statute 24 and 25 Vic., clause 100, which runs as follows:

> Whoever shall unlawfully take or cause to be taken any unmarried girl, being under the age of 16 years, out of the possession and against the will of her father or mother or any other person having the lawful care or charge of her shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

The terms of the English statute appear to be wider than those of the explanation to S. 361, but the intent and scope of signification of either do not appear to materially differ. The use of the adjective "lawful" in the English statute is significant to show that the care or charge must have a lawful origin. That is precisely what appears to me to be the meaning of "lawfully entrusted with care or custody." The care or custody may arise by an express act or declaration of a person who is the natural or legal guardian and in their absence may arise from a person voluntarily assuming the duty and obligation of taking care and custody of any minor. Any narrower interpretation of the explanation to S. 361 would lead to somewhat strange and capricious results. No superintendent or director of an orphanage would have any remedy left against persons enticing away the minor orphans in their charge and an orphanage would become a kidnappers' paradise. The reasonable and proper construction should be to regard the expression "lawfully entrusted" as signifying that the care and custody of a minor should have arisen in some lawful manner so as to show as if the person having the custody of the minor had been entrusted with the care and custody of the minor. The entrustment may be by a legal guardian; it may be written, oral, express or implied. In the absence of a legal guardian the entrustment may be presumed from the course of conduct of the person actually taking upon himself the duties of the care or custody of a minor. Guardianship connotes maintenance, protection and control of a minor. The word used in the explanation is "lawful" and that must be distinguished from the term "legal". A guardian may be lawful without being a legal guardian. As was held in 8 Cal 971[4] the expression "lawful guardian" must be liberally construed.

But all this discussion is somewhat academic on the view I take of the personal law applying to the case in the special circumstances of this case. The girl was no doubt married but the marriage was only technical. Her father-in-law Kesheo who was examined as witness No. 1 for the Court says that she had been married when she was three years old and that she had been always living with her parents except at intervals when she used to go to his place on festive occasions. She had not attained puberty when her husband died, and she was living with her parents at the time of her husband's death and she continued to live there subsequent to it. The father-in-law never brought her to his place after her husband died. That is also the testimony of Sadu her putative father. It also emerges from Sadu's evidence that according to custom a married girl does not leave her parents' house before she attains puberty. That is undoubtedly a well recognized custom among the Hindus. In 24 Mad 255[5] it was recognized that the husband was not entitled to the actual custody of his wife until she attained maturity: In that case it was held that the parents had the preferential right to the custody of their minor married daughter. In the present case there being no tie of wedlock between her parents she would be deemed to be under the guardianship of her mother : see 12 Mad 67.[6] It has also been held that when father is known he has the preferential right : see 15 Lah 630.[7] It is therefore incontestable that, as parents, Sadu and Baina were the guardians of the minor. But it is urged that they lost their guardianship on the minor's marriage and that the guardianship once lost cannot be revived. This is a proposition which does not appear to have commended itself to the ancient Hindu jurist Narada, whose text runs thus :

> When the husband is deceased, his kin are the guardians of his childless widow. In the disposal of the property and care of herself as well as in her maintenance they have full power. But if the husband's family be extinct, or contain no male, or be helpless, the kin of her own father are the guardians of the widow, if there be no relations of her husband within the degree of Sapinda.

This text is quoted in 16 Cal 584[8] at page 586. In the present case the father-in-law of the minor is alive but admittedly he never cared to exercise his right, presumably because the girl had not attained puberty and his son died before that event. As he was not willing to undertake responsibility of a guardian he would be deemed to be "helpless" within the meaning of that word in Narada's text cited above. It must therefore be held that the parents never lost their guardianship as the girl did not attain puberty and even if they had lost it by her marriage, that was revived in consequence of the failure of the father-in-law to take up the responsibility of a guardian. At all events the father-in-law must be deemed to have "entrusted" the guardianship to the parents as is clear from his course of conduct. On this view the parents would be the guardians even on the narrow interpretation of the word "entrustment" which commended itself to Atkinson J., in 4 Pat L J 74.[2]

There is now left outstanding a minor point for consideration. The appellate Court had felt a difficulty in deciding the appeal in the absence of a finding that the girl was entrusted to the care of her parents by the girl's father-in-law. It therefore directed the trial Magistrate to examine the father and the father-in-law of the girl under S. 428, Criminal P. C. It is urged that the accused persons should have been given the opportunity of adducing further evidence in rebuttal and that they should have been examined under S. 342, Criminal P. C. It was open to the accused to adduce additional evidence but he did not choose to do so. Section 342, Criminal P. C., does not come into operation when additional evidence is taken under S. 428, Criminal P. C. : see 52 Bom 699.[9] I affirm the conviction and I see no reason to interfere with the sentences. The application is dismissed. The applicants Nathusing and Dama will surrender to the District Magistrate and serve their respective sentences.

Judgment. — This is a plaintiff's appeal from the concurring judgment of the third Additional District Judge, Nagpur, in Civil Appeal No. 41-A of 1937 delivered on 25th November 1937. Respondent 1, Hanmant was in the service of the appellant as Kamdar, that is agent, up to 18th May 1930 if not 18th July 1930. During the period of his service he failed to account for certain sums for which he was accountable. Some time after he left the service it was discovered that he had not accounted for several sums aggregating Rs. 577-1-9. When he was confronted he admitted the correctness of the total amount found due by him, and he signed the memo of accounts, Ex. P-26 dated 2nd August 1931 expressly admitting its correctness and agreed to pay on the next day, that is 3rd August 1931. The suit was contested on various grounds of which the ground of limitation alone is material for this appeal, as the other contentions of the defendant were negatived by both the Courts below. On the issue of limitation the trial Court held that the cause of action for the suit had arisen on 19th May 1930 when the respondent left his service and that the memo of accounts, Ex. P-26, which bore his signature was inadmissible on account of its being unstamped so that it could not be used for the purpose of extending limitation. In the lower appellate Court it was argued that the memo of accounts, Ex. P-26, was an account stated within the meaning of that expression used in Art. 64, Limitation Act, and that the suit which was filed on the last day of three years period of limitation prescribed in that article should have been held to be within time. The lower appellate Court overruled the contention that the case fell within the Art. 64 and also that the memo of accounts was admissible although unstamped. The lower appellate Court disbelieved the evidence produced by the plaintiff to prove that the sureties were present when respondent 1 signed the memo of accounts on 2nd August 1931 and that they joined with him in the promise to pay the amount on the next day.

In this Court the plaintiff's claim is sought to be put on a much wider basis so as to bring the case within Arts. 90, 64 and 57, Limitation Act. The contents of the plaint no doubt countenance the argument to some extent. The plaint states that defendant 1 Hanmant was in the plaintiff's service till 18th July 1930 and that he had not accounted for certain sums aggregating Rs. 577-1-9. Then it alleges that these sums were discovered afterwards and states :

He being called upon to account admitted these items and admitted his liability for the total amount of Rs. 577-1-9 on 2nd August 1931. He had promised to return the amount on 3rd August 1931, but he did not turn up as promised.

There is indeed the allegation that certain defalcations have been discovered after respondent 1 left the service, but the precise date or dates on which they came to his knowledge is not stated as would have been done had the plaintiff intended to bring his case under Art. 90, Limitation Act. The argument as to the application of Art. 90 must therefore fall to the ground. As to the application of Art. 64 there has been a good deal of argument whether the memo of accounts, Ex. P-26, could be treated as an account stated, but it appears to me totally irrelevant in view of the claim as laid in the plaint. The plaintiff did not allege that he was suing on the basis of the memo as an account stated but he alleged that he was suing to enforce a promise to pay certain amount on 3rd August 1931. The plaintiff described his cause of action as having arisen not on 2nd August 1931 but on 3rd August 1931 : see para. 1 (b). In his rejoinder filed on 6th July 1935 he reiterated that the respondent had agreed to pay the money on 3rd August 1931. In para. 5 of the rejoinder, he again makes it clear that the suit was not time-barred owing to the agreement to pay on 3rd August 1931. The evidence of P. W. 1 and P. W. 2 is directed to prove the respondent's promise to pay on 3rd August 1931. In view of these facts on the record it is not open to the appellant to shift his ground in second appeal.

Although the case does not fall under Art. 90 or Art. 64, Limitation Act, for the reasons stated above, I am unable to agree with the Courts below that the suit was liable to be dismissed on the ground of limitation. Exhibit P-26 contains the various items which respondent 1 had failed to account for and the respondent signed that document admitting the various sums. There is nothing to show that it was meant to be an acknowledgment to serve as evidence of liability. An admission of the correctness of accounts is not the same as acknowledgment of liability. The respondent's admission was taken on that memo so that he might not subsequently dispute its correctness. That document therefore could not be regarded as an acknowledgment under Sch. 1, Art. 1, Stamp Act, executed to supply evidence of the debt. In 49 M L J 306[1] it was held that a letter admitting that a certain account sent to the writer of it was correct did not require any stamp : see also A I R 1936 Mad 936[2] and A I R 1938 Pat 139.[3] That document was therefore admissible only to the extent of proving the admission by the respondent of the correctness of the memo of accounts. Even assuming that it was inadmissible the Courts below failed to see that the document was not the basis of the suit. It was neither being used by the plaintiff as an instrument of obligation nor as an acknowledgment to extend limitation. The suit was to enforce an oral promise to pay the amount which the respondent had failed to account for and the document was produced only as a piece of evidence in support of the plaintiff's allegation. In 27 N L R 56[4] it was pointed out that even when a promissory note fails for want of necessary stamp a suit would lie on the basis of an oral agreement to pay the debt. There is very clear evidence consisting of the testimony of Ganpat (P. W. 1) and Sakharam (P. W. 2) to prove the plaintiff's allegation as to the defendant's admission of his liability and promise to pay the sum due by him on the next day. That evidence is confirmed by the memo of accounts which bears the respondent's signature. There can be no question that the promise was made before the claim had become barred by time, whether the defendant left service on 18th May 1930 as he alleged or on 18th July 1930 as the plaintiff alleged; the plaintiff was entitled to ask for rendition of accounts within three years from either date. Respondent 1 admitted the liability within one year, that is on 2nd August 1931 and his promise to pay that amount was to pay a lawful debt. The suit must be held to be within time as against respondent 1.

As to respondents 2 to 4 the suit has rightly been thrown out. The plaintiff alleged a fresh agreement with the principal debtor and in order to impose its obligation on the sureties pleaded that they had also joined in the promise to pay. The lower appellate Court has disbelieved the plaintiff's witnesses as being interested in the plaintiff. The absence of their signature on the memo of accounts goes to a great extent to discredit the statement of the plaintiff's witnesses who are his servants. The result is that the appeal succeeds as against respondent 1 Hanmant only and fails as against respondents 2 to 4. Respondent 1 Hanmant will pay the costs of the plaintiff in all Courts and the appellant will pay the costs of respondents 2 to 4 in all Courts.

Umar Haji Karim Shop, Akola No. 15 Defendant — Appellant

Badridas Ramrai Shop, Akola and others — Plaintiffs — Respondents.

First Appeals Nos. 99-B of 1935 and 8 of 1936, Decided on 16th July 1940 from decree of Court of Sub-Judge, First Class, Akola, D/- 9th November 1935.

(a) Registration Act (1908), S. 49 — Unregistered sale deed may be used to explain nature of possession taken under it.

Though an unregistered deed of sale is ineffective to pass title, it can be used to explain the nature of the possession taken under it. It may operate as starting point for adverse possession of vendee if he has set up independent title in himself : A I R 1919 P C 44, Rel. on. [P 74 C 1]

(b) Adverse possession — Mortgage — Stranger entering into adverse possession of property burdened with simple mortgage—His adverse possession as against mortgagee does not commence until mortgagee has obtained decree for foreclosure.

If a stranger enters into adverse possession of property burdened with a simple mortgage, then he only prescribes for the interest of the person entitled to immediate possession, that is to say, of the mortgagor. All that the mortgagor has is the right to redeem. Therefore all that the stranger gets is the right to redeem. He does not get a full title to the property and as for the mortgagee, his right to possession does not accrue until he has obtained his decree for foreclosure, or in the case of a sale, until he has purchased, (if he happens to be the purchaser); therefore, adverse possession as against him does not commence until that date : A I R 1916 Mad 990 (F B); A I R 1914 All 95 (F B); A I R 1918 Cal 933 and (1882) 7 A C 235, Rel. on. [P 74 C 1]

(c) Mortgage — Stranger entering into adverse possession subsequent to mortgage—Suit by mortgagee for foreclosure without joining trespasser as party—Rights of mortgagee and trespasser and procedure to be followed stated.

A mortgagee is not affected by anything done behind his back after his mortgage; therefore he is entitled to foreclose his mortgagor, (or bring the property to sale), without joining subsequent purchasers of the right to redeem, (or those in a lesser position such as trespassers whose title had not yet ripened). And by so doing he acquires substantial rights. On the other hand the purchaser of the mortgagor's rights, or the trespasser who has, or is on the way to ousting him and acquiring his rights, is also not without rights : and he is clearly not affected by a litigation to which he was not a party. The only way to do justice between these two conflicting rights is to adjust the equities. They are best adjusted by affording the purchaser, or the trespasser, (as the case may be), an opportunity to redeem that portion of the property in which he is interested on paying a proportionate part of the mortgage money : A I R 1936 Mad 70, Rel. on. [P 75 C 2]

(d) Mortgage—Suit on mortgage — Lessee and trespasser are not necessary parties.

Though the lessee, and the trespasser, (or even the transferee) may be proper parties if their interests accrue subsequent to the mortgage, they are not necessary parties to a suit on mortgage. [P 76 C 1]

Judgment.—This judgment will govern First Appeal 99-B/35 as well as First Appeal 8/36. They both arise out of the same judgment. We will deal with F. A. 99-B/35 first. The facts were placed before us in a somewhat confused state but once they are disentangled the questions which remain are not difficult. The property in dispute consists of a number of different plots which have been shown in a map prepared by the commissioner appointed for that purpose in the lower Court. It originally belonged to one Hatamsha and from him descended to the defendants, (except the fifth and sixth), as shown in the following tree. Defendant 1 got an undivided 8 annas and defendants 2, 3 and 6 an undivided 2 annas 8 pies each. There has been no partition by metes and bounds but the parties being Mahomedans succeeded to separate and distinct shares.

The dispute in First Appeal 99-B/35 relates to plots Nos. 2 and 3. We take the numbers from the commissioner's map. We will recite the facts relating to plot No. 3 first. On 2nd July 1913 defendant 1 leased his undivided interest in plot No. 3 to defendant 15 (who is the appellant in this appeal) by a document Ex. 15., D-1. Exhibit P-10 is a copy of the same document. It will be convenient however to refer throughout to EX. 15., D-1. But though an undivided half interest was leased defendant 15 was placed in possession of the whole plot and it appears that he had been allowed to construct a substantial structure on this plot at some time anterior to the lease. Who had allowed him to do this has not been disclosed, but the lease deed refers to this fact and acknowledges that the superstructure on the plot belongs to defendant 15, and further states that even after the termination of the lease the lessee is not to be deprived of possession, unless the superstructure is paid for by the lessor. The recitals so far as they are relevant are as follows:

> . . . Hussainsha Fakir and, myself own a land measuring 30 X 30 feet' (this is plot No. 3) 'I am entitled to half of the aforesaid land as owner. I have given to you on rent my own half share in the aforesaid land for a period of six years . . . The land is bounded as under . . . Half the land of the land within the aforesaid boundary limits has as stated above, been given to you on rent for six years.
> . . . P. S. The superstructure constructed on the aforesaid land does not belong to us. It is constructed by you. It is owned by you. If after the expiry of the aforesaid period of six years I want to take back my land, I will pay you the price that the Panchas may fix of your superstructure on the land and then will take possession of the land. I will recover from you Rs. 16 by way of the rent of the land per year until I pay you the amount fixed by the Panchas on account of the superstructure.

It is to be observed that though the deed speaks of "half the land within the aforesaid boundaries" it means an undivided half and not a demarcated half. As a matter of fact, we understand that the superstructure covers the whole of this plot. It is also to be observed that though the deed speaks of the lessor having a half share in this plot that is not strictly accurate. What he had was an undivided half share in the whole of the property which consists of a number of plots and only an expectation of having this plot, or a half of it, assigned to his share at a partition. It will be necessary to take this into consideration when the property is divided at the partition. Two years after this lease, namely on 3rd November 1915, defendant 1 mortgaged his undivided 8 annas interest in the whole estate to the plaintiff. Then after this, on 30th May 1917, he sold his undivided half interest in plot No. 3 to defendant 15 by an unregistered deed of sale, Ex, 15D-2(A). Several years later defendant 3 mortgaged his undivided 2 annas 8 pies share in the whole estate to the plaintiff by two mortgage deeds, EX. P. 31 dated 2nd October 1923 and EX. P. 32 dated 11th March 1926.

In the year 1927 the plaintiff sued on his mortgages, obtained final decrees for foreclosure and eventually obtained joint possession, (the property was still undivided), on 21st December 1930 in the one case, and on 1st September 1930 in the other. Defendants 1 and 3 thus lost their respective interests in the estate and the plaintiff stepped into their shoes and became a co-owner to the extent of an undivided 10 annas 8 pies along with defendants 2 and 6. Defendant 15 was not joined in the mortgage suits and consequently is not bound by them. His interests are not affected by the decrees in any way. After this, on 1st May 1931, defendant 6 sold her undivided 2 annas 8 pies interest in plot No. 3 to defendant 15 by a registered sale deed, EX. 15D-2. The recitals state :

> 'I have this day sold to you the undermentioned immovable property' (plot No. 3) 'acquired by me under a deed of Mehar executed and registered in my favour by my husband on 20th September 1928 . . . . The entire land of the half joint share in the land within the aforesaid boundary limits . . . is sold . . . . The entire land within the aforesaid boundary limits is in your possession as a tenant for the last many years. On that entire land there is a pucca superstructure of tin roofing belonging to you. . . I having no concern with the said superstructure only owned the land of the half share. My husband had, as owner, given you on rent the aforesaid land and had delivered possession thereof to you. In the meanwhile the ownership of the said land was transferred to me under the deed of Meher . . .

It is necessary at this stage to explain the positions of defendants 4 and 5. Defendant 5 is a daughter of Mahebubsha, the brother of defendant 1. Mahebubsha died before the succession opened out and so defendant 1 obtained the entire 8 annas which fell to the share of that branch of the family. Defendant 5 got nothing. So far as defendant 4 is concerned, he inherited a 2 as. 8 ps. share, but out of this he transferred an undivided 2 as. 8 ps. interest in plot No. 3 to his wife, defendant 6, in lieu of Meher on 20th September 1928 as EX. 15D-2 recites. Thus she became the owner of that share in plot No. 3 to the exclusion of her husband. The present suit is a sequel to the plaintiff's mortgage suits. Having obtained an undivided 10 as. 8 ps. interest in the whole estate, and having been placed in joint possession thereof, the plaintiff now sues for partition and asks to be placed in undivided possession of such property as may be assigned to his share. But before this can be done it is necessary to decide the dispute which arises in connection with this plot (No. 3), because it will be necessary to direct the partitioning officer to assign this plot, so far as that is possible and convenient, to the shares of defendants 1 and 4. It will also be necessary to decide, as between the plaintiff and defendant 15, what the plaintiff is entitled to receive.

The first problem in the case arises out of the unregistered sale deed dated 30th May 1917. As a deed of sale it was ineffective to pass title. But defendant 15 pleaded that it was good enough to operate as a starting point for adverse possession. Their Lordships of the Privy Council decided in 43 Mad 244[1] that though an unregistered deed of this kind is ineffective to pass title, it can be used to explain the nature of the possession taken under it. It is quite clear from the document that from the date of its execution defendant 15 set up an independent title in himself and thus held adversely to defendant 1 from that day. He has continued to hold in that character down to the present day which is more than 12 years from that date. Therefore, as against defendant 15 defendant 1 forfeited his title on 30th May 1929. But this does not affect the plaintiff mortgagee. It is well settled that if a stranger enters into adverse possession of property burdened with a simple mortgage, then he only prescribes for the interest of the person entitled to immediate possession, that is to say, of the mortgagor. All that the mortgagor has is the right to redeem. Therefore all that the stranger gets is the right to redeem. He does not get a full title to the property, and as for the mortgagee, his right to possession does not accrue until he has obtained his decree for foreclosure, or in the case of a sale, until he has purchased, (if he happens to be the purchaser), therefore, adverse possession as against him does not commence until that date. This was decided in 39 Mad 811,[2] 36 ALL 567[3] at p. 571 and 44 Cal 425[4] at p. 433. It is also the English law: see (1882) 7 A C 235.[5]

But this does not solve the whole problem. All the cases cited above, except the Madras Full Bench, (including the House of Lords case from England) were cases in which the trespasser was joined as a party to the suit on the mortgage, and the question of his adverse possession was considered from that angle. In that class of case there is not much real difficulty. The principle that the possession of a trespasser who enters into possession after the date of the mortgage is not adverse to the mortgagee, and that therefore the mortgagee's rights are not affected can readily be accepted. Therefore so long as the mortgagee sues upon his mortgage to enforce his rights as mortgagee within limitation, it is clear that he can enforce these rights. But if he does not join the trespasser to his mortgage suit and sues later for possession upon his title, the position is not as clear. When there is a mortgage the original rights to the property are split up between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, some residing in one and the rest in the other. When the mortgagee eventually forecloses, (or buys in a case of sale), the two rights coalesce. But if the mortgagor no longer has that portion of the rights which reside in him at the date of the mortgagee's suit it is by no means clear that the mortgagee can obtain them by foreclosing the mortgagor, (or bringing the mortgaged property to sale), and omitting from the action the person in whom these rights really reside. It is immaterial for this purpose whether the stranger has acquired the mortgagor's rights by purchase or by adverse possession.

We can quite see that the mortgagee could sue again upon his mortgage and foreclose (or sell) as against the stranger, but if he does not do this, or if at the date of his suit for possession such an action would be barred, then the position is by no means clear. It is even more difficult when, as here, the trespasser's title to the mortgagor's rights happens to have been perfected during the pendency of the mortgagee's suit upon the mortgage against the mortgagor. The division between the interests which the mortgagor and mortgagee respectively have in the property mortgaged is not the same in India and in England, but bearing those differences in mind, the observations of Lord Selbourne in (1881) 6 Q B D 345[6] (which was later confirmed by the House of Lords in (1882) 7 A C 235[5]) bring out the point we are now considering :

> This being the position of the title, as long as the mortgage is redeemable, the effect of an order for foreclosure absolute is to vest the ownership of,

and the beneficial title to, the land for the first time in the person who previously was a mere incumbrancer. The equitable estate of the mortgagor is then forefeited and transferred to the mortgagee. It is transferred as effectually as if it had been conveyed or released . . . There can be no two things said Lord Manners in . . . more distinct or opposite than the possession as mortgagor and the possession as owner of the estate.

If these observations reflect the true position then it is difficult to see how the position of the mortgagee after foreclosure of the mortgagor, (or purchase), is better or worse than that of a person who buys property outright from another. If the vendor has lost all right, title and interest at the date of the sale, the vendee gets nothing. If there is a trespasser on the land at the time the vendee gets the vendor's rights to eject him. But he must bring his action within twelve years of the dispossession, because the adverse possession which had commenced against the vendor will run against the vendee as well. That is one point of view. The other way of looking at the matter is this. The trespasser only prescribes for the limited estate of the mortgagor when the property is burdened with a simple mortgage. Therefore, even though a suit on the mortgage may be barred as a suit on the mortgage against the stranger, all that the trespasser has acquired is a right to redeem. It is therefore inequitable to allow him to set up a higher right, namely the right to retain the property unconditionally, against the person in whom the larger title resides.

This difficulty was not considered by the Madras Full Bench in 39 Mad 811.[2] The sequence of events given in the report of that case is as follows: 1878, mortgage; 1890, trespasser enters upon the land; 1900, suit on the mortgage; trespasser not joined. November 1900, decree for sale. October 1906, mortgagee's successor (his widow) purchases. 1910, suit for possession against the trespasser. It will be seen that the position there was exactly the same as here. When the mortgagee sued on his mortgage the trespasser had not perfected his title, but he had had more than 12 years adverse possession before the mortgagee obtained his decree for sale. Unfortunately the only question referred for the consideration of the Full Bench was this:

Whether the possession of a trespasser who has dispossessed a mortgagor, the mortgage being simple, is adverse to the simple mortgagee.

The question was answered in the negative, and with that answer we fully agree. But what then? Was the mortgagee allowed to eject the trespasser? Or were the equities adjusted by giving the defendant an opportunity to redeem? And if so, to redeem what? The whole of the mortgaged property which might comprise, as here, many properties, or just the one item of property of which he had been in adverse possession by paying a proportionate part of the mortgage debt? None of these problems was discussed in that ruling nor does the report furnish us with the sequel. We think the true position has been explained by Ramesam J., in 59 Mad 312[7] at p. 334, namely that it is the kind of case in which the equities have to be worked out. The mortgagee is not affected by anything done behind his back after his mortgage, therefore he is entitled to foreclose his mortgagor, (or bring the property to sale), without joining subsequent purchasers of the right to redeem, (or those in a lesser position such as trespassers whose title had not yet ripened). And by so doing he acquires substantial rights. This is also the view of Lord Selbourne, (whose judgment was later upheld by the House of Lords), in the English case which we have cited above, though there the subsequent purchaser was as a matter of fact joined to the action on the mortgage. But the learned Lord Chancellor enunciates the principle that the mortgagee is not affected by his mortgagor's actions, (or absence of action), subsequent to the mortgage.

On the other hand the purchaser of the mortgagor's rights, or the trespasser who has, or is on the way to ousting him and acquiring his rights, is also not without rights: and he is clearly not affected by a litigation to which he was not a party. The only way to do justice between these two conflicting rights is to adjust the equities. We think that they are best adjusted by affording the purchaser, or the trespasser, (as the case may be), an opportunity to redeem that portion of the property in which he is interested on paying a proportionate part of the mortgage money. Another question was also raised and was more fully argued in the other appeal (F. A. 8/36), but it will be convenient to deal with it here. It was contended that a mortgage is one and indivisible and consequently if a person interested in the equity of redemption is omitted from a suit on the mortgage the mortgagee obtains no title as against him and loses his cause of action on the mortgage for ever. It was argued that every person interested in the equity of redemption must be joined and that this includes subsequent purchasers of the mortgagor's rights, lessees, tenants, trespassers, and so forth. The following rulings were relied on: 25 N L R 19,[8] at p. 26, 19 N L R 18,[9] 62 Cal 75,[10] at p. 77, 18 Cal 164[11] at p. 179, and 60 Cal 948.[12]

We need not go into this question here because it is possible to decide this matter on another ground. All we say now is that if that is really the law, then it will raise many practical difficulties and will seriously disturb the existing practice in this province. It will mean that whenever a mortgagee sues a malguzar, or other landlord of a village with tenants in it, then he will be obliged to join every tenant of the village, and every holder of every trumpery interest in it; and in large villages that may well run the defendants up to several hundreds. We also observe that it is possible that there is a difference between the words "interest in .... the property mortgaged or the right to redeem" used in S. 91, T. P. Act, and the words "right to enjoy" which occur in S.105. If the "right to enjoy" specified in S. 105 is different from the "interest" mentioned in S. 91, then the lessee who has only "a right to enjoy", and not an "interest", would not appear to be entitled to redeem. But the matter is debatable and we say no more about it.

The ground on which we proceed is this, namely that though the lessee, or the trespasser, (or even the transferee), may be proper parties if their interests accrue subsequent to the mortgage, they are not necessary parties. If the principle which we have enumerated above that the mortgagee cannot be affected by anything which is done behind his back and after his mortgage is correct, then he is entitled, if he so desires, to ignore these interests and proceed against his mortgagor on his contract. Having foreclosed his mortgagor, or purchased his interests at the auction in accordance with his contract, then he obtains all the interests which his mortgagor has in the estate at the date of the mortgage, subject, however, to subsequent equities. Those equities entitle him either to sue again upon his mortgage, if such a suit is still within time, or to sue upon his title, provided he affords the holder of the subsequent interest an opportunity to redeem such interest upon payment of a proportionate part of the mortgage amount. We have now to determine the extent of the mortgaged property in which defendant 15 is interested. In our opinion, it includes only the site of plot No. 3 and does not include the superstructure which stands on it. In this particular case we do not think that the superstructure can be said to form an accretion to the mortgaged estate.

The plot, or rather, defendant 1's half share in it, was leased to defendant 15 before the mortgage. The superstructure was then standing on it, and a condition of the lease was that the lessee was not to be evicted without the lessor paying for the building. The mortgagee was bound by these conditions when he later took his mortgage. Of course the lease has now merged in the higher rights which defendant 15 has acquired by his adverse possession. But we are not here dealing solely with legal rights. We are endeavouring to adjust the equities and in doing that we think that the fact that the superstructure was constructed by defendant 15 under the conditions mentioned above is a relevant consideration. As regards the other 2 as. 8 ps. share in plot No. 3 which defendant 15 claims, he obtained it by a registered sale deed from defendant 6. This defendant is not the plaintiff's mortgagor, and the plaintiff had not stepped into her shoes, or those of her husband defendant 4. Defendant 15 has consequently a clear title to an undivided 2 as. 8 ps. share in this plot.

This leaves us with a complicated situation. We think that the fairest method of working out the equities will be to assign an undivided half share in the plot to the share of the plaintiff's mortgagor defendant 1 (into whose shoes the plaintiff has now stepped), and an undivided 2 as. 8 ps. share to the share of defendant 6 (who stands in the shoes of her husband defendant 4). As regards the remaining 5 as. 4 ps. share that will be turned into cash and the money will be thrown into hotchpot. Defendant 15 will be allowed to redeem within six months an undivided 8 as. share in the plot (site only) on paying to the plaintiff a proportionate share of the mortgage amount, the proportion to be calculated on the basis of the site without its superstructure. Defendant 15 will also buy out the remaining undivided 5 as. 4 ps. share (site only) by paying into Court, within six months, its market value at the date of the suit. This money will be thrown into hotchpot and will be treated as a cash asset available for distribution at the partition. On failure of defendant 15 to redeem as above and to pay for the 5 as. 4 ps. share, or either, the property, including the superstructure, will be put to auction, and the proceeds will be distributed over the site and the superstructure by the lower Court. Such sum as the lower Court apportions to the superstructure will be handed over to defendant 15, and such sum as represents the site will be thrown into hotchpot.

We now turn to plot No. 2. There is no real dispute about this. Defendant 15 pleaded that he was a lessee of this plot under an oral lease granted before the mortgage by the first four defendants. His original statement dated 26th July 1933 is a little confused and the plaintiff appears to have read an assertion of adverse possession into it, and the issue has been framed accordingly. But we do not think that that was meant. The allegation of adverse possession related to plot No. 3 and not to plot No. 2. In any case the matter was cleared up in 15th defendant's statement of 10th August 1933 where he stated that he was prepared to pay the rent to the plaintiff if this field was allotted to the share of his mortgagors. The only contention the plaintiff raised in respect of this plot was that defendant 15 was a lessee and not an owner. The parties are therefore not really at issue on this point. It is accepted that an oral lease would be good. It is possible that disputes will arise hereafter when and if the plaintiff endeavours to determine the lease. But all that is premature now. Both sides agreed before us that these matters may be left open, that is to say, they accept the position that defendant 15 is a lessee and that he will attorn to whoever gets this plot at the partition, and that he will be bound by the terms of the lease (whatever they were), as also will his new landlord. It is however necessary to state that defendant 15 claims the superstructure on this plot as his own. The lower Court finds that this is so and there has been no appeal by the plaintiff against that finding. It will therefore have to be accepted that the superstructure is 15th defendant's but the other questions relating to this are left open. That is to say, we do not decide whether defendant 15 will have to remove the superstructure on the determination of the lease, or whether the plaintiff will have to pay him its price as a condition precedent to eviction.

The decree will accordingly contain a declaration to the effect that defendant 15 is a lessee of plot No. 2 and that he will continue to hold on the old conditions, (conditions which are not determined in this suit), after partition, and that he will have to attorn to whichever person receives this plot at the partition. This concludes F. A. 99-B/35. The success and failure in it are about equal. As regards plot No. 2, there was never any real dispute. As regards plot No. 3 each side claimed the plot as his own. In the result neither gets it without being compelled to recognize the rights of the other. We consider therefore that each side should bear his own costs vis-a-vis each other both here and in the lower Court. We turn now to F. A. 8/36. Defendant 16 is the appellant and he is interested in plot No. 1. The position here is a curious one. The plaintiff impleaded this defendant on the ground that he was in possession of plot No. 1 as a lessee from defendants 1 and 2, (para. 17 of the plaint), and that he (the plaintiff) did not want to be obstructed in his enjoyment of whatever property might be assigned to his share. Defendant 16 thereupon set up a title in himself adverse to that of the plaintiff. He said that he had been sold this plot by defendant 1 about 40 years before the suit, that is to say, long before the mortgages under which the plaintiff claims title. The sale is said to have been an oral one. It is admitted that in those days an oral sale was effective to pass title in Berar because the Transfer of Property Act had not then been introduced there.

The plaintiff denied this sale, and the lower Court upheld his contention and found that the sale was not proved. That leaves us with the position that this defendant was, on the plaintiff's allegation, a lessee. As such he was not a necessary party to the suit and should have been discharged; in fact that is what he asked for at one stage. But since then he has taken up the attitude, and has maintained it before us, that the plaintiff could get no title whatever to the property as against him because he was not joined as a party to the plaintiff's mortgage suits. We have already dealt with this argument in the other appeal and do not think it is well founded. We have no doubt that the plaintiff obtained a good title. All that has happened, or rather that will happen if this plot is assigned to the share of the plaintiff, is that there will be a change of landlords. In view of the fact that the matter has been fought out up to this stage, we think that instead of discharging this defendant and thus allowing him to raise all these pleas over again it will be more satisfactory all round to embody a declaration about this plot in the decree as in the other case. The declaration will state that defendant 16 is a lessee of plot No. 1 holding from defendants 1 and 2 on the old terms, (terms which are not decided in this suit), and that he will have to attorn to whichever party obtains plot No. 1 when the property is divided. This is virtually what the lower Court has done. This appeal therefore fails and is dismissed with costs.

A limited owner such as a Hindu widow or a daughter under the Benares law, is entitled to enter into any agreement involving alienation of part of the property to meet the cost of litigation for recovering the property claimed by her because preservation of the estate for the benefit of the rightful heirs of the last male owner is itself a benefit to the family, provided the particular alienation or transaction made by the limited owner in the circumstances in which she is situated is prudent, fair and reasonable having regard to the conflicting rights of the limited owner and reversioner: Case law discussed. [P 78 C 2 ; P 79 C 1]

Judgment. — This appeal is allied to First Appeal No. 26 of 1933 and Second Appeal No. 143 of 1936.[1] The facts are stated at length in our judgment in First Appeal No. 26 of 1933. The facts that are material for the disposal of this appeal are that Mt. Bulki filed Civil Suit No. 381 of 1883 to recover possession of 5 as. 4 ps. share of mouza Wathoda which she claimed on her mother's death, as the separate property of her father. As she had no resources she, on 8th October 1883, entered into an agreement with Maniram, Chhotelal and Umediprasad whereby they undertook to defray the expenses of litigation and she promised to give each of them a quarter share of the property that she would recover on her success. She succeeded in the suit in recovering possession of 2 as. 8 ps. share and transferred 8 pies share including some fields to each of the three financiers. The suit out of which this appeal arises was filed by the appellant to recover possession of this 2 annas share from the representatives of the original transferees. The question which arose in this suit was whether the agreement dated 8th October 1883 was justified by legal necessity. The original Court accepted the plaintiff's contention and decreed the suit. The first appellate Court took the contrary view and dismissed the suit. That decree was upheld by Bose J. in second appeal.

The only question material for consideration in this appeal is whether a limited owner such as a Hindu widow or a daughter under the Benares law, is entitled to enter into any agreement involving alienation of part of the property to meet the cost of litigation for recovering the property claimed by her. In 12 Cal 52,[2] 4 Luck 26,[3] 31 Cal 433[4] and 31 ALL 497[5] it was held that it was competent to a limited owner to incur a debt and alienate sufficient part of property to discharge it for defending her title to the estate claimed by her. We do not see any reason why the same rule should not apply when having been excluded from the estate she is driven to institute a suit for recovering it. If a litigation attacking her title affords justification for charging the costs of litigation on the estate, a fortiori would a suit by her to recover the estate from which she is wrongfully excluded. In either case she would be under the necessity to defend the title of the last male owner under whom she claims. In fact in such a case the necessity will be the greater as her inaction would mean the loss of the estate with the deprivation of the maintenance of those who are dependent on the estate. Preservation of the estate for the benefit of the rightful heirs of the last male owner is itself a benefit to the family. In 31 ALL 497[5] their Lordships of the Privy Council held that the preservation of the estate and the cost of litigation for that purpose were objects which justified a widow in incurring debt and alienating a sufficient amount of the property to discharge it. In 29 N L R 41[6] it was held that the test to determine whether the transaction was legally necessary or beneficial, is not whether it was of defensive nature or otherwise, but to see whether the transaction was fair and proper; that was the test which their Lordships had applied in 1 Pat 741.[7] In that case they pointed out that the word necessity does not mean actual compulsion but the kind of pressure which the law recognizes as serious and sufficient. In 40 Mad 709[8] their Lordships of the Privy Council while considering the question as to the meaning of the expression "benefit to the estate" observed as follows:

> No indication is to be found in any of them as to what is, in this connexion, the precise nature of the things to be included under the description "benefit to the estate." It is impossible, their Lordships think, to give a precise definition of it applicable to all cases, and they do not attempt to do so. The preservation, however, of the estate from extinction, the defence against hostile litigation affecting it, the protection of it or portions from injury or deterioration by inundation, these and such like things would obviously be benefits. The difficulty is to draw the line as to what are, in this connexion, to be taken as benefits and what not.

Is it possible to draw the line between a suit filed against a widow to deprive her of her husband's or father's estate and one filed by her to recover such estate from a trespasser? It cannot logically be said that in one case there is necessity or benefit to the estate and in the other case there is not. The safer course is not to attempt the impossible task of framing an exhaustive definition of the term 'necessity' but to decide on the particular facts of each case whether or not the particular alienation or transaction made by a limited owner in the circumstances in which she is situated is prudent, fair and reasonable. The words occurring in the original text of the Mitakshara, Chap. I, section 1, pp. 28 and 29 are 'apatkale' i. e., in times of distress and 'kutumbarthe' i. e., benefit to the family. The benefit to the family as pointed out in 46 Bom 312[9] may, under certain circumstances mean a necessity for the transaction. It is clear that the terms benefit and necessity are convertible terms. Necessity or benefit is only one of the phases of the test of propriety: see 43 Cal 574.[10] So one comes back again to the test "Is the transaction fair and proper?"

The two tests which have been formulated in the present case by Bose J. are: (1) whether the agreement is reasonable and prudent and having regard to conflicting rights of the limited owner and reversioner, was it just and fair to both? and (2) could she reasonably have made a better bargain? These tests are, in our opinion, perfectly sound and in accordance with the principles enunciated by their Lordships of the Privy Council as being applicable to the case of alienations by a limited owner. As we concur with Bose J. in the tests applied by him for judging the binding character of the agreement under consideration, there is nothing left in the appeal to call for our interference in view of the concurrent finding on the point of necessity. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Babulal Nandram and others — Defendants — Appellants

Maniklal Beharilal — Plaintiff — Respondent.

First Appeal No. 26 of 1933 and Second Appeal No. 143 of 1936, Decided on 21st August 1940, from decree of Sub-Judge, First Class, Wardha, D/- 27th October 1932.

(a) Hindu Law — Alienation — Legal necessity — Transaction ancient — Witnesses and parties dead — Presumption of legal necessity is justified and onus would be on reversioner to prove absence of legal necessity — Thirty years' rule suggested should be applied.*

In the case of an ancient transaction, it must be presumed that the alienation was lawful i. e., justified by legal necessity. The difficulty no doubt lies in fixing the length of time (intervening between the transaction and its challenge in a suit) that would be necessary to justify the application of that presumption. It is impossible to lay down any hard and fast rule. But on the principle underlying S. 89, Evidence Act, relating to documents 30 years old, the presumption in favour of the existence of necessity may well be applied to transfers more than 30 years old provided that the original parties and witnesses to it are not available at the trial for bearing testimony to the circumstances in which the transaction was concluded. The presumption will operate with greater force in a case where the reversioner fails to bring a declaratory suit during the life time of the alienor. In such a case it would not be unreasonable to assume that the failure to sue for declaration was due to the existence of evidence proving necessity and the Courts would be justified in placing the onus on the reversioner of proving absence of legal necessity. A I R 1920 P C 64; A I R 1922 P C 163 and 19 Mad 485, Rel. on. [P 82 C 1, 2]

(b) Hindu Law — Partition — Shares defined in revenue papers is alone not sufficient to displace presumption of jointness.

A definition of shares in revenue and village papers affords but a very slight indication of an actual separation in a Hindu family. Such a definition of shares, standing alone, is not sufficient evidence to displace the presumption in law which is peculiarly strong in the case of sons of one father. A I R 1925 P C 132 and A I R 1925 P C 49, Rel. on. [P 82 C 2]

(c) Hindu Law — Alienation — Widow — Compromise fair and prudent — Alienation involved in compromise binds reversioner.

If the compromise is fair, reasonable and prudent in the circumstances in which a widow is placed, the alienation which is involved in the compromise must bind the reversioner. The alienation cannot be considered apart from the compromise. [P 84 C 1]

(d) C. P. Tenancy Act (1 of 1920), Ss. 49 and 37 — Both proprietary and cultivating rights given up — Person acquiring such rights can transfer cultivating rights to another.

Where the cultivating rights also have been given up along with the proprietary rights, a person acquiring both the rights in respect of a field can transfer the cultivating rights to any one he pleases or confirm the transfer of them if they had already been transferred. [P 84 C 2]

D. T. Mangalmurti — for Respondent.

Judgment.—This appeal and Second Appeal No. 143 of 1936 and Letters Patent Appeal No. 18 of 1938[1] arise out of three suits filed by the respondent in his capacity as reversioner, to set aside certain alienations made by his mother in favour of the predecessors of the three sets of defendants. The principal question involved in all these suits was one of legal necessity. This appeal and Second Appeal No. 143 of 1936 involve common questions of fact and law. This judgment will therefore govern the disposal of both. To elucidate the form in which the question of legal necessity arises it is necessary to narrate the facts at some length. The dispute in the suits relates to 5 as. 4 ps. share of mouza Wathoda. The field which was originally numbered 6 and is now included in fields Nos. 27, 28 and 29 of the current settlement, is alleged to be sir land appurtenant to 2 as. 8 ps. share which, at a revenue partition, had been carved out of the original 5 as. 4 ps. share. The entire village of Wathoda, it appears, had been acquired by Chintaman, the father of Uderam, Mohan and Balgovind, long before the first proprietary settlement of 1860. At this settlement the village was recorded in shares as follows:

Uderam	...	0-5-4 share
Ramdin son of Mohan	...	0-5-4 share
Tulsiram and Bodhiprasad sons of Balgovind	...	0-2-8 share each.

On the death of Uderam in 1868, the 5 as. 4 ps. share recorded in his name was mutated in the name of his widow Mt. Gangabai and on Ramdin's death in 1872, the share of 5 as. 4 ps. standing against his name was mutated in the name of his father Mohan. On Gangabai's death in 1870, the 5 as. 4 ps. share standing in her name was mutated in the names of Mohan and Bodhiprasad, with the result that the share of each of them augmented to 8 annas. In 1874, they got an imperfect partition of the village effected, as a consequence of which the 8 as. shares in the village were partitioned into two khels described as khel A and khel B. Khel A was allotted to Mohan and khel B to Bodhiprasad. Mohan sold his 8 as. share including field No. 6 which was then recorded as his malik wahit to Venkatrao Gharpure on 23rd May 1881. That field was then in the possession and enjoyment of his mistress by name Gaji through whom it passed to her son-in-law Nandram and other defendants. Nandram is now represented by his adopted son Babulal, appellant 1.

Uderam had a daughter by name Bulki. At the time of the death of Gangabai, her mother, in 1870, she was a minor. One would expect that her father's 5 as. 4 ps. share would be mutated in her name. But it appears that as Mohan, her uncle and Sunder, her aunt agreed to maintain her and meet the expenses of her marriage, her father's 5 as. 4 ps. share came to be mutated in the name of Mohan and Bodhiprasad the son of her deceased uncle Balgovind. They however failed to carry out the obligation which they had taken upon themselves. Consequently, Bulki represented by her grandmother Kasturibai, filed Civil Suit No. 511 of 1871 against Mohan's son Ramdin and Bodhiprasad to recover some moveable property. But that suit was dismissed. Subsequently Mt. Bulki filed Civil Suit No. 381 of 1883 against Mohan, Mt. Gaji, Venkatrao Gharpure and Bodhiprasad to recover the 5 as. 4 ps. share which had been recorded in the name of her mother. As apparently she had no resources to enable her to carry on the litigation, she entered into an agreement with certain persons named Maniram, Umediprasad and Chhotelal on 8th October 1883, whereby they agreed to finance the litigation in consideration of which she in her turn agreed to part with three quarters of the property in case she succeeded in the suit.

At any stage of Suit No. 381 of 1883, Bulki compromised her claim against Mohan, Mt. Gaji and Venkatrao on 3rd November 1883. In pursuance of that compromise she transferred 2 as. 8 ps. share out of what she claimed to Venkatrao for Rs. 800. She thereafter withdrew her claim against Venkatrao, Mohan and Gaji who was then in possession of the sir field No.6, the subject-matter of this appeal. The question which arises upon this appeal is whether this sale deed dated 3rd November 1883 in favour of Venkatrao which was followed by the withdrawal of the claim against Venkatrao and Gaji, was justified by legal necessity or not. That issue arises directly in Second Appeal No. 143 of 1936. On that issue both the Courts below have agreed in finding that the alienation was made in the circumstances which would justify the inference of the existence of legal necessity for it. The suit out of which this first appeal arises, was decided by another Court. It came to a different conclusion as it was of opinion that Mt. Bulki fell a victim to fraud on the part of Mohan and his transferee Venkatrao. It is this conception which has largely influenced the decision of that Court.

The transaction which is impeached took place as far back as 1883, 45 years before the suits out of which these appeals arise, were filed. The plaintiff came into the world nine years after the transaction and had attained majority 18 years before he instituted the suits. Mt. Bulki, his mother, survived the transaction for 43 years. It was open to the plaintiff-respondent to file a suit any time during his minority and within three years on his attaining majority, for a declaration that the transaction was devoid of legal necessity. He omitted to take action along that line. He thus suffered 21 years to lapse during the life-time of his mother, the alienor, and he instituted these suits two years after her death and 45 years after the transaction, seeking to upset what in practice must be regarded as established titles. During this long period of nearly half a century, the original purchaser Venkatrao and his son died, with the result that his grand-son who, like the plaintiff, was not even born at the time when the transaction sought to be impeached took place, and others who were not parties to the transaction are now confronted with the superhuman task of proving the necessity to justify this ancient alienation. The best proof of the circumstances in which the transaction occurred, could naturally have come from the parties to it or those who witnessed it. They have all disappeared from this world and the defendants are deprived of their best evidence. In these circumstances it is not humanly possible to produce direct evidence to discharge the burden which lies on them. Cases are not a few where a reversioner standing in the position of the plaintiff, is tempted to exploit this inherent helplessness of a party who derives his title from an ancient transaction. The rule that the onus of proving legal necessity lies on the alienee, was long ago found by the Courts to be inequitable in its application to cases of ancient transactions. As far back as 1896 their Lordships of the Madras High Court, in 19 Mad 485[2] thought that it was unreasonable and inequitable to throw on the defendants the onus of showing that the original alienation was for a necessity binding on the reversioner. The judgment in which these observations were made was no doubt reversed in the Privy Council on a different point, but the view taken there as to the onus of proof was approved by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 46 Bom 481[3] in these words :

> In 19 Mad 485[2] it was pointed out that although the manager for the time being had no power to make a permanent alienation of temple property in the absence of proved necessity for the alienation, yet the long lapse of time between the alienation and the challenge of its validity is a circumstance which enables the Court to assume that the original grant was made in exercise of that extended power. Their Lordships have no hesitation in applying the doctrine in the present case.

Their Lordships proceed :

> At the lapse of 100 years, when every party to the original transaction has passed away, and it becomes completely impossible to ascertain what were the circumstances which caused the original grant to be made, it is only following the policy which the Courts always adopt, of securing as far as possible quiet possession to people who are in apparent lawful holding of an estate, to assume that the grant was lawfully and not unlawfully made.

In 43 Mad 541[4] the suit was one by a reversioner to set aside an alienation by a widow made in 1830, on the ground that it was made without legal necessity. The widow died in 1900 and the suit was instituted in 1903 involving an enquiry into the circumstances of the transaction more than 82 years after it took place. The District Court found that there was no legal necessity for the same and decreed the suit. But the High Court held that the legal necessity had been proved and reversed the judgment of the trial Judge. The High Court was mainly influenced by the fact that the reversioner had failed to file a declaratory suit during the life-time of the widow and it construed the reversioner's silence and inaction for a long time as raising a presumption in favour of legal necessity. The learned Judges of the High Court in their judgment had propounded the law as follows:

It is not disputed that the onus lay upon the defendant to prove the necessity for the sale, but having regard to the great lapse of time since the transaction took place, perhaps the highest on record, it will not be reasonable to expect such full and detailed evidence as to the state of things which gave rise to the sale in question as in the case of alienations made at more recent dates. In such circumstances presumptions are permissible to fill in the details which have been obliterated by time.

Their Lordships of the Privy Council adopted that statement of law as a sound one. It is clear that in the case of an ancient transaction, it must be presumed that the alienation was lawful i. e., justified by legal necessity. The difficulty no doubt lies in fixing the length of time (intervening between the transaction and its challenge in a suit) that would be necessary to justify the application of that presumption. It is impossible to lay down any hard and fast rule. But it appears to us that on the principle underlying S. 89, Evidence Act, relating to documents 30 years old, the presumption in favour of the existence of necessity may well be applied to transfers more than 30 years old provided that the original parties and witnesses to it are not available at the trial for bearing testimony to the circumstances in which the transaction was concluded. The presumption will operate with greater force in a case where the reversioner fails to bring a declaratory suit during the life time of the alienor. It would not be unreasonable to assume that the failure to sue for declaration was due to the existence of evidence proving necessity. In any case, application of the rule as to presumption would depend on the particular facts of each case and we are decidedly of opinion that the facts and circumstances of this case are such as to justify the placing of onus on the reversioner of proving absence of legal necessity. On behalf of the reversioner it is contended that the evidence as it stands on record is sufficient to disprove the necessity for the transaction. That contention is founded on the facts that the village had been recorded in the names of the three brothers or their sons according to their respective shares; that Uderam's 0-5-4 share was mutated in the name of his widow, Mt. Gangabai, and that the transferee Venkatrao admitted the title of Bulki and paid her the price of the 0-2-8 share which he purchased during the pendency of Civil Suit No. 381 of 1883. In addition to these circumstances, stress is laid on Bulki's success in the suit against Bodhiprasad. These are no doubt ostensibly in favour of the reversioner, but on careful scrutiny they would be found to be inconclusive. The record of the separate shares is by itself not sufficient to prove a partition among the brothers. In 29 C W N 1037[5] at p. 1046 their Lordships of the Privy Council point out that a definition of shares in revenue and village papers affords but a very slight indication of an actual separation in a Hindu family, and that in no case could they have regarded such a definition of shares, standing alone, as sufficient evidence to displace the presumption in law which is peculiarly strong in the case of sons of one father. In 48 MAD 254[6] at p. 257 their Lordships of the Privy Council observed as follows:

But the mere fact that the shares of the coparceners have been ascertained does not by itself necessarily lead to an inference that the family had separated. There may be reasons other than a contemplated immediate separation for ascertaining what the shares of the coparceners on a separation would be.

Their Lordships' observations made in this case indicate the inconclusive character of the definition of shares as evidence to justify the inference of partition. In the present case, the statements of the parties in whose names the shares were recorded are significant. In Ex. P-3 Ramdin, Tulsiram and Uderam stated in 1860 that they were each owners of 1/3rd share of mouza Wathoda, but they did not say when the partition had taken place. In Exs. P-6 and P-7 filed in Civil Suit No. 11 of 1933 = old No. 164 of 1928, there are to be found very significant statements to show that there was no formal partition. Both these documents are copies of wajib-ul-arz of the year 1860. In Ex. P-6 it is noted as follows:

> In the beginning this village was rith (uninhabited). Then in the year 1233 faslee our father populated the same. Particulars regarding the hissadari (copartners) will be clear from the fard (schedule or statement) included in this wajib-ul-arz. And there are no cosharers.

In Ex. P-7 (vide cl. 3 regarding the partition of land), it is noted:

> The land of this village had not been divided. All are responsible for the profit and loss according to their respective shares .... We three are equal cosharers, are of the same caste and belong to the same family ..... We three will jointly recover nikasi, get the kabuliyat and give pattas ..... At present there is no dispute regarding anything whatsoever. If any dispute arises we will make an application to Government and will get khel partition effected so that there shall be no occasion for dispute and everyone will be responsible for his respective share.

That goes to show that in 1860 the village was joint and that the three brothers were managing it jointly and that they intended to effect a partition when disputes arose in their common enjoyment. That they were joint in estate and enjoyment is made very clear from the statement of Sundar Patlin in Ex. D-24. She was the guardian mother of Bodhiprasad. It was she who wished to separate and asked for a revenue partition. She unequivocally stated:

> Up to this day the defendant's and my wahiwat of the village have continued joint. But as I am not on good terms with the defendant at present, I desire the separation of my share.

This statement throws a clear light on the meaning of what was stated in 1860. The parties had got their respective shares entered separately, not as evidence of partition that had taken place, but a partition they intended to make in case of dispute. Against this there is no doubt the mutation in favour of Mt. Gangi after Uderam's death. But on Gangi's death it is remarkable that the 0.5.4 share was recorded in the name of Mohan and Bodhiprasad in pursuance of their agreement with Mt. Kasturibai that they would maintain her grand-daughter Bulki and perform her marriage at their expense. The fact that Bulki's grand-mother Kasturibai agreed to have the shares recorded in their names on that condition, militates against the theory of partition. It would thus appear that Mt. Bulki's claim made in Civil Suit No. 381 of 1883 was by no means unanswerable. The case against her could have been strongly presented by Venkatrao who was a leading pleader at Wardha, had he not gone out of the suit in consequence of the compromise.

It is not suggested that she had no case, but what is suggested is that Venkatrao also had a good case on his side in view of the evidence indicated above. Their dispute was therefore a bona fide one. The question is whether the settlement of the dispute was fair and prudent or not. Mt. Bulki was then representing the estate which the reversioner now claims. It appears to us that in entering into the compromise as she did, she acted exactly as any sensible person in her position would do. The result of the contest as it then must have appeared to them was highly uncertain. It was therefore natural and prudent for both parties to avoid the contest and hit upon a via media that would satisfy either party. That course could be no other than the one that they should acknowledge each other's claims and arrive at a compromise on that basis. Venkatrao consequently admitted her title and Bulki admitted his right to continue in possession provided he paid her Rs. 800. There is no suggestion that the consideration was inadequate. It must therefore be held that both parties dealt with each other at arm's length and concluded in amicable settlement in a way fair and beneficial to both. There was neither fraud nor any unfair advantage gained by one party over the other. That it was a fair settlement is attested by the fact that Mohan, the then next reversioner, and Bulki's husband accepted it. Even her financiers, whose interest was substantially affected by the compromise, acquiesced in the same. That compromise greatly strengthened her case against Bodhiprasad and she ultimately succeeded in her suit against him.

That being the nature of the compromise it must bind the reversioner. In 1 Pat 741[7] their Lordships of the Privy Council held that an alienation which is the result of a compromise that is reasonable and prudent, and for the interest of the estate, binds the reversioners. In A I R 1930 P C 163[8] their Lordships of the Privy Council referred to the Patna case with approval and expressed their opinion that to determine the reasonableness and prudence of the compromise, it must be judged merely as a business transaction. It is clear that if it stands that test, it is a reasonable and prudent transaction from the point of view of the estate. The words 'benefit to the estate' cannot be defined in precise terms. As pointed out by Shah J. in 46 Bom 312[9] at p. 315 the benefit to the family may under certain circumstances mean a necessity for the transaction. He refers to the original text in the Mitakshara, Chap. I, S. 1, Paras. 28 and 29, where the words 'Apatkale' i. e., in times of distress and 'kutumbarthe' i. e., for the purposes of the family, occur and observes that these expressions must be interpreted with due regard to the conditions of modern life. If the compromise was fair, reasonable and prudent in the circumstances in which Mt. Bulki was placed, the alienation which was involved in the compromise must bind the reversioner. The contention raised here that the alienation should be considered apart from the compromise cannot be accepted as sound. The next question is whether, notwithstanding that the compromise with Venkatrao was fair and reasonable, the reversioner is entitled to dispute the title of the appellants who are the representatives of Mt. Gaji.

From the pleadings no doubt it appears that Bulki wished to prosecute her suit against Gaji in spite of the compromise (Ex. D-4 in Civil Suit No. 11 of 1933). But on 17th June 1884 she withdrew her claim against Gaji also. She had to do so for the obvious reason that field No. 6 was appurtenant to the 2 as. 8 ps. share which passed under the compromise to Venkatrao and she had under that compromise agreed to withdraw her claim against Gaji also. By her sale deed dated 3rd November 1883 she transferred to Venkatrao all such rights as her father Uderam had in 2 as. 8ps. share recorded in his name. That would include the cultivating rights in field No. 6 also. In Ex. P-2 that field is shown as being in his cultivation. The question whether it was sir or khudkasht is immaterial as in any case the cultivating rights also had been given up along with the proprietary rights. If Venkatrao acquired both the rights in respect of that field, he could transfer the cultivating rights to any one he pleased or confirm the transfer of them if they had already been transferred by Mohan to Gaji. Consequently the plaintiff's claim must fail against Gaji's representatives. The result is that this appeal succeeds and the plaintiff's suit fails. The plaintiff-respondent will pay the appellants' costs in both the Courts. Second Appeal No. 143 of 1936 fails and the appellant will pay the respondents' costs in all the Courts.

R.K. Order accordingly.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 2 (2)—Decree—Matters determined must be of substance granting or denying remedy on part of plaintiff — Two alternative modes of seeking remedy — Court holding that one is not available — Decision is appealable.*

What are being referred to in S. 2 are matters of substance which the suit is concerned to have determined in order to lead to a remedy on the part of the plaintiff or to a denial of a remedy on the part of plaintiff: AIR 1914 Bom 149, Ref., and AIR 1921 Bom 220 Rel. on. [P 85 C 2]

Where there are two alternative modes of seeking a remedy and a Court finally decides that one of those modes is not available that branch of the case is finally decided ; that branch of the case relates to substantive rights and raises a matter of controversy in the suit. It does not raise all the matters of controversy, but S. 2 clearly distinguishes between "all" and "any" and hence an appeal lies from such decision. [P 85 C 2; P 86 C 1]

Judgment.—Before we come to deal with this appeal it is necessary to deal with the preliminary objection that has been raised as to the maintainability of the appeal. Before that can be understood it is necessary to state certain facts. The plaintiffs are the appellants and the suit claims the reliefs based on two different causes of action. Apparently property was sold at a revenue sale by public auction and defendant 1, according to the plaintiffs' case, purchased the property benami on behalf of the plaintiffs. Alternatively, the plaintiffs claim the suit property on the ground that after that sale had been completed the defendant executed a deed of transfer in favour of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs are endeavouring to obtain a declaration that they are owners and entitled to possession of the suit property. A preliminary issue was struck to the following effect: "Does S. 66, Civil P. C., apply to this claim and is the suit not maintainable?" In the result the learned Judge who considered that preliminary issue came to the conclusion that the principle underlying S. 66, Civil P, C., did apply to the claim and that the suit was not maintainable so far as that part of it was concerned which claimed on the basis that the defendant was a benamidar. Accordingly the learned Judge ordered the plaintiffs to put in a new plaint striking out all those allegations and claims in their plaint which related to this branch of the case. In that state of fact the counsel for the respondent relying chiefly on 19 CWN 755,[1] also upon 17 N L R 66[2] at p. 68, 26 N L R 24[3] and 39 Bom 339,[4] urges that no appeal lies. Whether appeal lies or not depends, in our opinion, upon whether this adjudication, whether it be called an order or whether it be called a judgment of the learned Judge, is an adjudication that falls within the definition of "decree" in the Civil Procedure Code which provides inter alia as follows:

> Decree means the formal expression of an adjudication which, so far as regards the Court expressing it, conclusively determines the rights of the parties with regard to all or any of the matters in controversy in the suit and may be either preliminary or final.

We think that a certain amount of difficulty has been felt by confusing "matters in controversy in the course of litigation" with "matters in controversy in the suit." For example in 39 Bom 339[4] Beaman J. puts the case that if every final decision on a matter of dispute were treated as a decree > it would be virtually impossible to deny that any ruling as to whether a document tendered were admissible or not, or a question objected to, relevant, would also be a preliminary decree.

But with great respect, in our opinion such questions as those are matters of controversy that arise in a litigation. One can give endless instances. For instance counsel rises and asks that the case be adjourned owing to private ill-health. The other side is constrained to oppose the adjournment. That is a matter in controversy in the litigation. No one would suggest that it is a matter of controversy in the suit. What are being referred to in S. 2 in our opinion, are matters of substance which the suit is concerned to have determined in order to lead to a remedy on the part of the plaintiff or to a denial of a remedy on the part of the plaintiff, and that is what the Bombay High Court indicated in 45 Bom 627[5] at p. 632 where it was observed:

> Where issues both of law and of fact arise in the same suit and the Court is of opinion that the case or any part thereof may be disposed of on the issues of law only, it shall try those issues first and for that purpose may, if it thinks fit, postpone the settlement of the issues of fact until after the issues of law have been determined: O. 14, R. 2. Nothing is said regarding the procedure at the trial of such issues but following the analogy of O. 15, R. 3 judgment should only be pronounced when the finding disposes of the case or a part of the case which would then be final pro tanto.

In our opinion, this is directly within that observation as it is within the remarks passed in 17 N L R 66[2] at p. 68. The result of the order that has been passed in this matter is to conclude one branch of this case. That is as absolutely at an end as though the claim has been dismissed. It is only because the plaintiff happens to have put in an alternative ground of claim based on a different cause of action that there is anything left of this case. Counsel has urged in support of this preliminary objection that that makes all the difference because it results in this adjudication not being final and conclusive, for, if the plaintiff wins on his second line of attack he wins just as satisfactorily as if he had won on his first line of attack. But, in our opinion, that is not the right way to look at the matter. Here there are two alternative modes of seeking a remedy. If a Court finally decides that one of those modes is not available that branch of the case is finally decided ; that branch of the case relates to substantive rights and raises a matter of controversy in the suit. It does not raise all the matters of controversy, but S. 2 clearly distinguishes between "all" and " any". Out of two this decides one and for that reason we are of the opinion that the preliminary objection fails.

That leads up to the main question. When we get to that we realize why counsel pressed so strongly his preliminary objection because it is quite clear that this order cannot be supported. It is conceded by Mr. Choudhari, as indeed it must be conceded, that S. 66, Civil P. C., does not apply to this claim, and the answer to the first half of the preliminary issue as framed should have been, no ! If the answer be no, it is a little difficult to see why the suit was not maintainable. Indeed the suit is maintainable on any view on the alternative branch, so strictly regarded this issue should have been answered "no" as regards both the questions posed by it.

But apart from formal points such as the above if we look at the principle underlying the questions raised, it appears to us clear that only one answer is possible. It is said that as S. 66 strikes against purchases benami where those purchases are effected at a court auction it is enunciating a matter of general policy and is in terms laying down a principle that should be applied to all public sales always assuming that those sales are in some way conducted in a manner similar to the mode of conducting sales adopted in the rules by civil Courts in execution. Needless to say there is no case in support of that proposition. On the other hand there are cases going back to 1870 to the contrary. The case law commences with 14 W R 372[6] where the Bombay High Court refused to apply the provisions of the then Civil Procedure to revenue sales. Five years later, in 1875, the Privy Council in 2 I A 154[7] expressed the view that this section, cutting athwart ordinary principles of law as it does, must be construed strictly and literally and as it strikes at suits against a certified purchaser it does not affect the position of a defendant sued by a certified purchaser. Later, in 28 Mad 526,[8] 28 Mad 473[9] and 19 M L J 270[10] it was indicated that the mere fact that the sale is under the Revenue Act does not preclude any one from contending that the purchaser is only a benamidar. The same view is expressed in 14 Cal 583[11] where it was regarded as obvious that the analogous section of the old Civil Procedure Code has no application to any other kind of sale than sales in execution of decrees of civil Courts. Lastly in I L R (1937) ALL 113[12] at pp. 120, 121 the learned Chief Justice of the Allahabad High Court observes as follows :

> Section 66 is confined to a purchase certified by the Court in such manner as may be prescribed ; and the word " prescribed " is defined in S. 2 (16) as meaning " prescribed by rules "; and " rules " under sub-s. (18) mean "rules and forms contained in Sch. 1 or made under S. 122 or S. 125, Civil P. C." It is therefore patent that a person who is not claiming title under a purchase certified by the Court under any of the rules framed under the Code would not be protected under S. 66, Civil P. C.

With those observations we entirely agree and we think it follows directly that the answer to both branches of the preliminary issue should have been in the negative. Accordingly the appeal succeeds with costs which the defendants will pay in any event both as regards the costs in this Court and the costs on this preliminary issue in the Court below.

GRILLE AND GRUER JJ.

Bharosa Ramdayal — Appellant

v.

Emperor.

Criminal Appeal No. 201 of 1940, Decided on 21st August 1940, from order of Sess. Judge, Wardha, D/- 16th July 1940.

* (a) Evidence Act (1872), S. 27 — S. 27 is valid even after amendment of S. 162, Criminal P. C.

Section 27, Evidence Act, has not become a dead letter even after the amendment of S. 162, Criminal P. C., in 1923 : A I R 1940 All 263 (F B) and A I R 1940 Lah 129 (F B), Not foll.; A I R 1939 P C 47, Expl.; A I R 1939 Pat 577; A I R 1940 Nag 66 and A I R 1929 Nag 17 (F B), Rel. on. [P 89 C 1]

(b) Evidence Act (1872), S. 25 — First information report — Not whole but only confessional part is excluded.

The whole of the first information report by an accused need not be excluded from admission, merely the confessional part is excluded : A I R 1935 Bom 26, Dissent.; A I R 1922 Cal 342, Rel. on. [P 89 C 2]

* (c) Evidence Act (1872), Ss. 25 and 27 — Accused voluntarily confessing offence to police is submitting to police custody — Confession is not admissible under S. 25—Statements made are not however excluded for purposes of S. 27 as same are made by person in custody.

Until S. 25 is amended, a confession made in a first information report must be excluded from its operation. Statements made in the course of such an inadmissible confession are not however excluded for the purposes of S. 27, Evidence Act because a person who makes a statement to a responsible police officer, voluntarily confessing that he has committed an act which the Penal Code regards as an offence, is submitting himself to custody within the meaning of S. 46 (1), Criminal P. C., and the statement made by him is one made by a person in the custody of a police officer within S. 27 : 1 Cal 207, Ref.; A I R 1935 Bom 26, Doubted; A I R 1922 Cal 342 and A I R 1933 Pat 149 (F B), Approved; A I R 1932 Cal 297, Expl., and Dist. [P 90 C 1,2]

(d) Criminal trial — Police receiving information from accused — Accused made to repeat it in presence of witnesses — Conduct is objectionable.

In principle it is objectionable for a Sub-Inspector who has received information from the accused and is proceeding to act on that information to get him to repeat that information in the presence of witnesses. In the peculiar circumstances, the Sub-Inspector was held justified in taking statements again in presence of witnesses : A I R 1939 Mad 15, Ref. [P 91 C 1]

(e) Evidence Act (1872), S. 27 — Statement resulting in discovery of dead body and blood-stained lathi — It cannot be argued that the statement cannot be used under S. 27 on ground that things discovered must have been known to numerous other people.

It is wrong to contend that the statement made to the police officer resulting in the discoveries (finding out the body of the deceased and of the blood-stained lathi) made could not be used under S. 27 as the discovery of the body must already have been known to numerous people when it has not been proved that anybody else had seen the body or was aware where the stick had been placed until the spot was pointed out by the accused. [P 91 C 1]

(f) Evidence Act (1872), S. 24 — Extra-judicial confession is admissible.

An extra-judicial confession is undoubtedly admissible though retracted in the Sessions Court if the fact that it was made appears to the Court to be natural and undisputable being corroborated by subsequent discoveries. [P 92 C 1]

(g) Penal Code (1860), S. 302 — Sentence — Provocation though not grave and sudden held sufficient for passing lesser sentence.

A man who is willing to have casual intercourse with a woman, treating her as a prostitute, may nevertheless justifiably resent any suggestion that he should instal her as a permanent mistress, which would undoubtedly result in heavy caste penalties and if this suggestion amounts to importunity, the provocation though not grave or sudden as to take the offence outside the provisions of S. 302 can be urged for the passing of the lesser sentence which the law permits. [P 92 C 1, 2]

M. Adhikari and M. G. Ghate — for Appellant.

W. R. Puranik, Advocate General — for the Crown.

Judgment.—The appellant Bharosa has been convicted of the murder of one Mst. Gaji and has been sentenced to death. The facts, though unusual, are simple. The prosecution story is that Bharosa, who was a gardner in the employment of one Dagaji, malguzar of mauza Waldur, lived in a hut in his master's garden and had formed an illicit connection with Mt. Gaji, a widow of a lower caste than his own, she being a Pardhan and he, a Pardeshi of the United Provinces. On the night of 3rd April the woman visited his hut and suggested that she should enter permanently into his keeping and live with him. He demurred as this would result in his being outcasted and he in a rage at her importunity struck her over the head with a lathi, killing her practically instantaneously. The medical evidence is to the effect that several blows with a lathi must have been delivered. The murder was committed not in the hut but at a nalla some 150 yards away, and the accused turned her out of the hut and accompanied her part of the way, when, presumably, the importunities being renewed, he lost his temper and killed her. Early on the following morning he left Waldur for Hinganghat, where his master lives, with the intention of telling his master exactly what had happened. The master was not present at his shop, but his agent Devidas (P. W. 1) was, and to him the accused confessed that a woman had come to his hut at night and refused to leave and that he had struck her and killed her. Devidas then suggested that the accused ought to go to the police station and report, and this, with the concurrence of his master Dagaji who had then arrived, was done and a first information report was recorded by the Sub-Inspector Sheomangal, in the course of which a full story was detailed. As the result of statements made in the course of this narrative, namely, where the instrument with which the crime had been committed lay and where the body was to be found, the Sub-Inspector went to the village. He reached there before the accused, who had been placed in the custody of a constable, arrived, and village elders were called at the bada. When the accused arrived he was asked to show the weapon and the corpse and he did so, accompanied by the Sub-Inspector and by witnesses. A blood-stained lathi was produced from under his bed in the hut, and the body was found in the nalla where he said it would be found. In the committing Magistrate's Court the accused in his examination admitted all these facts, but he retracted them in the Court of Session, denied that he had struck the woman or killed her, denied that he had made a confession to Devidas and even denied that he had been to the police station at all or made a report to the Sub-Inspector in charge. Finally, and equally incredibly, he denied that he had made the statement which was recorded in his examination in the committal Court. He called no evidence in defence, but it was contended on his behalf that he had been implicated by one Kalkaprasad, a fellow servant of his. We may here note that Kalkaprasad was called as a witness for the prosecution and although in examination-in-chief he admitted that he knew Mt. Gaji who was a day-labourer under his control, he stated that he was unaware if she had any connection with the accused Bharosa, and he was not asked a single question in cross-examination which would tend to show that he himself had any immoral relations with Mt. Gaji although such immoral connection was hinted at in counsel's argument both in this Court and in the Sessions Court. Neither was any question put to him indicating any ill-feeling between himself and the accused. It is quite obvious that any imputation against Kalkaprasad was a despairing afterthought.

The grounds taken in appeal all relate to technical points of law. The Sessions Judge, following the law as laid down in 49 Cal 167,[1] did not allow the whole of the first information report to be proved excluding from the proof by the Sub-Inspector who recorded it any such part as would include a confession. The earlier part of the report was allowed to be proved down to the words "used to come to do my master's work and I therefore knew her." We reproduce the first information report as taken down in full :

I am a resident of Santara Mohalla, Allahabad. I do not know whether any of my relations in Desh (native country) are alive or not. I came to Pardesh (another country) 25 years back. I served as a guard at the shop of Seth Narsinghdas for 20 years. From over 12 months from now I have been working as a gardener on Rs. 5 per month in the garden of Dagaji at Waldhur. I live in the tin hut in his garden at Waldhur. Mt. Gaji a widow by caste Pardhanin who as the people said had two sons used to come to do my master's work and I therefore knew her. That Mt. Gaji Pardhanin came to me in the master's garden last night at 12 or 12-30 o'clock and said that she had no husband and so I should take her into my keeping. I told her that I was a Pardeshi and she a Pardhanin by caste and because of a caste diversity I could not take her as a keep and advised her to go to her own caste. Then, your honour, I explained things to her at length. She did not agree and said, 'I have no husband and I shall live here only.' Then I got angry and raising my bamboo stick overhead with both hands I struck with force. The lathi fell on the head of Mt. Gaji in front and she fell to the ground along with the stick. Fleshy material protruded out of her broken scalp and there has been bleeding. Immediately on falling down she died; it did not take half a minute (even). I then remained lying in my master's garden. I got up before 6 A. M. in the morning and took my way to the master's shop from the village. The master, Dagaji, had gone to the station and I related the fact of Mt. Gaji's murder to the senior dewanji who was in the shop and who has accompanied me to the police station house. Then the master arrived and dewanji told this incident to him. When I struck Mt. Gaji with the lathi she was standing close to me. The lathi is a bamboo stick of my desh and up to my ear in height. Only one lathi blow killed her. When Mt. Gaji approached my cot once I asked her to go away quietly. Accordingly she went a little distance outside the garden. I lay on my bed. In the meantime she came back again. Then again I said to her 'I advised you to go away and you have come again' and asked her to get out of the garden gate. She did not go. I took her out of the garden up to the nullah and told her to take her way across the nullah. She said she would not go. I then struck her. Mt. Gaji is lying dead in the nullah at the rear of my master's garden and the lathi is kept near the cot inside the hut in my master's garden. The hut is open. The report was read over to me; it has been taken down correctly.

It is contended before us that not merely the confessional part of the first information report should have been excluded but the whole of it. It is also contended that as the first information report itself could not be admitted in evidence, no statement contained in it could be used under the provisions of S. 27, Evidence Act, for the purpose of leading to the discovery of the blood-stained lathi or of the body. It is further urged that the whole of the accused's examination in the committing Magistrate's Court is inadmissible as the questions asked are based on the inadmissible first information report, and the examination itself is attacked intrinsically on the ground that multiple and improper questions were asked to which the accused could not give proper answers. In respect of statements made by the accused in the bada in mauza Waldur after he had been taken there and met the Sub-Inspector, it is contended that the conduct of the Sub-Inspector was improper in asking him questions which he had asked him previously so as to obtain his statements in the presence of witnesses for the application of S. 27, Evidence Act. Finally it is urged that no statement under S. 27, Evidence Act, is admissible since that section has been superseded by the amendment in 1923 of S. 162, Criminal P. C. In short, the contention on behalf of the appellant is that there is no admissible evidence whatever to connect the accused with the crime.

Taking the last point of law first, namely, that S. 27, Evidence Act, is now a dead letter since the amendment of S. 162, Criminal P. C. in 1923, reliance is placed on two recent decisions of the Allahabad High Court and the Lahore High Court in AIR 1940 ALL 263[2] and AIR 1940 Lah 129[3] to the effect that this is the correct interpretation of the ruling of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 18 Pat 234.[4] The Patna High Court, however, does not follow the interpretation which is given to this ruling by the Allahabad and Lahore High Courts: vide 18 Pat 450.[5] The opinion of this Court has been expressed on similar lines to that of the Patna High Court: vide the Divisional Bench decision of Niyogi and Gruer JJ. in AIR 1940 Nag 66.[6] The view follows a decision of the Nagpur Judicial Commissioner's Court in 24 N L R 158[7] which is anterior to the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council, and the Divisional Bench has pointed out that their Lordships did not specifically decide the question but left it open. A similar decision was reached even more recently by a Divisional Bench of this Court in Cri. App. No. 121 of 1940,[8] where the question has been discussed. One of us was a party to the decision in AIR 1940 Nag 66[6] and the other to the decision in Cri. App. No. 121 of 1940.[8] We are therefore satisfied that the provisions of S. 27, Evidence Act, are still valid and are not affected by their Lordships' judgment in 18 Pat 234.[4]

For the proposition that the whole of the first information report should have been excluded from admission, reliance is placed on 59 Bom 120[9] where the partial exclusion in 49 Cal 167[1] was doubted. With the greatest respect we do not consider that the doubt there expressed was justified. The relevant words of Beaumont C. J. are as follows:

> But I doubt myself whether the principle on which the Calcutta High Court proceeded in that case can be justified. Section 25, Evidence Act, seems to be founded on the view of the Legislature that confessions made to a police officer are suspect, since they may have been induced by improper pressure. If that be the true underlying principle of S. 25, it is, to my mind, very difficult to see how any part of the confessional statement can be admitted in evidence.

The confessions in those cases and in the one which we are considering were made in circumstances which preclude any possibility of improper pressure, as in each case the accused person went of his own accord to the police station before any suspicion had been aroused and stated that he had killed some one, and in 49 Cal 167[1] that part of the confessional statement which was admitted had no connection with the actual narrative relating to the crime. Neither in the case before us can the part which has been admitted have any direct bearing on the fact of the fatal assault. So little bearing has it that it is really immaterial whether it is admitted or not, and the case against the accused would not lose any of its force by disallowing the whole of the first information report.

Of more serious consideration, however, is the contention that if the first information report is not admissible in evidence—and the argument of course applies to that part of it which comes within the confessional statement—then the statement cannot be used for the purpose of the discovery of the body or of the weapon under S. 27, Evidence Act. If this proposition is correct law, we arrive at the astonishing position that a man may kill another person in circumstances which he considers entirely justifiable and, moved either by remorse or honesty, makes a report to the nearest police station stating the exact truth and the full circumstances of what he has done, the police, however, would not be able to prove that such a statement was made or, if on investigation they found that the circumstances detailed were entirely true and made their discoveries as the result of what they had been told, and no other evidence was available, to use it. This might result in glaring miscarriages of justice. Rankin C. J. has pointed out the absurdity of the situation in AIR 1932 Cal 297[10] and considers that the situation is the result of bad drafting of the Evidence Act and that the Act should be re-drafted. The material criticism is as follows:

> What was said in this case was said to the police. It was therefore not allowed to go in evidence by S. 25 and the consequence of holding that S. 27 is not a mere exception to S. 26 is this: that in a case like the present where the confession was made to the police, if the man was at liberty at the time he was speaking, what he said should not be admitted in evidence even though something was discovered as a result of it. That is the present case. It cannot be admitted in evidence because the man was not in custody, which of course is thoroughly absurd. There might be reason in saying that if a man is in custody, what he may have said cannot be admitted; but there can be none at all in saying that it is inadmissible in evidence against him because he is not in custody. Yet this is the consequence of saying that S. 27 is more than a proviso to S. 26.

It was suggested to Beaumont C. J. in 59 Bom 120[9] that "confession" in S. 25, Evidence Act, refers only to a confession made to a police officer in the course of an inquiry into an offence and does not cover the first information which starts the inquiry. That would be, in our opinion, an obviously desirable interpretation were it possible, since it is evident, and we consider undisputed, that the purpose of S. 25, Evidence Act, in the words of Garth C. J. in 1 Cal 207[11] at p. 215, is "to prevent confessions obtained from accused persons through any undue influence being received as evidence against them", and in confessions made in the course of a first information report it is patent that there could have been no pressure by the police. Unfortunately, S. 25 is worded in such plain and simple language, namely, "no confession made to a police officer shall be proved as against a person accused of any offence", as to make the salutary proviso propounded in 59 Bom 120[9] impossible, and until this particular section is amended, as in our opinion it should be, such confession made in a first information report must be excluded from its operation. We are not however satisfied that statements made in the course of such an inadmissible confession are excluded for the purposes of S. 27, Evidence Act. The matter has been adumbrated in 49 Cal 167[1] to which no reference was made in A I R 1932 Cal 297,[10] and the proposition that a person who makes a statement to a responsible police officer, voluntarily confessing that he has committed an act which the Penal Code regards as an offence, is submitting himself to custody within the meaning of S. 46 (1), Criminal P. C., is, in our opinion, sound. In 12 Pat 241[12] a Full Bench of the Patna High Court stated:

> When a person states that he had done certain acts which amount to an offence, he accuses himself of committing the offence; and if he makes the statement to a police officer, as such, he submits to the custody of the officer within the meaning of S. 46 (1), Criminal P. C., and is then in the custody of a police officer within the meaning of S. 27, Evidence Act. This was also the opinion of Teunon and Ghosh JJ. in 49 Cal 167.[1]

In both those cases and in the case before us the person making the statement had no intention of not submitting himself to the police. There is a voluntary statement without any pressure by the police and indeed without any previous knowledge by them of what had been done; the arrest took place immediately after the statement, but we feel no doubt that at the time the statement was made there was a submission to custody which would bring the statement made within the ambit of S. 27, Evidence Act, as a statement made by a person in the custody of a police officer. The facts in A I R 1932 Cal 297[10] were entirely different and the statements made were in the course of a police investigation shortly before the arrest of the accused and in circumstances which certainly could not connote any submission to police custody; and this we presume to be the reason why no reference was made in this case to 49 Cal 167[1] since the facts in one case could have had no application to the facts in the other. We are, then, satisfied that the statements as the result of which the police discovered the blood-stained lathi and the body are admissible.

Arising out of this is the conduct of the Sub-Inspector at the bada where the accused was asked to repeat his statements which he had already made to the Sub-Inspector at the police-station. In re-examination the Sub-Inspector stated that the accused had told him in the first information report that the stick was lying in the hut, and that he repeated the question as he wanted the accused to make the statement before the panches. This question was objected to by the defence counsel as being inadmissible; nevertheless use is sought to be made of it here. In principle it is of course objectionable for a Sub-Inspector who has received information from the accused and is proceeding to act on that information to get him to repeat that information in the presence of witnesses. As stated by Burn and Lakshmana Rao JJ. in A I R 1939 Mad 15[13] at p. 17, a police officer ought to expect to be believed when he gives evidence on oath. But in the case before us the stricture is certainly not so well-deserved as it was in that case where the accused person was brought out of the lock-up and examined in the presence of witnesses and where the statement was embodied in a panchnama, and he was then apparently returned to the lock-up again, since it was quite clear that the Circle Inspector knew exactly what the accused was going to say. In the present case, it may be safely presumed that the Sub-Inspector had no doubt that the accused was going to take him to the place indicated and that the people had been called so as to depose to the recovery of whatever there was to be recovered, a perfectly legitimate proceeding since a seizure memorandum has to be signed by witnesses. It may of course also be possible that the Sub-Inspector was aware that there might be some doubt as to the admissibility of what the accused had stated at the police station as it was embodied in a confession made to a police officer, in which case, if he considered that the statement might be entirely inadmissible, he was justified in taking the statement again in circumstances where it certainly was admissible.

It was also urged that the statement made to the police-officer resulting in the discoveries made could not be used under S. 27, Evidence Act, as the discovery of the body must already have been known to numerous people. It has not been proved that anybody else had seen the body or was aware where the stick had been placed until the spot was pointed out by the accused. No evidence was led on the point, neither was this elicited in cross-examination from the prosecution witnesses. Even if other people had discovered the body or the blood-stained stick after the accused had left his village to make a report at Hinganghat, that would be entirely immaterial, and the argument could only have force if it were shown that by the time the second statement was made the police were aware from other sources that the stick and the body were actually to be found in such places. There is no evidence whatever that anyone else informed the police where these things were or that the Sub-Inspector who had certainly arrived at Waldur a short time before the accused, had been shown any object connected with the crime. Turning now to the examination of the accused the learned Sessions Judge, although he does not say so in so many words, appears to indicate that there might be some doubt as to the propriety of question 3 put to the accused in the committing Magistrate's Court. We reproduce the questions and answers seriatim and number them:

Q. 1—From the statement of witnesses it appears that there was illicit intimacy between Mt. Gaji Pardhanin and you and that she had been trying to live with you. What have you to say ?

A. — She used to work in my garden and at cultivation. I had no illicit connection with her.

Q. 2 — Then from the statement of witnesses it appears that she came to your hut on the night of the 3rd April 1940 and made an attempt for living with you, that you then turned her out and taking her to the nullah you struck her on the head with this lathi (Art. A) as a result of which she died. What have you to say ?

A.—Yes sir, I gave her a blow with lathi (Art. A) on her head. She fell down in the nullah and died.

Q. 3 — On the following day in the morning you came to Hinganghat and related all this to your master's dewanji Devidas and he brought you to the station-house where you made this report (Ex. P-1 read over to the accused) to the station-house Officer. What have you to say ?

A.—I had told this fact to my master's dewanji and exactly the same thing to the station-house officer. My report which had been read over to me is true.

Q.—Then you took the station-house officer and the panches to your hut and produced this stick (Art. A) from under the cot. To whom does this lathi belong ?

A.—This lathi is mine. I produced it to the station-house officer.

Q. 5—After this you pointed out the spot where the corpse lay to the station-house officer and the panches. What have you to say ?

A.—Yes, sir.

Q. 6—Have you to state anything else?

A.—Your honour is ma-bap.

We do not consider that there is any impropriety in any of the questions. The inadmissibility of the confessional part of the first information has not the complete bearing on the question which the learned counsel would ask us to hold that it has, since there is the admission of Devidas, and on his statements the questions could be properly put. Question No. 2 gives the circumstances leading up to the fact that he had confessed that he had struck the woman a fatal blow and he admits that he did and that she fell down in a nullah and died. Nor can we see any objection to question No. 3 on which the learned Judge has come to no definite conclusion. It cannot be disputed that the accused did go to Hinganghat that morning, and there was evidence that he had related the circumstances to Devidas. It is also obvious that he did go to the police station, and the question is well within the proper limits of S. 342, Criminal P. C., in that it is put to give him an opportunity to explain salient points in the evidence against him, points which are likely to prove fatal unless explained, and the answer of the accused is in fact an answer to every part of the question, namely that he says that he told the fact to his master's dewanji and told exactly the same thing to the station-house officer. We do not consider that anything in this examination can be said to be improper.

The learned counsel in attacking the conviction on all the points of law to which we have referred omitted to consider, even if the propositions of law advanced were sound, the effect of the extra-judicial confession made to Devidas. That extra judicial confession is undoubtedly admissible. It was of course retracted in the Sessions Court, but the fact that it was made appears to us indisputable. It was a natural thing for an honest man to do, and his conduct in going to the police station accompanied by Devidas (and his conduct is of course relevant) is inexplicable on any other ground than that he had come to Hinganghat with the intention of telling his master what he had done and in his master's absence he told his representative Devidas. The subsequent discoveries fully corroborate this extra judicial confession, and on that alone the conviction could be sustained. There is also the full confession made in the committing Magistrate's Court.

The accused has been sentenced to death. There is no doubt from the medical evidence that he did strike more than one blow and that all the blows were delivered on the woman's head. We see no reason to disbelieve the circumstances as given by the accused, and indeed there is no evidence on the record to contradict them. Although we agree that the provocation was not sufficiently grave or sudden to take the offence outside the provisions of S. 302, I. P. C., there was nevertheless some provocation which can be urged for the passing of the lesser sentence which the law permits. A man who is willing to have casual intercourse with a woman, treating her as a prostitute, may nevertheless justifiably resent any suggestion—and in this case the suggestion amounted to importunity—that he should instal her as a permanent mistress, which would undoubtedly result in heavy caste penalties. That there had been importunity and argument is deducible from the fact that he undoubtedly escorted the woman from his hut to the place where the body was found, a distance of some 150 yards, and it is evident that he was trying to get rid of the woman who was doing her best to persuade him to instal her permanently. We do not consider that she was taken to the nalla with the express purpose of being killed in a secluded spot; the subsequent conduct of the accused negatives this. Taking these circumstances into consideration we consider that the punishment of transportation for life is more suitable. The appeal is accordingly dismissed, but the sentence of death is not confirmed and that of transportation for life is substituted for it.

Second Appeal No. 399 of 1939, Decided on 26th September 1939, from appellate decree of 3rd Addl. Dist. Judge, Amraoti, D/- 23rd December 1939.

Hindu Law — Succession — Brother's widow takes before paternal uncle's son's son.

In the absence of any of the compact series of heirs a brother's widow will take before a paternal uncle's son's son. [P 94 C 1]

J. R. Mudholkar — for Appellants.

Judgment. — One Shivaji, who owned certain fields, died in the year 1906-07. He was succeeded in possession of them by the widow of his deceased younger brother, Mt. Baija. She died in 1934, and the suit out of which this second appeal arises was brought by her daughter, Mt. Kamaljabai, claiming as the reversioner of her uncle in respect of fields of which her mother, Mt. Baija had disposed during her lifetime; the claim was that these dispositions were made without necessity and were not valid beyond the lifetime of Mt. Baija. The defence raised by Mt. Baija's transferee and subsequent transferees also was that Mt. Kamaljabai was not entitled to bring the suit as she was not the next reversioner of Shivaji after the death of Mt. Baija, that position being occupied by Sakharam who was the grandson of Shivaji's paternal uncle. It was also contended that the transfers which were made by Mt. Baija had been made with the full consent of Sakharam who was the next reversioner. The plaintiff (we may disregard the other plaintiffs in addition to Mt. Kamaljabai who appear to be champertous transferees of her alleged interest) denied that Sakharam was any relation to her or to the propositus, and the claim that she alone was the nearest reversioner of Shivaji was reasserted. It was found in both the Courts below that Sakharam was related to the propositus as asserted by the defence, namely, that he was the grandson of his paternal uncle and that he was therefore the next reversioner and as such closer in the line of reversioners than Mt. Kamaljabai, who was a brother's daughter. Incidentally, the evidence also established that the transfers by Mt. Baija had been made throughout with the consent and indeed with the active participation of Sakharam. The plaintiff's suit was dismissed and her appeal failed.

The finding that Sakharam was the grandson of male descent of the paternal uncle of Shivaji is a finding of fact, and despite the confident assertions in the first two paragraphs of the memorandum of appeal is unassailable. It is also unassailable that Sakharam is a nearer heir than the plaintiff, and Sakharam is still alive. An ingenious plea is, however, now taken by the learned counsel for the appellant for the first time. It is this, that the Courts below should have held that even on the defendant's own case, namely, the establishment of the relationship between Sakharam and the propositus, Sakharam should have succeeded to the estate of Shivaji on the latter's death to the exclusion of Mt. Baija, Shivaji's widowed sister-in-law, and that any claim that Sakharam might have had was extinguished when he failed to assert his right against Mt. Baija within 12 years of Shivaji's death. In the first place, I do not see how it can be claimed that the lower Courts should have acceded to this argument when admittedly the argument was never placed before them. Again, the whole of the plaintiff's case is dependent on the fact that Baija succeeded to the estate as a limited owner, and in purporting to divest herself of the fields in question for ever she exceeded her rights as a limited owner. Her limited ownership was accepted on both sides and the suit proceeded on that basis, and it cannot now be turned into a suit based on the alleged misdemeanour of Mt. Baija as a trespasser; for that is what the result would be even though the object of the argument now adduced would appear to be to show that Sakharam can no longer claim to be a reversioner since he failed to establish his position as owner on the death of Shivaji. It cannot, however, be contended that he has lost his position as a reversioner since the contention is that he never was a reversioner of Mt. Baijas at all.

In any case the ingenious contention advanced must fail. The parties reside in Amraoti and admittedly are governed by Bombay school of law; otherwise Mt. Baija as the widow of a gotraja sapinda could not have been considered as coming within the inheritance at all. The point of law which the ingenuity of the counsel has raised is this, that in the order of succession a female gotraja sapinda is postponed to all male gotraja sapindas in the same line as her husband although she has precedence over a male in a remoter line, and reliance is placed on 14 N L R 6[1] and 6 N L R 39,[2] and it is urged that on the death of Shivaji in 1906 Sakharam should have succeeded rather than Mt. Baija. The contest would have been between the widow of a pre-deceased brother and the paternal grandson of a paternal uncle. Neither of the cases on which reliance has been placed deals with this actual relationship, but I would point out that Baija's husband and the propositus had a closer common ancestor than did Sakharam and the propositus, Sakharam having to go back to a great-grandfather to establish common relationship whereas Baija's husband had to go back to a common link of fatherhood with the propositus alone; and in 9 Bom L R 1149[3] quoted by Bose A. J. C. at the conclusion in 6 N L R 39[2] it is pointed out that a step-mother was preferred to a paternal uncle's son on the ground that she was the widow of a gotraja in the ascending line of a nearer branch, that of the father, whereas her adversary was a male gotraja in a more remote line, namely, a descendant of the paternal grandfather. That case is a near parallel to the one now under consideration. In Mulla's Principles of Hindu law the position in the order of succession of the widows of gotraja sapindas has been compiled and set out with reference to authorities where necessary. The widows of gotraja sapindas can only succeed in the absence of any of the compact series of heirs. Here, admittedly, there were none as the brother had already died and had left no son. In the case which I have already quoted, a step-mother has been held to take before a paternal uncle's son. Next to a step-mother in succession would come a brother's widow as in the case before me, and in 39 Bom 87[4] it was held that a brother's widow took before a paternal uncle's son; a fortiori, in the case before me, a brother's widow will take before a paternal uncle's son's son, and that, on the assumption that the argument is one which is open to the appellant, concludes the matter. The appeal fails and is dismissed without notice to the opposite party.

Moujilal Hiralal Sonar — Appellant

v.

Emperor.

Criminal Appeal No. 129 of 1940, Decided on 3rd July 1940, from order of Addl. Sess. Judge, Akola, D/- 26th April 1940.

Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 418—Convictions of accused under Ss. 366 and 302, Penal Code—Former by jury, latter by assessors — Appeals against both convictions — Though conviction under S. 366, Penal Code, can be challenged only on ground of law, accused can in appeal against conviction for murder challenge facts on which conviction under S. 366, Penal Code, rests.

No doubt a conviction by the Sessions Judge under S. 366, Penal Code, on the kidnapping charge can only be challenged on grounds of law but where a person has been convicted by the Sessions Judge with a jury under S. 366, Penal Code, and also under S. 302, Penal Code, with the aid of assessors, the accused can in his appeal against the conviction for murder challenge the facts on which the charge of kidnapping is founded. The intention of the law is that a man should not be condemned to death unless at least two High Court Judges have had the opportunity of scrutinising the case on facts as well as on law and unless they are satisfied that he is guilty. The law quite definitely does not intend that the final result in such cases should depend upon the opinion of the jury. [P 95 C 1]

A. Ahmad — for Appellant.

W. Dutt — for the Crown.

Judgment. — Three persons, Nago, Mahabir and Moujilal were prosecuted for (1) kidnapping one Lachiya for the purpose of forcing her to illicit intercourse, and (2) for murdering her in furtherance of the common intention of all. The charge under the former head was tried by a jury and under the latter by the Additional Sessions Judge, the jury acting as assessors. The jury returned an unanimous verdict of guilty against all three accused under S. 366, Penal Code. The learned Additional Sessions Judge has acquitted Nago of the charge of murder and has convicted the other two and sentenced each to death. All three have appealed. We will consider Nago's appeal separately. This judgment is confined to the appeals of Mahabir and Moujilal. Their appeals were filed from jail and it is not clear whether they are directed against both convictions or only against the one on the charge of murder. Mahabir's grounds of appeal mention the convictions against both sections and then states: "I have not committed the offence." Then after setting out the fact that they were taxed by the police with having kidnapped the girl the grounds state that he replied, after denying all knowledge of the woman and her ornaments, "a false charge is being unnecessarily levelled against me." Towards the end of the memorandum Mahabir says, after setting out that he has been sentenced to seven years on the one charge and to death on the other :

> This sentence has been passed against me for no offence. I do not know anything concerning it. I have been arrested on account of suspicion and I have been sentenced for no offence.

The other accused Moujilal states in his grounds of appeal :

> The Court levelled against me a charge under Ss. 366 and 302. I have not kidnapped Lachhiya at all and have not committed the murder also. This is a false charge that has been levelled against me. On account of this I am sentenced to seven years' imprisonment under S. 366 and to suffer death under S. 302. This sentence has been passed against me for no offence.

It is our opinion that though the grounds have been clumsily drafted the intention was to appeal against both convictions. That leads to a curious and anomalous position. The conviction on the kidnapping charge can only be challenged on grounds of law. The only ground of law possible in this case would be that there was misdirection in the charge to the jury. But no misdirection is alleged, nor have we been able to find any, nor in fact did the learned counsel for the accused pretend that there was any. In the circumstances we have no power to interfere on this point and the convictions for kidnapping must stand. That raises this difficult position. The case is so circumstanced that if the facts relating to the charge of kidnapping cannot be challenged, then it becomes difficult to resist the conclusion that the convictions on the charge of murder were properly made. If these persons were responsible for the kidnapping of the girl for the purposes of forcing her to illicit intercourse then it becomes very probable that they were concerned with her murder. But if there is nothing in the charge of kidnapping then the motive for the murder disappears and the remaining points implicating the accused are so slender that in the absence of motive they are not sufficient to bring home guilt on the capital charge. That raises the following legal question. Can the appellants when dealing with the appeals against their convictions for murder challenge the facts on which their convictions on the charge of kidnapping rest? We think they can.

We are clear that the convictions for kidnapping cannot be challenged except on grounds available in an appeal from a conviction in a jury trial. But as the Code allows an appeal on facts against a conviction for murder, it seems to us that the appellant must be allowed to challenge every fact on which that conviction rests or which is likely to affect the result. The position is anomalous, but then so is this hybrid kind of trial. The Code is not clear on this point and it seems to us that in a case where a man is on trial for his life every ambiguity in the law of procedure should be resolved in his favour. The intention of the law is that a man should not be condemned to death unless at least two High Court Judges have had the opportunity of scrutinising the case on facts as well as on law and unless they are satisfied that he is guilty. The law quite definitely does not intend that the final result in such cases should depend upon the opinion of the jury. But if the verdict cannot be challenged in the High Court, (as distinct from the conviction) and if the case is such (as it is here) that once a kidnapping is established a conviction for murder ought logically to follow, then the graver issue is made to depend upon the opinion of the jury and not on that of two High Court Judges. We do not think this is the real intention of the Code; therefore, since the matter is not expressly dealt with, and as a doubt as to the meaning of the relevant sections arises, we consider it proper to resolve that doubt in favour of the accused and so have allowed him to challenge every fact material for conviction on the capital charge.

First Appeal No. 110 of 1936, Decided on 16th October 1939, from decree of Addl. Sub-Judge, First Class, Yeotmal, D/- 26th August 1936.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 8, R. 5—Defendant admitting to have executed bond for certain amount on certain date and admitting to have agreed to pay it on certain date — Case does not fall under O. 8, R. 5.

Where in a suit the defendant has admitted that he executed a bond for certain sum on certain date on taking accounts and has admitted that he agreed to pay the amount on certain date, this is not a case, which falls under O. 8, R. 5, of an implied admission. This is an example of an express admission. [P 96 C 2]

(b) Evidence Act (1872), S. 65—Debtor's application to Debt Conciliation Board cannot be regarded as admission of liability within S. 65 (b).

The statement contained in the debtor's application to the Debt Conciliation Board cannot be regarded as an admission within S. 65 (b), Evidence Act. It is a statement. Under S. 6, Debt Conciliation Act, the statement is not to be deemed a statement of the amount admittedly due but of the amount claimed. The debtor is in no sense promising to pay this amount: on the contrary he is applying to a Debt Conciliation Board with a view to having his liability cut down, and it cannot be inferred that there is any promise to pay anything or any admission of liability for anything. [P 96 C 2; P 97 C 1]

(c) C. P. Debt Conciliation Act (2 of 1933), S. 9 — Admission by debtor of agreement to pag sum due on bond—S. 9 does not operate.

Where there is an admission by the debtor of an agreement to pay the sum due on a bond it is not necessary to prove the bond. Therefore S. 9 does not operate. That section does not declare that no suit could be brought on the debt. It merely states that some documents cannot be proved. [P 97 C 1]

Judgment.—This appeal is from a judgment decreeing the claim founded upon a loss for Rs. 4000 effected on 30th March 1929. On the same date the defendant executed a bond in respect of the same transaction. Re-payments were made from time to time. On 26th February 1928 a payment of Rs. 5 was endorsed on the back of the bond. On 25th March 1933 there was a renewal. Rupees 4400 was then found due and a bond was given for that amount. The bond, we are informed, contained interest clauses. The date of the suit is 25th February 1936. On 21st January 1935 the debtor applied to a Debt Conciliation Board and included his debt on the bond of 1933, that item of his indebtedness being shown in his application in the following words :

Executed a bond for Rs. 4400 in the year 1933. Interest at the rate of eight annas per cent. per month. The amount of Rs. 4870-6-0 is found due on the said bond.

The matter came before the Debt Conciliation Board, and the Board ordered the creditors to file statements and to produce various documents. The plaintiff failed to produce the bond of 1933. The Board accordingly treated his failure as coming within S. 9, Debt Conciliation Act, 1933, and intimated that the document would thereafter not be admissible in evidence against the debtor in any suit brought by the creditor or by any person claiming under him. A review application was made in which the creditor pointed out that his failure was due to floods. That review application failed and the Debt Conciliation Board maintained the position it had taken up. The matter came before the civil Court in this case, and the civil Court considered itself not bound by the findings of the Debt Conciliation Board. It said, however, that the civil Court was bound by S. 9(3) and held that the document could not be looked at : neither could the earlier bond be looked at for a like reason. But the Court decreed the claim on the ground that the plaintiff could resort to the original contract of loan and ignore the bond altogether. Before us, it has been pointed out that this is not a case of a loan with collateral security, but is a case of a loan transaction reduced to writing; and it is therefore argued that so far as the original contract of loan is concerned that is reduced to writing the terms of which are to be found in the bond executed in 1929, and therefore one cannot go outside that bond to find out what the terms were of that bond and the contract that it evidenced which came to an end when the new bond was brought into existence, because not only was the new bond brought into existence but a letter of even date signed by the plaintiff was given. That letter is proved in this case and contains the following statement : . . . after receiving credit for remission and payment, the previous stamp dated 30th March 1929 in cancelled.

In other words the first bond ended and the contract it evidenced was brought to an end and was substituted by a new contract evidenced by the terms of the bond of 1933. Therefore it is said that as the contract has been reduced to the form of a document within the meaning of S. 91, Evidence Act, and as that document, the bond of 1933, in the circumstances here present, cannot be looked at by any Court, and as it follows from that and from S. 91 that no evidence at all can be given of the terms of the contract, the plaintiff's claim should have been dismissed with costs. In this case, however, the defendant has admitted that he executed a bond for Rs. 4400 on 25th March 1933 on taking accounts and has admitted that he agreed to pay the amount on 15th April 1935. That is, in our opinion, an admission that on 25th March 1933 he agreed to pay Rupees 4400 on 15th April 1935, and in the light of that admission it was quite unnecessary for the plaintiff to prove anything in order to succeed to the extend of Rs. 4400.

This is not a case, which falls under O. 8, R. 5, of an implied admission. This is an example of an express admission. It is said by the plaintiff that not only should Rupees 4400 be awarded but that interest thereon should also be awarded because there is an implied admission as to interest derived through the other admissions contained in the written statement. But, in our opinion, bearing in mind the fact that this point has been taken for the first time in this Court, that there is no issue turning round the question of admission, and that we have a discretion in the case of an implied admission, under the proviso to Order 8, R. 5, to require the fact to be proved otherwise than by such admission, we should require the fact of the interest reserved to be proved otherwise than by admission. Were the plaintiff driven to prove it he would find himself unable to do so because he would then have to put in the bond, and that bond the Court cannot look at. It is said, however, that the amount of interest can be derived from the entry abovementioned in the application, and S. 65, Evidence Act, is relied on. It is necessary for the plaintiff to rely on S. 65 because obviously the primary evidence is the evidence of the bond; and the bond is in existence, is not destroyed or lost; but the plaintiff's difficulty is due to the fact that he is shut out by S. 9, Debt Conciliation Act, from proving it.

Section 65, Evidence Act, only helps the plaintiff, however, if the statement contained in the defendant's application to the Debt Conciliation Board can be regarded as an admission. We are not prepared to treat it as an admission. It is a statement. Under

S. 6, Debt Conciliation Act, the statement is not to be deemed a statement of the amount admittedly due but of the amount claimed. The defendant is in no sense promising to pay this amount: on the contrary he is applying to a Debt Conciliation Board with a view to having his liability cut down, and it cannot, we think, be inferred that there is any promise to pay anything or any admission of liability for anything. However that may be, here there is in the pleadings an admission of an agreement to pay Rupees 4400 due on a bond. It is therefore not necessary to prove the bond. Therefore, S. 9, Debt Conciliation Act, does not operate. That section does not declare that no suit could be brought on the debt. It merely states that some documents cannot be proved. Here it is not necessary to prove the bond in order to establish liability to the extent of Rs. 4400 due on 15th April 1935. The admission, however, does not go beyond that; and beyond that the plaintiff is unable to prove his claim.

The result is that the decree is varied, and the plaintiff's claim is allowed to the extent of Rs. 4400 only together with proportionate costs in the lower Court. The defendant will have half his costs of this appeal.

Emperor.

Criminal Revn. No. 86 of 1940, Decided on 11th June 1940, for revision of the order by Addl. Dist. Magistrate, Nagpur, D/- 18th January 1940.

* (a) Press (Emergency Powers) Act (1931), Ss. 7 (1) and 30 — Order under S. 7 (1) — High Court has no jurisdiction to interfere in revision.

An application for revision against an order under S. 7 (1) cannot be brought within S. 23 and hence the High Court's jurisdiction to entertain such an application is barred by S. 30: A I R 1934 Pat 344 (FB), Rel. on. [P 98 C 1]

(b) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 561A — S. 561A cannot be invoked to confer jurisdiction on High Court to interfere with order under S. 7 (1), Press (Emergency Powers) Act.

Inherent powers cannot be invoked where the Legislature expressly deals with the matter. S. 30, Press (Emergency Powers) Act, expressly deals with the powers of High Court. Hence, S. 561A cannot be invoked to confer jurisdiction on High Court to interfere with order passed under S. 7 (1) of Press (Emergency Powers) Act. [P 98 C 2]

(c) Press (Emergency Powers) Act (1931), Ss. 23 and 30—Ss. 23 and 30 are not ultra vires.

Sections 23 and 30 cannot be regarded as ultra vires on the ground that they contravene S. 561A, Criminal P. C. [P 98 C 2]

(d) Government of India Act (1915), S. 107—Ss. 23 and 30, Press (Emergency Powers) Act are not ultra vires because of S. 107, Government of India Act.

The High Court has not been conferred with revisional jurisdiction by S. 107 in respect of orders judicially passed. But apart from that, it is impossible to ask High Court to exercise powers of superintendence in order to prevent a Magistrate from doing that which the Act under which he is acting gives him power to do. If his order is intended to be final in the sense that no revision or appeal lies from it, then clearly the Court cannot assume revisional or appellate powers under S. 107. Hence Ss. 23 and 30, Press (Emergency Powers) Act, are not ultra vires because of S. 107, Government of India Act of 1909 as amended in 1915. [P 99 C 1]

(e) Government of India Act (1915), S. 65 — Press (Emergency Powers) Act is not ultra vires.

The Press (Emergency Powers) Act is not ultra vires on the ground that it offends against S. 22, Councils Act, which has now been embodied in S. 65, Government of India Act, 1915 : Case law referred. [P 99 C 1]

B. R. Mandlekar — for Applicant.

W. C. Dutt, Advocate-General — for the Crown.

Order. — This is an application for revision against an order passed by the Additional District Magistrate of Nagpur under S. 7 (1), Press (Emergency Powers) Act of 1931 under which the applicant has been ordered to furnish a security of Rs. 1000. The application covers a very wide field, but it is not necessary for me to enter into the questions raised by it because, in my opinion, I have no power to exercise jurisdiction in this matter. The Act expressly deals with the powers of the High Court in respect of orders passed and action taken under the provisions of the Act. These powers are of a very limited character. Section 23 provides that if an order of forfeiture has been made under Ss. 4, 6, 8, 10 or 19 of the Act in respect of security which has been deposited under S. 3 (3) or S. 7 (3), then, provided an application is made to the High Court under S. 23 (1) within two months, the High Court shall have jurisdiction to determine whether the publication in respect of which the order was made did or did not contain the words, signs, etc., described in S. 4 (1). Sections 24, 25, 26 and 27 relate to the procedure to be followed by the High Court in the entertainment of and the hearing of such an application. For example it has to be considered by a Special Bench consisting of not less than three Judges and so on. Then follows S. 30 which states :

> No proceeding purporting to be taken under this Act shall be called in question by any Court, except the High Court on application under S. 23.

The proceeding, which is being questioned here does purport to be taken under S. 7 (1) of this Act. Therefore, under S. 30 the jurisdiction of the High Court is expressly barred unless the application can be brought within S. 23. It is clear that it cannot. Consequently, I have no jurisdiction in this matter. This is also the decision of a Full Bench of three Judges of the Patna High Court in 13 Pat 547.[1] The learned counsel for the applicant seeks to distinguish this ruling on the ground that in that case the Local Government had already passed an order demanding security and the District Magistrate was, therefore, according to the argument, acting in an executive capacity as a ministerial agent of the Local Government : he was not acting in an independent capacity as a Court. That however is only one part of the ruling. The latter half of the ruling deals expressly with the point just discussed by me. In any case whether the ruling is precisely in point or not that is my view. A part of the argument before me was directed to the question whether the District Magistrate in such a case acts as a Court or not. It is argued that in fact he is a Court and if he is a Court then the High Court has jurisdiction because of powers to which I shall refer presently. I need not however decide in this case whether the District Magistrate acts as a Court or in an executive capacity, though a Full Bench of the Lahore High Court in 18 Lah 438[2] appears to consider that the functions which either he or the Local Government (their powers being independent) exercise under the Act are executive, because, whether they are executive or judicial, the Act deals with the exact scope of the powers of superintendence which the High Court is to have in these matters and consequently the High Court cannot travel beyond the powers so conferred and so delimited.

It is urged that the High Court has powers under S. 561A, Criminal P. C. But I am clear that that section can have no application to a matter of this kind. That section confers no fresh or new or additional powers on the High Court. It merely states that the existing powers are not circumscribed by anything in the Code of Criminal Procedure except in so far as the sections expressly dealing with them do so. It is well known that inherent powers cannot be invoked where the Legislature expressly deals with the matter. It has dealt with the matter in this case. It has stated that no proceeding purporting to be taken under the Act shall be called in question except in one particular matter and in one particular way. That is express and absolute. No general section conferring inherent power can be invoked in the face of that. But it is argued that these sections in the Act are ultra vires because they contravene S. 561A. Section 561A cannot possibly have been intended to relate to powers which were not in existence at all at the date when it was passed. It does not give a power of superintendence or of revision in respect of matters which have been specially created by the Legislature at a later date. If the Legislature chooses to confer those powers upon any Court or body and state that there shall neither be appeal nor revision it has every right and power to do so. We are familiar with the exercise of these powers on the civil side. Many special Acts are passed conferring special and extraordinary powers upon Courts, persons or bodies and stating that there shall be no appeal from orders made under those Acts, or stating that an appeal shall not lie in the civil Courts. It would be impossible to argue that these Acts are ultra vires because inherent powers are conferred upon the High Court on its civil side by S. 115, Civil P. C. The same reasoning applies here.

It is next argued that Ss. 23 and 30 are ultra vires because of S. 107, Government of India Act of 1909 as amended in 1915. That Act confers powers of superintendence over all Courts for the time being subject to its appellate jurisdiction. It is a moot point whether this confers powers of revision which have not been conferred either by the Code of Civil Procedure or that of Criminal Procedure or some other Act. The High Courts have differed on this point, and the new Government of India Act makes it clear that the High Court has no revisional jurisdiction in respect of orders judicially passed. The jurisdiction is executive and ministerial. In my opinion the cases which held that that was the correct interpretation of the old Act are right. But apart from that, it is impossible to ask this Court to exercise powers of superintendence in order to prevent a Magistrate from doing that which the Act under which he is acting gives him power to do. If his order is intended to be final in the sense that no revision or appeal lies from it, then clearly the Court cannot assume revisional or appellate powers under S. 107. If it cannot, then it is clear that S. 30 does not contravene S. 107. The two matters are distinct. It is then argued that the whole Act, that is to say the Press (Emergency Powers) Act, is ultra vires because it offends against S. 22, Councils Act, which has now been embodied in S. 65, Government of India Act, 1915. That section is not before me, but the proviso embodied in S. 65 which is relied on states that the Legislature shall have no power unless expressly so authorized by Act of Parliament to make any law affecting any part of the unwritten laws or constitution of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland whereon may depend in any degree the allegiance of any person to the Crown of the United Kingdom.

It is argued that this Act affects the liberty of the subject: it prevents him from saying what he likes in a publication and that affects his allegiance to the Crown. 40 Cal 391[3] is relied on. The question there was whether the Government of India could make any law the effect of which was to debar a civil Court from entertaining a claim against the Government to any right or demand. Their Lordships referred to the well-known judgment of Sir Barnes Peacock C. J., in which he held that Government possesses a dual capacity : (1) that in which it reigns and (2) that in which it has taken over the commercial rights, privileges and obligations which were vested in the East India Company. Their Lordships held that the right in respect of the lands in question related to the commercial capacity of Government. Therefore the Government of India could not pass an Act which ousted the jurisdiction of the civil Courts in respect of its commercial capacity. Their Lordships pointed out that the East India Company could have been sued. They stated that the Government of India in its commercial capacity inherited the rights and obligations of that Company and that when it took over from the East India Company the right of the subject was to proceed against the Secretary of State, and they pointed out that under S. 65, Government of India Act, the Government of India has no power to pass an Act which would prevent the subject from suing the Secretary of State. That has no possible application to this case. The present Act does not relate to any commercial aspect of Government. It relates to its sovereign attributes. Government has power and authority to make laws for the good Government of the country and for the preservation of peace, law and order.

It was also referred to 8 N L R 107[4] and 26 N L R 217[5] for the proposition that an Act which ousts the jurisdiction of the Courts or says that the authority of any person or body is to be final is ultra vires. The former case refers to bye-laws. It is quite clear that if an Act does not state that the order of a body created by it shall have finality neither that body nor anybody else can give itself powers embodying finality by making rules in the guise of bye-laws. Of course the bye-laws cannot travel beyond the authority conferred by the Act. As regards 26 N L R 217[5] that merely decides that the civil Courts have jurisdiction to determine whether a tax imposed by a municipal committee is intra vires or not. Again, it has no application to this case.

A large number of other cases were cited dealing with other Acts, but, as they do not refer to the Act in question, which, as I have said, expressly limits the jurisdiction of the High Court in respect of orders passed under the Act, I need not deal with them in detail. It is enough to state that they are not relevant to this case. The rulings cited are, 39 Cal 953,[6] 54 Mad 422,[7] 57 ALL 778,[8] 41 Cal 400,[9] 53 Bom 149,[10] 42 Cal 793,[11]

Second Appeal No. 253 of 1936, Decided on 8th October 1940, from appellate decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Bhandara, D/- 29th February 1936.

(a) Practice—New plea—Limitation—Plea of minority cannot be raised for first time in second appeal.

The plea of minority for the purpose of calling in aid the provisions of S. 6, Limitation Act, cannot be raised for the first time in second appeal : 17 C W N 667, Rel. on. [P 101 C 1]

Section 4 has nothing to do with computing the period prescribed under S. 19. R. N. Padhye, K. B. Dwiwedi and J. M. Thaker — for Respondent.

Judgment.—This is a defendants' appeal against the decree granting the full claim of the plaintiff-respondent. The claim is stated in the plaint to be based on a sarkhat or an acknowledgment, which was admittedly executed by the appellants on 15th June 1932 in renewal of an earlier acknowledgment dated 3rd June 1929. The appellants took various pleas, those with which we are concerned in this appeal being that the suit was based on a mere acknowledgment executed after the period of limitation had expired in respect of the previous sarkhat, and that as it did not fall within the requirements of S. 25 (3), Contract Act, the suit was barred by limitation. Other contentions were that part of the consideration for the sarkhat amounting to Rs. 500 was illegal being of a wagering nature, and they also claimed to have the transactions re-opened under the Usurious Loans Act. All these points were decided against the appellants in the lower Courts.

Before us the learned counsel for the respondent has endeavoured to side track the point of limitation, which the appellants have taken, by arguing that even if the point be conceded as to the sarkhat being beyond limitation when regarded according to the provisions of S. 19 read with S. 4, Limitation Act, limitation is saved by S. 6 since the respondent-plaintiff is a minor. Whether this plea would have succeeded if it had been taken in the trial Court is extremely doubtful, but we need not consider it here because in that Court not a word was said about the minority of the plaintiff, nor even in the lower appellate Court was any such plea taken as far as we can ascertain, since nothing has been said about it in the judgment of that Court. It is before us for the first time that the point appears to have been made. It was held in 17 C W N 667[1] by a Bench of the Calcutta High Court before whom the point of minority was similarly taken for the first time that the law expressly imposes upon a Court the duty of throwing out a suit or application filed after the period of limitation fixed therefor, and it may well be that, if a Court were to decree a suit or allow an application which was, in fact, time-barred without considering whether it was so or not, it could be said to have failed to exercise a jurisdiction vested in it by law so as to bring the matter within the scope of S. 115, Civil P.C., 1908. But we think that the same thing cannot be said of a Court merely because it has omitted to consider ex proprio motu the question whether a litigant was entitled to proceed out of time by reason of some special provision of law, such a question not having been raised by or on his behalf. If a litigant claims the benefit of an exceptional rule of the kind indicated it is clearly his duty both to do so expressly and to establish his claim. This is in accordance with general principles, and is recognized by O. 7, R. 1 of the Code, which provides for the contents of a plaint, and lays down a rule applicable, by virtue of S. 141, to applications mutatis mutandis. It is true that the petitioner was described in the headings to certain applications made in this case as a minor represented by a guardian, but that alone was clearly not sufficient to entitle him to the benefit of S. 7, Limitation Act; nor was it, in our opinion, sufficient to throw upon the Court the duty of protecting his interest by raising a point of this kind on his behalf.

Although this decision is more than a quarter of a century old, it has, so far we are aware, never been dissented from. It is therefore too late in this Court to raise the point of the minority of the plaintiff for the purpose of calling in aid the provisions of S. 6, Limitation Act. As regards the questions of limitation which were agitated in the lower Courts, the acknowledgment in suit was executed more than three years after the previous acknowledgment, but the Courts below have held, relying on 24 N L R 83,[2] that limitation is saved by reading the provisions of S. 4 along with S. 19, since on the date when the previous acknowledgment was due to expire the Courts were closed for the summer vacation. Therefore, it is said that the plaintiff could have instituted his suit on the old acknowledgment when the Courts re-opened. Instead of doing so, however, he accepted a fresh acknowledgment while he still had a right to sue and therefore it is said that the new acknowledgment was executed within limitation. It is certainly correct that that was the view expressed in 24 N L R 83[2] and if that were the last word on the subject, then the Courts below would have been perfectly correct to act upon that ruling. In 1935, however, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in 57 ALL 242,[3] while considering the applicability of S. 14, Limitation Act, to the facts of the case before them, pronounced that S. 4, Limitation Act, had nothing to do with computing the period prescribed under S. 14. The reasoning of their Lordships applies equally to a case where S. 19 is in issue as to a case where S. 14 applies. That case was followed by a Full Bench of the Lahore High Court in I L R (1938) Lah 193,[4] which was a case under S. 19, Limitation Act. The same view was also expressed in A I R 1937 Mad 367.[5] There are also rulings of the other High Courts which have applied the observations of their Lordships in 57 ALL 242[3] to cases under S. 20, Limitation Act : vide AIR 1939 ALL 252[6] and I L R (1938) ALL 861.[7] We entirely concur with those observations and hold therefore that the view expressed in 24 N L R 83[2] is not good law.

If then the appellants are correct in saying that the suit is founded on a mere acknowledgment, then it is barred by limitation. This therefore brings us to the question whether the suit is so founded and whether there was any consideration for the acknowledgment. Under S. 25 (3), Contract Act, an agreement made without consideration is void unless it is a promise, made in writing and signed by the person to be charged therewith, or by his agent generally or specially authorized in that behalf, to pay wholly or in part a debt of which the creditor might have enforced payment but for the law for the limitation of suits. The nature of an acknowledgment, such as that we are now considering, came before Bose J., in I L R (1940) Nag 441[8] and his reasoning in that case appears to us to be unanswerable :

> Unless a promise to pay is in writing it cannot fall within the purview of S. 25 (3), Contract Act. The implied promise to pay which is contained in all acknowledgments does not attract the provisions of S. 25 (3) of the Act, because the promise to pay is not in writing.

Here the words used in EX. P-1 are: "juna hisab raju karna baki dena raha Rs. 3200" which may be translated : "after taking old accounts into consideration there remains to be paid a balance of Rs. 3200." This is not quite the same as the wording of the document which Bose J., was considering in the above mentioned case but it is near enough for his reasoning to apply with equal force. Somewhat similar words to those used in Ex. P-1 but in the Gujarati language were used in a document which came under consideration in 40 Bom L R 1010[9] and the Bombay High Court took the same view as Bose J.: see also 31 N L R 105,[10] 52 Bom 521,[11] A I R 1939 Lah 466,[12] 8 Pat 706,[13] A I R 1940 Mad 678[14] and 23 ALL 502.[15] It follows therefore that, if there is no consideration for the implied promise to pay, S. 25 (3), Contract Act, will not come to the aid of the respondent. This is not an "account stated" of the kind which includes items on both sides which the parties have agreed to set off so that only the balance should be paid.

It has been strenuously argued before us by Mr. Padhye on behalf of the respondent that here there was a novation of the contract which novation is evidenced by this entry and by a post-card (Ex. P-4) written on 20th June 1931 by the appellants. As far as the post-card is concerned, it is by no means clear that it is addressed to the respondent; it purports to emanate from Heeralal Sheojiram whereas the appellants are Shivjiram and Chotelal, sons of Dhannalal, and it is addressed to Nirbhe Ramji Kanayalalji which is not the name of the plaintiff or of his father. Even if it is a communication from one of the parties to the other, it does not, in our view, evidence any novation. The idea of a novation first appears to have occurred in the lower appellate Court since it held that as the parties had agreed to pay the amount in ten instalments there was a novation of contract and a fresh cause of action at the time of execution of the sarkhat. It is this aspect of the case which Mr. Padhye has elaborated in his argument before us. We consider that the lower appellate Court, in coming to the conclusion that there was a novation, has lost sight of the exact nature of the appellants pleading. They did not admit that there was an unconditional agreement to pay the amount in ten yearly instalments. Their plea was that the acknowledgment and the oral undertaking to pay in instalments were given on the understanding that the accounts would subsequently be shown to them to satisfy them that the amount really was due and that in point of fact no accounts ever were shown to them. The same applies to the oral statement of Mr. Bapat on behalf of the defendants on 18th February 1935 at p. 12 of the paper book. It is clear to us that the plaintiff founded his case on this acknowledgment. He has stated so over and over again. If he wanted to make out a case of novation he should have pleaded the necessary facts to found novation and stated what was the original contract and in what way it had been replaced by a new contract. Mr. Padhye has argued that a letter, which is alleged to have been given by the plaintiff to the defendants at the time when the acknowledgment was executed and which is not forthcoming, falls within the provisions of S. 63, Contract Act, and therefore time does not begin to run until there was a failure on the part of the defendants to carry out the terms allowed to them by the letter. This argument would, in our opinion, have been a good one if it had been taken at the proper time, but we do not consider that it is a plea that can be advanced for the first time in second appeal.

It follows from the above that the appeal must succeed. It is not therefore necessary to consider the further points which were raised in the case about the wagering nature of the transaction in respect of Rs. 500 of the consideration or as to whether the transactions should have been reopened under the Usurious Loans Act. Accordingly the lower appellate Court's decree is set aside and the plaintiff's suit is dismissed with costs throughout.

(a) Deed—Construction—Case law is not very helpful for that purpose.

A charge in India cannot usefully be compared with a charge, legal or equitable, in England because in India such a charge is defined by statute. A charge is something other than a transfer of an interest in specific immovable property. It is not a question whether there is an expression of an intention to create an interest but whether on its true construction, the document makes immovable property security for the payment of money : Case law discussed. [P 103 C 2]

By a document one J admitted liability. In respect of that liability he undertook to execute a charge bond over a specified share and rights in a village together with the sir land. J further had undertaken to get sanction for the transfer of sir and not to assign certain property until the above were carried out :

Held that the last undertaking was to segregate the property so that it would be answerable in the hands of J should he fail to give the charge bond, and that made the property a security for the payment of money. A charge was thus created by the deed. [P 105 C 1; 2]

Judgment. — This appeal raises a question under S. 100, Transfer of Property Act. It is concerned with the construction of EX. P-1. Does that document, which was duly registered, create a charge? Essentially by that document one J admits liability. In respect of that liability he undertakes to execute a charge bond over a specified share and rights in a village called Nawagaon together with the sir land. Sir land being involved there can, under the law applicable in the Central Provinces, be no effective transfer without the sanction of a certain administrative officer. Accordingly the next undertaking is that J will obtain the necessary sanction. That is followed by a promise to execute the above-mentioned charge bond within a month of obtaining sanction. The charge bond is to be registered. Then the agreement in question provides :

Unless (until) the writing and the registration have been effected with respect to mouza Nawagaon, sir land and houses according to the terms laid down above, I will not assign in any way to anybody, my decree obtained from the Court of the Judicial Commissioner (Nagpur) in cases Nos. 16 and 34 of 1929 nor will I transfer any property whatsoever, which I have acquired from the said Court by virtue of the decree. And I will fully abide myself with the terms of the agreement. If I act in contravention of any term whatsoever, the said creditors will be at liberty to file a suit immediately against me in respect of their claim and recover their amount due, by attachment and sale of my entire property which I have described above. I will further stipulate in the charge bond that in case the entire claim of the creditors is not satisfied by attachment and also of the property that will be laid down in the charge bond, they will be entitled to recover their remaining claim from my any other property, moveable or immovable, which they may desire.

The sanction was never sought ; the charge bond was never given. Does the above create a charge separate from the charge that was going to be created by the charge bond? A large number of cases have been cited before us by each side but in a matter such as the present turning on the construction of a document cases are not very helpful except to clear one's mind as to the essence of the transaction which the agreement is said to effect. There is little doubt what a charge (when within S. 100, Transfer of Property Act) is in India. It cannot usefully be compared with a charge legal or equitable, in England because in India such a charge is defined by statute. Section 100, Transfer of Property Act, provides that :

Where immovable property of one person is by act of parties or operation of law made security for the payment of money to another, and the transaction does not amount to a mortgage, the latter person is said to have a charge on the property.

What is essential is that immovable property must be made a security for the payment of money in such a way that the transaction does not amount to a mortgage in the Indian law sense. Now in that sense a mortgage is a transfer of an interest in specific immovable property for the purpose of securing various things which include the payment of money : see S. 58, Transfer of Property Act. Of course if the transaction falls within S. 58, it is outside S. 100. So a charge is something other than a transfer of an interest in specific immovable property. 49 Cal 820[1] at pp. 835 and 836, gives an example of a charge. Settlement of Blackacre to certain uses with direction to pay out of income certain periodic and ascertained sums to X. No interest in Blackacre is so to speak, segregated, so as to make it security for the payment to X of the indicated sums. Anybody buying blackacre or an interest in blackacre with knowledge of the charge would be bound by it. It will be seen that there the charge arises out of a transaction that belongs to the law of trusts rather than to conveyance or contract. In 5 Luck 365[2] the Privy Council applying the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act, as expressing the principle of equity, justice and good conscience to a transaction of 1881 expressed the following opinion at p. 368:

> It appears to them clear . . . . . that the parties intended that the original village should remain in the possession of the mortgagees until the second debt was paid off, and intended therefore that the property should be security for the debt.

Cases relating to debentures, at any rate where, as in 59 Cal 377,[3] they turn on circumstances quite outside the present case, are not helpful. So cases like 24 C W N 929[4] do not assist. The facts there are complicated but narrow down to this: If A has two villages X and Y and he keeps one (X) and hands one (Y) to B to enjoy on terms that B has the revenue and A pays the Government revenue, has B a charge over X in order to secure the payment of Government revenue to A on Y? The answer was, of course, no. It was pointed out that A's obligations to B were purely contractual:

> . . . . . there is not a word (in the award under consideration which resulted in the above arrangement) to suggest that (A) agreed to the creation of a 'charge' on his estate (X) or to hypothecate it for the revenue of (Y) granted to (B).

40 Cal 514[5] which was relied on by the respondent for the proposition that no charge can be created by implication (the observations in 11 M L J 186,[6] being relied on) is not a very clear case and is concerned with quite different facts from the present. It does not purport to decide that before one can hold that a document on its proper construction creates a charge it must be expressly stated that a charge is created. No one doubts that before there can be a charge so created the document must operate to make immovable property security for the payment of money. What we are concerned with in this case is whether this document on its true construction has that effect. In 24 M L J 474[7] the clause that was being construed was "until the said amount is paid Blackacre should not be dealt with by defendants 1 and 2 in any manner." That clause appeared in a compromise decree. The Court observed:

> The promise contained in the compromise not to alienate the property to third persons without the payment of the plaintiffs' debt is only a covenant not to create any interest in it in favour of others. There is no expression of an intention to create an interest in the plaintiffs' favour.

It will be noted that if the transaction amounted to a transfer of an interest it would not be a charge but a mortgage. We, with respect, consider therefore that it is not a question whether there is an expression of an intention to create an interest but whether, on its true construction, the document makes immovable property security for the payment of money. The learned Judges in 24 M L J 474[7] rely on 3 Cal 336[8] as deciding that a covenant not to alienate "was regarded as insufficient to create a charge." Their Lordships could hardly have referred to 3 Cal 336[8] which decides that such a covenant does not amount to a mortgage. Nevertheless in A I R 1934 Mad 713,[9] a decision to which one of us (Stone C. J.) was a party, 24 M L J 474[7] was cited with approval. A I R 1934 Mad 713[9] is distinguishable from the present case. It was concerned with registration. There were also questions about admitting further evidence. The evidence sought to be introduced was a letter addressed to a bank by the defendant's father undertaking not to alienate certain properties. At the date of the letter there was no money payable to the bank which commenced its advances some time later. It was held that the letter did not amount to a charge, and following 58 Cal 136,[10] on appeal to Privy Council 59 Cal 377,[3] that effectively to create a charge it would have to be registered. It was also observed: "We agree with the decision in 24 M L J 474.[7]"

24 M L J 474[7] was dissented from in A I R 1929 Oudh 539[11] which follows 36 ALL 201.[12]

As in 58 Cal 136[10] so in A I R 1929 Oudh 539[11] it was stressed that the law does not prescribe any particular form of words as necessary to create a charge. The determination of the question in all such cases rests upon the intention to make the particular property a security for the payment of money. We do not find that the other cases cited before us are very helpful. The learned Judge has referred to 14 Cal 687[13] (and the appellants have cited 7 Pat 584[14] as being a case dissenting from 14 Cal 687[13]). What 14 Cal 687[13] decides is that the document to effect a charge must effect it at once and not in futuro. Assuming for the sake of argument that that is so (it is not very obvious why) no one doubts that if the part of this document under consideration creates a charge at all it creates it at once. The argument before the lower Court doubtless was that as J had agreed to give a charge bond and do this and that the charge did not operate at once. In our opinion the undertaking, which either does or does not amount to a charge, was an undertaking binding from the moment the document was executed.

Without going so far as to say that a mere bare undertaking not to alienate property necessarily creates a charge we are clearly of the opinion that this document creates a charge. It has been urged that this might be so had the passage above quoted at "with the terms of the agreement". But it goes on to describe what is to happen if J fails to carry out his promises. That, it is urged, imposes the sanction and that is the only sanction. We do not think so. Anybody reading this document would know, (1) that J had undertaken to give a charge bond, (2) that J had undertaken to get sanction for the transfer of sir, (3) that J had undertaken not to assign certain property until the above were carried out.

In our opinion the only possible purpose of the last undertaking was to segregate this property so that it would be answerable in the hands of J should he fail to give the charge bond, and that we think makes this property a security for the payment of money. The appeal is accordingly allowed with costs. The decree will incorporate the clauses of the trial Judge's decree together with a provision relating to the costs in the lower Appellate Court and here which will be the plaintiffs'. It should be added that the Court raised a question of the appropriate stamp. By the Stamp Act, S. 2 (17), mortgage deed is so defined as probably to include a document creating a charge. This document is not so stamped. The document has, however, been admitted and no party has raised this point probably for that reason.

Vivian Bose J. — The suit is for the price of goods supplied to the defendant by the plaintiff for the running of a ginning factory at Akot during the year 1933-34. The defendant was then a minor and the only question is whether, in the circumstances, the plaintiff can recover. The factory belonged to the defendant's father Balkisandas and the plaintiff used to supply him with gin stores and coal for running it. These were all paid for. The father died in 1932 according to the plaintiff and the plaintiff says that he continued to supply goods as before. Those supplied in the year 1932-33, after the father's death, were duly paid for but trouble arose in connexion with those supplied during the year 1933-34. The defendant's case is this. He admits that the factory has come down to him from his father, but he states that his step-mother, who is his guardian, did not want to run the factory during the year 1932-33 but wanted to keep it idle in combination with other ginning factories. But his guardian's muktyar Laxminarayan, instead of carrying out his mistress' instructions, started it in competition with other factories against the guardian's wishes and ran the factory at a loss. The defendant states that the goods were supplied to the order of this muktyar who had no authority to order them and consequently he is not liable. Both the lower Courts hold that Laxminarayan was the manager of the factory and that he had authority from the defendant's guardian to run it. They also hold that the defendant's step-mother must have known that it was being run. These are questions of fact which are binding here. The lower Courts also find that the business was an ancestral one and it is admitted on all hands that the defendant is a Hindu.

As regards the position of the defendant's step-mother, the finding of the lower appellate Court is that though she was not the natural guardian she was the de facto guardian of the defendant and was the manager of her estate under the Hindu law. The learned Judge also finds that the goods were supplied, that they were supplied in the ordinary course of business and that they were necessary for the running of the factory. The first Court decreed the claim being of opinion that questions of benefit to the estate and of legal necessity did not arise because it considered that the carrying on of a family business was in itself a family necessity. The learned Judge of the lower appellate Court differed from this and held that as no benefit to the estate was established the suit must be dismissed. Questions of difficulty arise if the matter is viewed from the point of view of "necessaries" within the meaning of S. 68, Contract Act. Under the English law the rule would appear to be confined to contracts entered into by the infant personally, and he would appear to be bound only if the contracts relate to his person, such as contracts for necessaries, food, clothing, lodging, contracts of marriage and contracts of apprenticeship and service. Because of these limitations it was held in (1912) 2 K B 419[1] at p. 422, that a trading contract would not come within that category: see also Bullen and Leake's Precedents of Pleading, Edn. 7, p. 598. This decision has been criticised by the learned authors of Salmond and Winfield's Law of Contracts, p. 453. They state that:

> No adequate reason is suggested for this rule, and it is not easy to reconcile it with the fact that many contracts of employment (which are admittedly valid) look like trading contracts. Nevertheless the law has been stated in terms which would exclude a trading contract not only from the head of 'benefit', but also from that of 'necessaries'.

The English authorities are not binding here and it may well be that the Indian law is different. In any event, the Privy Council has held that an agreement which is not enforceable at law, and which is consequently void under the Contract Act, is not a contract: see 45 ALL 179[2] at p. 184. Therefore the English rule which appears to limit a claim for necessaries to cases in which it is possible to sue a minor on his contract is probably inapplicable in India because here a contract entered into by a minor is void from its inception and not merely voidable, and consequently is no contract at all in law and therefore cannot be sued upon: see 30 Cal 539.[3] Also in any case no such words of limitation are to be found in S. 68. Some of the Indian decisions seem to have carried the meaning of the word "necessaries" farther than the English authorities would appear to warrant: see for instance, the cases collected in T. S. Venkatesa Iyer's Law of Contract, Edn. 3, p. 778; and at least two decisions of this Court, A I R 1938 Nag 65[4] and A I R 1938 Nag 68.[5] But I need not enter into that here, because we are dealing here with the ancestral business of a Hindu and so the rules of Hindu law special to that class of case apply. It was stated in 13 N L R 109[6] at p. 111 that :

> Where a Hindu family maintains itself by trade, and a minor becomes by inheritance the sole owner of such business, if the trade is thereafter carried on by the guardian, the assets of such business will be liable for debts contracted by the guardian necessarily incidental to and flowing out of the carrying on of the trade along its normal course;

and at p. 113 that > the mere fact that the money and goods were supplied to carry on a shop for the defendant is not enough. If the shop was the ordinary business of the family and the guardian confined himself to carrying it on in the usual course without undue speculation, as a means of maintaining and advancing the minor, those facts should have been alleged and a decree claimed against the assets of the shop.

This rule was also applied in 20 Bom 767.[7] But apart from these two cases, and a Calcutta decision to which I shall refer later, I have not been able to find any decision in which the minor was the sole owner of the business at the date of the transaction. When the family owning the business consists of adult coparceners as well as minors, there is not much difficulty. It was held at a very early date in Taylor's Rep 279[8] that an ancestral trade descends upon the members of a joint Hindu family like any other property. From this followed the corollary that the manager could bind the other members by all acts necessarily incidental to and flowing out of the carrying on of that trade, because, as the learned author of Mayne's Hindu Law, Edn. 10, points out at p. 399, > credit is the very essence of trade and the existence of a business creates the necessity for borrowing and purchasing on credit.

The reason for this has been put in various ways, but none of them necessarily applies when a minor is the sole owner. Thus in 1 Bom H C R App 51[9] at p. 72 it was said that :

> The general benefit of the undivided family is considered by Hindu law to be paramount to any individual interest, and the recognition of a trade, as inheritable property, renders it necessary for the general benefit of the family that the protection, which the Hindu law generally extends to the interests of a minor, should be so far trenched upon as to bind him by acts of the family manager necessary for the carrying on and consequent preservation of that family property ; but that infringement is not to be carried beyond the actual necessity of the case.

This decision was given in the year 1863, and it will be seen that so far from endorsing the view that the position is the same when the minor is the sole owner it is diametrically opposed to it. The ruling shows that the Hindu law disregards the special interests of the minor in this class of case because it considers that the general benefit of the undivided family is paramount to any individual interest. The rule which that case laid down was that :

> In carrying on such a trade, infant members of the undivided family will be bound by all acts of the manager, or the adult members acting as managers, which are necessarily incident to and flowing out of the carrying on of that trade whether it be singly or with a copartner (p. 71).

It will be observed that the word "manager" has been used, and that seems to have caused some confusion in later cases. In my opinion, the word used there means the manager of an undivided Hindu family as ordinarily understood, that is to say, one of the adult members who has been invested with rights of management by the others. It does not mean the guardian of a minor. In fact there neither is nor can be a guardian of minor's property in an undivided Hindu family which has adult members. The manager is not the guardian and cannot be appointed as such under the law. This was decided by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 25 ALL 407[10] and was followed by the Nagpur Judicial Commissioner's Court in 12 N L R 12[11] at p. 15. In a Calcutta Full Bench of the year 1878, 3 Cal 738[12] at p. 741, the matter was put a little differently by Garth C. J. He said :

> On principle there ought not to be any difference between the nature of the liability of an infant admitted by contract into a partnership business and that of one on whose behalf an ancestral trade is carried on by a manager.

This was quoted with approval in a Bombay Full Bench by Jenkins C. J., 26 Bom 206[13] at p. 213, and again by Batchelor J. in 34 Bom 72[14] at p. 86 who said :

If this reasoning is right, we have taken what appears to me to be the really important step in the case, that is, the step from the ordinary Hindu law as to a manager's power of alienation to the law of partnership.

Of course the learned Judge realized that there was no true partnership and said so, but he thought that the analogy between such a joint firm in its relations with the outer world and an ordinary partnership is in many respects very close.

But in Mayne's Hindu Law, Edn. 10, pp. 391 and 392, the learned author states that after the passing of the Partnership Act it would seem no longer correct to say that a joint family business has many of the incidents of a partnership.

But however that may be, the reasoning in these decisions would appear to be based on the assumption that there are adult coparceners as well as minors in the joint family. In the Calcutta Full Bench the facts were these. One A. C. carried on business as a trader and had dealings with the plaintiff's firm. He died leaving widows and two minor sons. After his death the ancestral business was carried on under the management of the widows. But as they were pardanashin they employed their son-in-law, H, to manage on their behalf. H continued the dealings with the plaintiff's firm until one of the two brothers attained majority. After that, the major brother and H jointly managed the business and still continued the dealings with the plaintiff's firm. In the course of those transactions the defendants became indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of Rs. 4605-11-3. This debt related entirely to the transactions entered into after the father's death. The learned Judges who decided the case drew no distinction between the period when H (who acted on behalf of the minor's guardians, as here) was in sole management, and that when one of the brothers, after attaining majority, was also a manager. They grounded their decision entirely on this :

On principle there ought not to be any difference between the nature of the liability of an infant admitted by contract into a partnership business and that of one on whose behalf an ancestral trade is carried on by a manager.

If there is no difference, then it is difficult to see where the Hindu law comes in, and why the rule should be limited to an ancestral trade. It ought logically to apply to all minors, whether Hindu or not, and to all trades. The reasoning would appear to be relevant only if there are adult members in management, and the reference to partnerships confirms this; also the fact that the only three rulings relied on were cases in which the minor was not the sole owner. In a partnership each partner is part owner of the business in the same way as each member of a joint family is a co-owner of the family estate. He is not a mere servant or agent employed for a special purpose: and being an owner he has as much right to enjoy and use the joint property for his own benefit as any other co-owner. His powers are consequently wider than those of a guardian, or of a manager who holds entirely for another and has no right to make any personal use of the property. Therefore when there are adult coparceners in management the analogy becomes close. But it wears thin when there are none. But even if this analogy breaks down, as the learned author of Mayne's Hindu Law suggests, then there would appear to be even less justification for assuming that rules which obtain in the one case must also apply in the other. The only other cases which deal with minors who were the sole owners of the business are 13 N L R 109[6] at p. 111 and 20 Bom 767.[7] Unfortunately, neither case furnishes any reason for extending rules which deal with families where adults are in management to the case of a minor who is the sole owner of the business. They both assume that because the Hindu law has laid down one rule in the one case it follows that the same rule must also apply in the other; a consequence which I do not think necessarily follows. Jenkins C. J. extended this rule to the case of a Hindu widow who had succeeded to an ancestral business in 26 Bom 206.[13] But I think that that can be distinguished, because a Hindu widow, though a limited owner, fully represents the estate for the time being, and it is her duty to preserve it and hand it on to the reversioners after her death.

Of course this is also the duty of a guardian, or a manager of a minor's property. But that is a duty which every guardian owes to his ward whether the latter is a Hindu or not. There is nothing special to the Hindu law in it. What I am doing here is to try and discover some rule special to

Hindus and special only to ancestral businesses. The only ground, as I see it, on which the earlier rulings can be extended to a case like the present is to say that the guardian of the minor is the manager of the estate in the same sense as an adult member of a family who is entrusted with powers of management; and indeed this was the view of a Full Bench of the Judicial Commissioner's Court in 22 N L R 5[15] at p. 10. The learned Judicial Commissioners were of opinion that their Lordships of the Privy Council had decided this in 6 M I A 393.[16] With the utmost respect I do not think that that was so. It is true their Lordships called the guardian of the minor in that case (she was his mother) a manager at p. 412, but at p. 414 they made clear what they meant. They said :

> The plaint itself says she had possession as guardian, that is, as managing in that character; and on a review of the whole pleadings and documentary evidence, and of the probabilities of the case, their Lordships think it a strained and untrue construction to assign any other character to her acts than that which the plaint ascribes to them.

Of course a guardian of property is also a manager, but not the special kind of manager which the Hindu law envisages in the case of a joint Hindu family. Trevelyan in his Law relating to Minors, Edition 4, p. 139, describes the rights of a guardian of the property as follows :

> Subject to the restriction on the powers of testamentary guardian and of guardians of property appointed or declared by the Court, a guardian of property may do all acts which are reasonable and proper for the realization, protection and benefit of the property.
> The powers of a guardian are not co-extensive with those of a full owner. He is a trustee with powers of management and occasionally enlarged by necessity.

But this is general to all guardians. It is not special to Hindus. In my opinion this is all that their Lordships of the Privy Council meant by saying that the guardian was a manager. Of course there are special rules by which a Hindu minor is bound because of his personal law. He is subject to obligations and liabilities which do not necessarily apply to other minors. He is, for example, under a pious obligation to pay his father's antecedent debts out of the joint family property of which he was the part owner as a member of the coparcenary in the father's lifetime, and of which he becomes (in the case put) the sole owner by survivorship after the father's death. He is also obliged to maintain certain females, and is under an obligation to marry off his sisters and so on. His guardian is entitled in these cases, and indeed bound, to discharge these obligations for him. The guardian is entitled to borrow money for these purposes and to bind the estate; and when there is no document binding the estate the creditors are, according to certain Indian decisions, entitled to recover on the ground that these purposes are necessaries within the meaning of S. 68, Contract Act, whether that is a right view I do not stop to enquire in this case, but if it is, it is general to all minors, and amounts to no more than saying that the guardian of a minor's estate is justified in making all reasonable and proper arrangements for meeting the minor's obligations; and more especially those which can be enforced against him in a Court of law. It is not easy to see why a Hindu minor should be treated differently in the class of case we are now considering, from any other minor similarly situated. The fundamental position is that an ancestral business is regarded as property under the Hindu law, which of course it is. The goods belonging to the business, its capital, its goodwill, and so forth, are looked upon as assets under any system of law. Why then should special rules which do not obtain in the case of other minors be necessary in the case of Hindus?

I realize that business is a special kind of property and that credit is usually necessary for running it, but that obtains in the case of everybody, and it is not obvious why the guardian of a Hindu minor should be under any greater obligation to preserve this kind of property for his ward, or to run greater risks in connexion with it, than any other guardian. Whatever rules obtain here ought logically to apply to all guardians and to all wards. If the Hindu texts had enjoined these special rules that would be another matter, but here we are dealing with judge-made law; and that law springs out of rules which are clearly necessary when there are adult coparceners who are as much entitled to use and enjoy the property as owners for their own benefit as are the minors. In their case a balance has to be struck between the rights of the adult members (who own the property), and of the adult manager (whose powers are much wider than those of a guardian), on the one hand, and the special measures which the law enjoins for the protection of minors, on the other. A similar conflict was already in evidence in the case of partnerships, and the Courts very naturally applied the rules obtaining there to what they described as the peculiar kind of partnership which obtains in the case of a Hindu trading family. For example in 1 Bom H C R App 51[9] at p. 72 Sauses, C. J. said:

> ...taking into account the intimate and fiduciary position of one partner towards a copartner, and the anxious protection afforded by Hindu law to the interests of a minor, I think it safer, etc.

But this conflict disappears the moment the minor becomes the sole owner of the business. In that event, it is no longer necessary to weigh the rights and privileges of the adult member against the protection afforded to the minor. All that has to be considered then is the interests of the minor in the ordinary way. But that, as I see it, is not peculiar to Hindus, but obtains in the case of all minors. However, the distinction has been drawn in the cases cited. It does not appear to have been questioned and it is of long standing. Therefore on grounds of stare decisis alone, I would have been disposed to follow those decisions. But that apart, the Nagpur Full Bench binds us; and once it is accepted that the guardian of a Hindu minor is the manager of his estate within the special meaning of that expression under the Hindu law, then the rest follows. The matter is debatable. But in view of 13 N L R 109,[6] 22 N L R 5[15] and the very early Calcutta and Bombay decisions which have never been questioned, I am not disposed to take a different view, as that might affect transactions entered into on the faith of these rulings. This is especially so as a recent Division Bench of this Court referred to some of these rulings without criticizm, 1938 N L J 375[17] at p. 377.

I have been at pains to examine the position at length because on a previous occasion when, sitting alone, and again as a member of another Division Bench in another case, I applied S. 68. Neither of those cases related to a trading family, but a case of this kind would be covered by the wider rule enunciated there if those decisions lay down the law aright. I am anxious to make it clear that in this case I neither approve nor disapprove of those rulings; nor do I say that the result would not be the same in a similar case relating to a non-Hindu minor along the lines of S. 68. All I decide here is that whether the case of a Hindu minor surviving to an ancestral business could or could not fall under S. 68, it certainly falls under the other rule which is special to Hindus. The next question is whether the acts of Laxminarayan fall within the purview of the rules I have been discussing. The learned Judge of the lower appellate Court holds that benefit to the estate has not been proved, and that the creditor made no enquiries. I do not think that those questions are relevant. It was held in 1 Bom H C R App 51[9] at p. 71 that:

> The power of a manager to carry on a family trade necessarily implies a power to pledge the property and credit of the family for the ordinary purposes of that trade. Third parties, in the ordinary course of bona fide dealings, should not be held bound to investigate the status of the family represented by the manager whilst dealing with him on the credit of the family property. Were such a power not implied, property in a family trade, which is recognized by Hindu law to be a valuable inheritance, would become practically valueless to the other members of an undivided family whereever an infant was concerned, for no one would deal with a manager if the minor were to be at liberty on coming of age to challenge as against third parties the trade transactions which took place during his minority.

This was endorsed by the Bombay Full Bench in 26 Bom 206[13] at p. 211 and by the Calcutta High Court in 5 Cal 792[18] at p. 805. In Mayne's Hindu Law, Edn. 10, p. 396, it is said that > an inherited business may involve quite as much risk as a new business and apparently there is no duty on the part of a manager to close down an ancestral business notwithstanding its evident risk. The element of risk, incident in varying degree to all kinds of trade or business, is necessarily assumed by trading families. But a speculative business, or one attended with unusual risk will be beyond the powers of a managing member to start or continue.

In 20 Bom 767[7] at p. 779, the enquiry was limited to seeing whether the acts were "necessarily incidental to or flowing out of the carrying on of that trade." The same test was applied in 13 N L R 109[6] at p. 111, with the added restriction quoted by Mayne, namely that the guardian must not travel beyond the carrying on of the business "in the usual course without undue speculation." In my opinion, these authorities make it clear that so long as the business is carried on in the usual course, third parties are protected and are not put on enquiry. In the present case both Courts are agreed that the goods (gin stores and coal) were supplied in the usual course of business and were necessary for the running of the factory. There is no suggestion that the goods supplied in the year in question were supplied on an extravagant scale or that there was any substantial difference between the quantities supplied in this and the previous years. In the circumstances I consider that the matter falls within the purview of the authorities quoted and that the minor is bound to make good the price out of his estate. The appeal succeeds. The decree of the lower appellate Court is reversed and that of the first Court restored. Costs here and in the lower appellate Court will be paid by the defendant-respondent.

Stone C. J. — I have had the advantage of perusing the judgment of Bose J., and I agree with his conclusion. I prefer, however, to say that the liability is created because the guardian's act was necessary for the proper conduct of an ancestral business.

First Appeal No. 13 of 1938, Decided on 8th December 1939, from decree of 3rd Addl. Dist. Judge, Nagpur, D/- 30th October 1937.

* (a) Contract — Building contract — Contractor contracting to put up building of particular kind in particular way and according to plans — Building owner appointing supervising engineer — Collusion between contractor and supervising engineer — Building when completed proving to be so grossly defective as to necessitate demolition — Joint decree for damages held could be passed against contractor and engineer — Measure of damages stated.

A building contractor contracted to put up a building of particular kind in a particular way and according to plans. The building owner appointed a supervising engineer. There was collusion between the contractor and the supervising engineer. When the building was nearly complete it proved to be so defective and out of level as to make it necessary to pull it down :

Held that the owner was entitled when there was either such gross incompetence or gross negligence or gross dishonesty to put an end to the whole contract; and this apart from any special clause in it. [P 113 C 2; P 114 C 1]

Held further that a joint decree against the contractor and the engineer could be passed even when the liability of one was in contract and that of the other in tort and even though the connexion between the owner and the one was a direct one while that between the owner and the other was indirect. [P 113 C 1]

Held also that the measure of compensation was the loss which the owner would suffer in erecting a structure of the kind for which he had contracted. [P 116 C 1]

(b) Contract — Building contract — Passing of running bills — Effect.

Passing of running bills by supervising engineer does not preclude the building owner from challenging the work done. [P 112 C 2]

Judgment

We are thus here concerned on any view with a bad building and the question is: What is the proper remedy? The building owner says that he does not want it at all. It is of no use to him; it cannot be put right; it has to be removed. The contractor says that he is agreeable to pull it down and to rebuild it. Alternatively he says if it is not pulled down it can be put right by lifting it in various ways so as to rectify the errors. The lower Court has in fact found that the right way to treat this matter is to consider how much the building owner has paid. Certain of those payments are referable to another piece of work and to a part of the present work that can be dissociated from the bad building. Therefore one deducts the sums referable to the work that has been properly done from the total payments made : the balance shows how much has been paid on account of this bad building. That is treated as money that is paid for nothing because this building has got to be removed; and accordingly the lower Court has given a decree for Rupees 10,115-12-0 and the contractor has been permitted to take this material away. As the lower Court has found collusion between defendant 1 and defendant 2 it has given a joint decree against them. What we have now to consider is : (1) whether this is the proper measure of damage ; (2) whether there should be a joint decree.

To consider the second question first : This is a case where, so far as the contractor is concerned, he is responsible to the building owner in contract. His contract was to put up a building of a particular kind in a particular way. He contracted to build according to plans. Those plans show a square and level building. If he delivers a building that is out of level so grossly as to make it useless or so unsightly as to make it necessary to pull it down then of course he has broken his contract. If the building owner chooses to throw up the contract — and that we consider is the position he takes up here — then this is a case where it is argued nothing has been done under the contract of any value so that the contractor is not entitled to sue on a quantum meruit, and the building owner has paid so many thousands of rupees for nothing. If this suit were laid in contract—or it may be in quasi contract—for money paid for no consideration the building owner it is urged would be entitled to get back his money. The contractor is liable for negligence also. As against the supervising engineer the building owner can sue him in contract or in tort for negligence, and the measure of damage would be again what the building owner suffered. In a recent case which came up to the Privy Council from Australia, (1936) A C 85,[1] their Lordships had to consider a much more difficult case where A sues B and C as a consequence of an injury that A sustained following upon the purchase from B of a defective article manufactured by C. Between A and B there was privity of contract and no negligence on the part of B because B was not aware of the defect which was latent. Between A and C there was no privity of contract but there was negligence in the manufacture of the article. The main question was : Was C liable, that is to say for negligence in manufacture, and could a decree be given against both B and C for the damage suffered ? It was decided that it could, the decree being against B in contract and against C for negligence ; and the decree was in the same form as the present decree is and would result in each being liable : if one was proceeded against wholly he would have his remedy for contribution against the other. These latter points were not decided in that case but they would follow directly from the granting of a joint decree against both.

We have now to consider the damages. What is the measure of damage in this somewhat unusual case where a building has been put up and nearly completed and yet proves so defective that there is a mass of evidence to the effect that it should be pulled down ? The contractor has pressed us with the view that this is a case where the building owner should recover only nominal damages, alternatively only 10 per cent. the retention money. The latter point is founded on the contract. We do not propose to examine it because we do not think that there is much weight in that branch of the argument. The retention money was not intended to cover defects going to the whole root of the contract but only to guard against the possibility of the building owner having to complete the work even though he had paid the running bills relying on the supervising engineer's signature. The point has also been made that this is a case where a supervising engineer has given progress certificates which are final. There is nothing, we think, in this point. Progress certificates have not been given. Running bills have been passed but such passing does not preclude the building owner from challenging the work done.

The other point is a little more difficult. Here one has a building owner appointing a supervising engineer. The supervising engineer so acts that the builder spends thousands of rupees in part payment for a building which will, as the supervising engineer should well know, have to be pulled down. It is said that an engineer is employed as agent : agent's knowledge is principal's knowledge ; the engineer knew the defects, therefore the principal knew : the principal stood by, and now he cannot recover. A somewhat more complicated case was considered in (1892) 2 Q B D 494.[2] That was more complicated because in that particular case it was not a building owner who was suing a contractor but a building owner suing a surety who had assured the true performance of the building contract. It was a case where the building contract provided that the engineer's certificate should be final and the engineer had given his certificate. The jury in an action between the building owner and the builder had held that it was fraudulently obtained and consequently not effective. Then the building owner, having been unable to get satisfaction from the contractor, sued the surety and the surety said :

> I am not liable because you (building owner) had a supervising engineer who allowed things to be done for which you are now holding me responsible.

It came before the Court of appeal, and Bowen L. J. (at p. 508) observed as follows :

> The doctrine of law on this subject established in (1819-21) 3 Cl & F 525,[3] and probably before the case, and expounded by subsequent authorities, particularly in (1854) 1 Kay 280,[4] and other cases referred to in (1890) 22 Q B D 394,[5] is this: mere omission on the part of the employer, mere passive acquiescence in acts which are improper on the part of the employer will not release the surety.

It is apparent from Lord Esher's judgment in the same case that the fact that the surety was there being sued caused the Court the only trouble that they had. Had the builder been sued, it would have been a clear case. In any event, it is clear from these decisions that a joint decree against two persons is possible even when the liability of one is in contract, and that of the other in tort and even though the connexion between the plaintiff and the one is a direct one while that between the plaintiff and the other is indirect. We have therefore no difficulty in holding that a joint decree against the two defendants is possible and that it should be passed in this case. The defence which might otherwise have been available to the contractor, namely that as the building was passed by the plaintiff's expert and agent up to the stage it has now reached it must be accepted as far as it goes, cannot be raised once it is found that the supervising engineer and the contractor were in collusion. We do not say that this defence would have been legally sound had the facts been otherwise. But as the point was argued, all we say is that the question does not arise in this case.

We now have to assess the damages and we think that the principle on which this should be done is to be found in the American Law Institute's Restatement of the Law, Contracts p. 574 to 577. Dealing with the question of damages in the case of construction contracts, the learned authors state:

> The purpose of money damages is to put the injured party in as good a position as that in which full performance would have put him; but this does not mean that he is to be put in the same physical position. Satisfaction for his harm is made either by giving him a sum of money sufficient to produce the physical product contracted for or by giving him the exchange value that that produce would have had if it had been constructed .... Sometimes defects in a completed structure cannot be physically remedied without tearing down and rebuilding at a cost that would be imprudent and unreasonable. The law does not require damages to be measured by a method requiring such economic waste.

We think that that accurately states the law which obtains, or which should obtain, here. The example given to illustrate the rule is this:

> A contracts to construct a school house for B for $50,000. When completed the foundations sink and the building is dangerous. B has paid A $30,000. At a cost of $40,000 more, B tears down the walls, strengthens the foundations, and rebuilds the superstructure, this being necessary to make the building safe. B can get judgment for $20,000 this amount being the cost of tearing down and rebuilding, less the part of the contract price not yet paid.

The first question therefore is to see whether the building must be pulled down and started afresh or whether rectification is possible. On this the defendant's experts state that rectification is possible and that it can be done at comparatively small cost. The plaintiff's expert thinks that rectification is not possible if what is required is a reasonably satisfying building for the price paid. We think that Ditchburn, P. W. 6, has better qualifications and much wider experience than the defendants' experts. It does not appear from the evidence of the latter that they have ever seen rectifications of this nature carried out or that they have ever done it themselves. As we have to choose between these two sets of opinions we prefer that of Ditchburn. This is particularly so as, though extraordinary feats of engineering are possible given the requisite knowledge, skill and machinery, we do not think they would be available in a place like Nagpur where constructional ability is not of a high order and where anything out of the ordinary is not often attempted. One has only to look to the results produced in this case by persons who are said to have qualifications which, judging from their own and their counsel's statements, as well as from the high prices charged and paid for their work, are regarded as extremely high in this locality. If this is the sort of state these local experts can get a building into, one trembles to think what would happen to any difficult and complicated engineering feat entrusted to their care. It is true the contractor has offered to do the rectification himself but seeing the work he has already done it is not surprising that the plaintiff is not prepared to entrust anything more to his hands.

The contractor has, as a matter of fact, offered to pull the whole thing down to the plinth level and start afresh from there without extra charge, and has undertaken to rebuild, using the old materials, to the satisfaction of any engineer the plaintiff chooses to name: a fair offer enough but not one which we can force the plaintiff to accept. In the first place, Ditchburn says this would not be satisfactory: the materials would be second-hand and the result in a measure patch-work. We agree with the lower Court that the plaintiff who has agreed to pay high rates for a really first class building should not have one which, at the best, would not be in that class, foisted upon him. But also as a matter of law the plaintiff is entitled, when there is either such gross incompetence, or gross negligence or gross dishonesty, it does not matter which, as here, to put an end to the whole contract: and this apart from any special clause in it. If we were to compel the plaintiff to accept the contractor's offer it would mean that we are depriving him of a right to which he is legally entitled. Moreover, as the lower Court remarks, the plaintiff has already afforded the defendants this opportunity by his letters, Ex. 1 (D-7) and Ex. (P-7). They did nothing about it, so he was fully justified in putting an end to the contract altogether. We are consequently of opinion that rectification is not the right remedy in this case.

As regards damages, the plaintiff wanted a first class building at a certain price. He is entitled therefore to be put as nearly as may be in the same position as he would have been in if things had been rightly and properly done. The lower Court holds in para. 22 of its judgment that the plaintiff has paid the contractor Rs. 17,036-15-0 and has supplied him with materials worth Rs. 424-11-0. That is to say the plaintiff has up to date, according to the lower Court, invested a sum of Rs. 17,461-10-0 in this building. For this money he has obtained what he has described as blocks A, B and C in his plaint. Of these, there is no complaint about blocks A and C except in a small matter which according to the lower Court can be set right at a cost of Rupees 10. We have therefore to deduct the sum spent on blocks A and C before we can arrive at any conclusion respecting block B. The lower Court's figures are based on the statement in the plaint and its schedule. But they are not accepted by the contractor. He states in para. 9 of his written statement that the payment towards the works in dispute totals only Rs. 16,780-15-0 and not the Rs. 17,461-10-0 mentioned in the plaint. The contractor's figures appear to be based on the plaintiff's measurement book, Ex. (P-6). This shows that the following sums were passed for payment on the dates shown against them below:

9-7-32	Rs. 4009-6-0
26-7-32	Rs. 2487-9-3
	Rs. 12,284-15-0
Add as per Schedule to the plaint.	Rs. 4,500-0-0
Total	Rs. 16,784-15-0

There is a small difference of Rs. 4, which we can ignore; it is probably a misprint. But though these seem to have been the sums passed for payment we find that the sums actually paid were those given in the plaint. The plaintiff's cashier, P. W. 4, speaking from the plaintiff's account books, states that he himself made the payments and that they were as follows:

25-5-32	Rs. 4209-13-9
11-7-32	Rs. 4009-6-0
26-7-32	Rs. 2487-9-3
19-8-32	Rs. 500-0-0
27-8-32	Rs. 4000-0-0.

These add up to the plaintiff's figure. The defendants have not shown us any accounts on their side, nor have they called for any receipts; consequently, we see no reason to disbelieve P. W. 4 and the plaintiff's books, especially as the lower Court has accepted the plaintiff's figure. We therefore hold that the sums actually paid to the contractor totalled Rs. 17,037-3-6.

The next dispute is about Rs. 424-11-0, the cost of materials supplied. The defendant's case is that only Rupees 85-8-0 is properly chargeable to this head and he complains that the plaintiff has included an item of Rs. 339-3-0 twice over in the schedule to his plaint. The schedule shows that on 23rd March 1932 Rs. 2122-5-0 was actually due to the contractor but he was only paid Rupees 1830-2-0 because a sum of Rupees 80-3-0 was deducted on account of materials supplied. A similar deduction was made on 25th May 1932 in respect of a sum of Rs. 259. The two together total Rs. 339-3-0. We do not think there is anything in this connexion. Had we been considering the sum properly payable to the contracter on the basis of sound work of course he would have been right. The plaintiff would not have been entitled to charge this over again. But we are not now considering what the contractor ought to get but what damages the two defendants should pay to the plaintiff. We cannot arrive at that figure without knowing how much the plaintiff has actually put into this building; not what he would have had to pay if it had been properly constructed, but how much he had actually spent. This sum totals up to Rs. 17,461-10-0 which the lower Court has accepted.

We have next to see how much of this went into blocks A and C. The figure given by the plaintiff in his plaint is Rs. 4149-10-9. The contractor's figure is Rs. 7345-14-0. We have to choose between the two. The lower Court has accepted the contractor's figure and the cross-objection and the revision which we have dismissed relate to Rs. 1000 out of this. The balance was apparently not questioned in either of these two proceedings. But however that may be, the lower Court points out that when the contractor questioned the plaintiff's figure and gave one of his own the plaintiff chose to reply, and though he questioned other portions of the paragraph in the written statement (namely para. 9) he did not question the accuracy of the contractor's figures on this point. Had he not replied the question would have been in issue but as he chose to file long and elaborate replies to practically every statement made, the matter assumes a different aspect. In these circumstances, and bearing in mind that the cross-objection and the revision have already been dismissed, we think it right, as the lower Court did, to adhere to the contractor's figure of Rupees 7345-14-0. When we deduct this from the total of Rs. 17,461-10-0 we find that Rupees 10,115-12-0 is the sum expended over block B. The question now is how much of this should be returned to the plaintiff.

We have already decided that rectification would not be the right remedy in this case. We agree with the plaintiff's expert Ditchburn that the building will have to be pulled down, but we are of opinion that the foundations will still be serviceable—in fact they will be all the better for having an opportunity to settle. Nobody has made any complaint about them, either as regards the quality of the materials used or the manner in which they have been laid. The reinforced concrete coping with which these foundations are finished off will of course have to be removed in order to enable the underneath to be properly levelled but up to that point we think the building must be regarded as sound and serviceable. Ex. P-6, which contains particulars of the first running bill, shows that it was paid for work up to the plinth stage. The total of the work done up to that stage was Rs. 2122-5-0 and deducting Rs. 80-3-0, the value of the materials supplied by the plaintiff, we get a figure of Rs. 2042-2-0 chargeable to that head. But out of this will have to be deducted the value of the materials which were used for the reinforced coping on top of the foundations. We have not been shown any evidence about this by either side and the matter is not of much importance any way, but as far as we can make out from the first running bill, items 6 and 7 relate to this head, and the amount referable to these items is the difference between Rs. 1852-5-0 which seems to be a running total at the end of item 7 and the Rs. 1675-8-0 which heads Col. 6. That is to say the total is Rs. 176-13-0. That makes the total properly debitable to the foundations as Rs. 1865-5-0 (that is to say, Rs. 2042-2-0 less Rs. 176-13-0). This figure must be deducted from the Rs. 10,115-12-3 awarded by the lower Court. That leaves a sum of Rs. 8250-7-3.

The next question is whether any of the materials used in other parts of the building will still be serviceable to the plaintiff for a new building. Ditchburn says that it will not be fair to saddle him with these used materials. We agree that so far as the bulk of them is concerned, that would not be right, but no complaint has been made about either the quality or the workmanship of the woodwork and it seems to us that most of it will still be serviceable. We think therefore that the door frames and shutters and the window frames and the skylight frames as also the wooden beams and trusses which support the roof of the upper storey should be reused and their cost as charged in these bills, less 20 per cent. for deterioration and the rough state in which they will now necessarily be, should be deducted. We also think that the iron girders can be used again and that in their case also their cost as charged to the plaintiff less 20 per cent. should be deducted. That means that the decree of the lower Court will be modified by substituting for the figure of Rs. 10,378-10-0 the figure which will now be obtained by deducting from Rs. 8250-7-3 the value as charged in the running bills of the door frames and shutters, the window frames and skylight frames and the iron girders, as also the wooden beams and trusses which support the roof of the upper storey, less 20 per cent. There will also be added to the decree a clause directing defendant 1 to restore to the plaintiff within the two months allowed the door frames, shutters, girders etc., which we have mentioned above, and of which a list will be given later, in good and serviceable condition for re-use, with a right to the plaintiff to apply to this Court to amend the decree in respect of any such material as is returned in an unserviceable condition. This latter part of the case was not argued before us as we cut counsel short on the extent of the damages to be allowed until we had decided the principle along which they should be awarded. The parties will therefore now file an agreed list, if that is possible, of the materials we have specified above and the cost debitable to them in accordance with the running bills. If they are unable to agree each will file his own list and we will determine the point. The 20 per cent. will be deducted by us and this list or these lists should not show the deduction.

The costs of this appeal and those in the Court below will be according to success and failure. A fresh period of two months from the date of the decree will now be fixed. The following clause in the lower Court's decree will also be modified: "and restore the ground to the same position in which it was before the construction of the building" will now read as "and restore the ground to the same position in which it was before the construction of the building with the exception of the foundations after removal of the reinforced cement coping. That will remain." We add that we have not overlooked the fact that ordinarily the plaintiff would also be entitled, after all these matters have been taken into account, to the difference between the price which he would have had to pay if the building had been properly constructed and that which he will be obliged to pay for the re-construction if the latter exceeds the former. But here the plaintiff's own case is that the prices agreed were high and that the market rates were much lower. It follows the plaintiff will not, on his own showing, now have to pay as much for the re-construction as he would have had to pay under the original agreement. Consequently, he is not entitled to anything along these lines and so we need not consider exactly what it will cost him to re-build. We also add that we have not overlooked the fact that the 20 per cent. rebate which we have allowed to the plaintiff on the price of such of the materials as in our opinion will still be serviceable, hits the contractor; also that he gets the benefit of whatever materials he removes; and that at the first blush this would appear to overlook the supervising engineer. But really it does not.

The liability, as we have pointed out, is joint and several and the measure of compensation is the loss which the plaintiff will suffer in erecting a structure of the kind for which he had contracted. This is a matter which is independent of personalities and so whoever is responsible in law for this loss must suffer a decree to be passed against him for the full amount. If there is inequality as between the defendants inter se that is a matter which they will have to settle between themselves. So far as the plaintiff is concerned there is only one standard. We may add that at first we had thought of directing that the decree be executed in the first instance against the contractor and then against the supervising engineer only for such balance as was irrecoverable from his co-defendant. But in view of the unfounded attacks made on the plaintiff by defendant 2, which were persisted in in this Court in spite of warning, we see no reason why we should, in the exercise of our discretion, discriminate between the two. In the eye of the law they are both jointly and severally liable and we think that the law should be allowed to follow its normal course.

Judgment. — This appeal raises a point of difficulty in the Hindu law of adoption. Nearly the whole of this difficulty arises out in 12 Pat 642,[1] a decision of the Judicial Committee that marked a reorientation, if not a definite departure, relating to the factors which have to be considered in determining whether an adoption can be made by a widow. The logical difficulty mainly flows from the consideration that the principle laid down seems to point in one direction whereas certain excerpts from earlier decisions extracted and cited with what appear to be approval seem to point in another direction. For the sake of lucidity, we have invented a word and we shall throughout, so far as possible, use the same letters to describe the following persons :

| |
E E'

A is the deceased grandfather. B is the deceased father. C is the widow of the grandfather termed throughout this judgment the "grandwidow." D is the father's widow, termed the "widow." E, E', E'' are the sons natural-born, adopted by widow, adopted by grandwidow respectively. The facts which it is necessary to state before the point can be formulated are as follows: A certain Hindu undivided family included the following members :

Girjabai=Bhiwaji (d. 1912)=Gopibai (d.1927)

Pisabai	Laxmi=Kondba (d. 1918) (remarried 4 months after husband's death)	Dattu (deft. adopted 1921 by Gopibai.)
Vithal (P. 3)	Kesheo (P. 4)

The appellant is defendant 2, a purchaser of property, parcel of the ancestral property, from Dattu (or Dattoo) defendant 1 and respondent 5. Plaintiffs 1 and 2 are purchasers of the suit property from plaintiffs 3 and 4. In essence therefore this is a contest between stranger purchasers of items of joint family property. One says that Dattu is entitled, the others say that Vithal and Kesheo are entitled. That dispute in turn depends on whether Dattu was effectively adopted by Gopibai and that depends on whether A's grandwidow C can adopt a son to A when A had a son B who died leaving widow D who remarried. It is to be assumed that at the date of adoption B was dead and that at that date D had passed out of the family by remarriage so that it was, for all purposes of adoption in that family, as if she were dead. Thus, admittedly, the question can be narrowed down to this: Can the grandwidow adopt to A after A has had a son B who has married, granted B and his wife are dead? It may be said at once that there is a mass of authority supporting a negative answer. A negative answer has been given by the learned Judge from whose decision this Letters Patent appeal has been brought. The lower appellate Court took the same view and the trial Court arrived at the same result but by a line of thought, no longer valid, which may be called the old view.

It is as well to observe, however, that the spiritual aspect had been referred to in cases long before 12 Pat 642.[1] It is only necessary to refer to the observations of the Judicial Committee in 3 I A 154[2] made as long ago as 1876. The old view was this: The power to adopt was a power relating to property and is lost once the power over property is lost and that power, in so far as it consists in the widow's power by adoption to vest property in an adopted son, is lost once it is acquired by another. The principle established by 12 Pat 642[1] is that adoption in essence is not an economic but a religious act having for its primary purpose the artificial creation of a son who can, as a real son, offer those oblations necessary for the future well being of the fictional father. One would think that as a logical consequence the question whether C could or could not adopt to A would depend solely on whether there was or could be anyone other than C who could adopt to A. If there is no one else and if A has no son one would have thought that the religious duty or right or power (whichever way one cares to express it) would fall upon or be possessed by C and it would not make the slightest difference that sometime before D (now dead) had the power to adopt to B. The religious need is a son. It is a need divorced from property. Paupers have souls and souls need prayers. That is the fundamental conception. Prayers must be by the living. The living are the more efficacious the nearer they are, and the nearest is the son, natural-born or adopted makes no difference. But, aping nature, the power to give a son, actual or fictional, is restricted to a class. There is no need for a grandwidow to adopt to her dead husband if there is a widow to adopt to her dead husband. Obviously there is no need for a grandwidow to adopt at all, if her dead husband has left a son, while the son is living. The purpose of adoption has not arisen.

All this follows directly from the reasoning in and the thoughts underlying 12 Pat 642.[1] But what happens if in fact there is neither son nor grandson, the son being dead and his widow not being enceinte, and the grandwidow C wants to adopt to her husband and the widow D does not want to adopt to her husband? The conflict between religious and property considerations is at once brought out. From a religious point of view, C ought to be able to protect her deceased husband from the irreligious D but it is admitted (as it must be on the cases as they stand) that C cannot adopt while D is alive and able, though not willing, to adopt. But it has been very strenuously argued that different considerations apply if D is dead either actually or, for this purpose, in the eye of the law, e. g., by remarrying into another family. We say at once that all the logic seems to be with Mr. Padhye who so argues. The difficulty is that so much authority seems to be the other way. The case mainly relied on by Mr. Padhye was the Privy Council decision in 59 Bom 360[3] at p. 364. Using the letters already employed the relationships there were :

|     |
|     E''

E'' was adopted after B and D had gone into another family by the adoption of B (who was at the time married : see 59 Bom 360[3]). The Judicial Committee, following 12 Pat 642,[1] held that C could adopt E'' after B's adoption into another family because > the power of a widow to adopt does not depend upon the question of vesting or divesting of the estate. The purpose of an adoption is to secure the continuance of the line, and when the natural son has left no son to continue the line, nor a widow to provide for its continuance by adoption, his mother can make a valid adoption to her deceased husband, although the estate is not vested in her.

In 31 N L R Sup 180[4] at p. 189 it is pointed out that 12 Pat 642[1] refers to the doctrine of Hindu law that the husband and wife are one and that in the widow half of the husband survives. Therefore so long as she survives the son is not wholly dead and she alone can adopt and the grandwidow cannot be regarded as sonless and cannot adopt. But when the widow dies actually or notionally the grandwidow's right revives. As the learned Judges there say :

> It is on the death of the son's widow without adoption that the mother (the grandwidow of our argument) would have the right to exercise her power to adopt.

On the other hand Pollock J., in 17 N L J 57[5] followed the dictum in 26 Bom 526[6] at p. 532 which was quoted without apparent disapproval (Pollock J. says with approval) in 12 Pat 642[1]:

> Where a Hindu dies leaving a widow and a son and that son dies leaving natural born or adopted son or leaving no son but his own widow to continue the line by means of adoption, the power of the former widow is extinguished and can never afterwards be revived.

That dictum is expressly based on the reasoning of Lord Kingsdown in 10 M I A 279.[7] If page 531 of 26 Bom 526[6] is read (and it is the page examining what was decided in 10 M I A 279[7]) it will be seen that the whole problem is being considered in the light of what we have called the old view—power depending on property. Thus the learned Judge explains Lord Kingsdown's second illustration:

> According to it, again, where a Hindu dies leaving a widow and a son, and that son dies leaving his widow and a son, the power of adoption of the former widow is "at an end" the moment the estate passes to the grandson.

Illustration 3 also relied on entirely turned on the conception of a vested estate. 39 Bom L R 599[8] is exactly the present case. Purporting to follow 12 Pat 642[1] a Bench of the Bombay High Court held that the adoption was invalid. The passage relied on at page 603 (from 60 I A 242[1] at p. 256) will be seen on examination to lay down that the grandwidow's power is gone. It leaves open whether it can ever revive. It does however clearly and in express terms differentiate between the case where there is a son (power of grandwidow suspended reviving on son's death) and where there is a grandson or son's widow (power of grandwidow gone). In ILR (1939) Nag 88[9] at p. 98, a Bench decision of this High Court to which one of us was a party, it was observed :

> Any limit to the widow's power of adoption that may be laid down to avoid practical difficulties would in its nature be arbitrary. It is therefore advisable to leave it to the Legislature to amend the law. In the meantime the limit indicated in 12 Pat 642[1] may be regarded as the only limit.

In 41 Mad 855,[10] a case we shall have to return to when examining 12 Pat 642,[1] the relationships were :

|

B died "after attaining full legal capacity to continue the line of descent either by a natural born son, or by the adoption to him of a son by his widow who was not proved to have no power to adopt." It was held by the Judicial Committee that C's power to adopt was gone. In 55 Mad 581,[11] the limit of the widow's power was regarded as correctly summarized in the passage from 26 Bom 526[6] already quoted. So far as we can see, this case, 55 Mad 581,[11] is not in agreement with the majority decision in I L R (1937) Bom 508.[12] This important case was referred to in ILR (1939) Nag 88[9] at p. 92. It takes up an intermediate position where the coparcenary has terminated. It was there held that the adoption is valid for ceremonial purposes but does not divest the property which devolved on the heir of the last surviving coparcener (other than the widow) or those claiming through him or her. We do not feel ourselves bound by 25 N L R 144.[13] It proceeded on the old view and it was regarded as overruled in 31 N L R Sup 180.[4] Bose J., in the present case has taken the view he has because, to use his own words:

> whatever else their Lordships in 12 Pat 642[1] at p. 650 may have meant they clearly decided that the mother cannot adopt when the son dies leaving a widow who can.

We are inclined to agree with that observation. The real difficulty lies in the question: Does the power revive if the son's widow dies, or otherwise becomes incapable of adopting, before she (i. e. the son's widow) adopts? We fully bear in mind the warning given by the Judicial Committee in 3 I A 154[2] that it is the duty of the Court "to keep the power (to adopt) strictly within the limits which the law has assigned to it." We contrast this with the warning given in 12 Pat 642[1] at page 650:

> Great caution should be observed in shutting the door upon any authorized adoption by the widow of a sonless man.

The difficulty is to find the boundary line. We think the best way to approach that is to take 12 Pat 642[1] as our guide. It should be made plain that as was pointed out in I L R (1939) Nag 88[9] at p. 93, the widow who adopted there, (i. e., in the case reported in 12 Pat 642,[1]) had no estate vested in her. The estate in question was an impartible zamindari passing by inheritance from which females were excluded. The main argument against the adoption was that the adopting widow had no estate. The estate had vested in the plaintiff before the adoption was made, i. e., on the death of the son. This argument was negatived. The suit was apparently (see 10 Pat 1[14] at pp. 5 and 45 and 12 Pat 642[1]) one instituted by a person claiming to succeed as heir to the zamindari on the death of the son and claiming as a separated sapinda. The result was that the suit was dismissed. It should further be made clear what their Lordships decided. There the following persons existed:

The rules of succession were such that on the death of A the whole estate passed to B and on the death of B, the whole estate passed through Y to Z, unless C could adopt to A. If she could, the whole estate passed to such adopted son, as from the death of the son. When B died he was 20, unmarried, and a ward. C adopted E''. The suit was by Z claiming to succeed and it was dismissed. It was dismissed because the Judicial Committee held that C could adopt E''. Her power to adopt was suspended while B was alive and revived on his death. In the above table Y and A are not brothers but both descend from X. We will first examine 12 Pat 642[1] and then see how the matter is affected by 59 Bom 360.[3] In 12 Pat 642[1] at pp. 650-651 their Lordships state that the power is not limitless, that a limit must be fixed consonant to the spirit of Hindu law and equities. The exact words are:

> The Hindu law itself sets no limit to the exercise of the power during the lifetime of the (donee), and the validity of successive adoptions in continuance of the line is now well recognized. Nor do the authoritative texts appear to limit the exercise of the power by any considerations of property. But that there must be some limit to its exercise, or at all events some conditions in which it would be either contrary to the spirit of the Hindu doctrine to admit its continuance, or inequitable in the face of other rights to allow it to take effect, has long been recognized both by the Courts in India and by this Board, and it is upon the difficult question of where the line should be drawn, and upon what principle, that the argument in the present case has mainly turned.

They then examine the first line of argument addressed to them. That proceeded on the old view, once an estate is vested in X, the widow, not being X, cannot adopt. 10 M I A 279[7] was regarded as the leading case. They quote the following from Lord Kingsdown's judgment :

> The question is whether the estate of his son being unlimited and that son having married and left a widow his heir, and that heir having acquired a vested estate in her husband's property as widow, a new heir can be substituted by adoption who is to defeat that estate.

The italics are their Lordships'. The case in 10 M I A 279[7] was this :

| |
B = D

A died leaving B. B married and died leaving D, his widow and heir. C adopted E''. It was held that E'' was not validly adopted. It is a Dayabhaga case. That case was, however, used to show that it was "upon the vesting of the property that the determination of the power of adoption depended." The validity of the same adoption was again considered on the death of D, in a contest between E'' and a distant reversioner, in 8 I A 229.[15] It was held that immediately the property vested in D, C's power was "at an end": see 12 Pat 642[1] at p. 652. It will be remembered that E'' was adopted while D was alive and there was no suggestion that he was again adopted after D died. The same point exactly arose in 14 I A 67.[16] There C adopted while D, in whom B's estate had vested, was alive. There was no second adoption after D had died. 14 I A 67[16] was followed in 16 I A 166[17] where the property passed to the son's widow under a will. Their Lordships in 12 Pat 642[1] at p. 652 after referring to the argument based on the above cases say :

> . . . . . it was well established that power of adoption in a mother was extinguished when her son had died leaving a widow to whom the son's estate passed by inheritance.

The italics are ours. Then their Lordships, having observed that some passages in the cases relied on stressed property consideration, go on to say :

> It is at least material that in each of the other cases it was the existence of the son's widow that stood in the way of the adoption, and that in none of them was there any suggestion that the same rule would apply if the heir in whom the property had vested were someone other than her.

Then they observe, citing a number of cases, that vesting in a coparcener does not defeat the right to adopt. Then they point out that the mother's right is not lost merely because a son is born because if the son dies in infancy she may adopt. So the vesting of the estate in a son does not kill the power. Then they decline to go through the mass of case law which had sprung up in India because they treat it as covered by two cases they proceed to consider. These are 26 Bom 526[6] and 45 I A 156.[10] Stating what these cases decided without expressing approval or disapproval at p. 655 their Lordships at p. 664 return to 45 I A 156[10] and limit what had been regarded as its effect. It is the fact that their Lordships have been considered to have approved Chandavarkar J.'s judgment in 26 Bom 526,[6] at least as regards the passage cited, that is the main obstacle in the appellant's way. The passage quoted is as follows :

> Where a Hindu dies leaving a widow and a son, and that son dies leaving a natural born or adopted son or leaving no son but his own widow to continue the line by means of adoption, the power of the former widow is extinguished and can never afterwards be revived.

The fatal words are, of course, "and can never. . . . be revived." In 26 Bom 526[6] the following are the material persons :

| |
E E'

The above citation lays down that if when B dies there survives D, or E, or E', C cannot adopt E'' at any time whatever. Her power is gone and never revives. In 41 Mad 855[10] the following are the material persons:

X
R | A = C
| |
V (took on | adopts Brojo = D
Brojo's death | in 1870
in 1906) |
| C adopts Madana
P | in 1907
Madana sues P.

In 41 Mad 855,[10] 26 Bom 526[6] was approved. In that case, 41 Mad 855,[10] the Judicial Committee at p. 860 observed :

> He (Chandavarkar J.) interprets earlier decisions of the Judicial Committee as having established conclusively that. . . . . there is a limit imposed by law to the period within which a widow can exercise a power of adoption conferred on her, and that when that limit is reached the power is at an end . . . . . on the facts of the present case, the principle must be taken as applying so as to have brought the authority to adopt conferred on (A's) widow (C) to an end when (Brojo), the son she originally adopted, died after attaining full legal capacity to continue the line either by the birth of a natural-born son or by the adoption to him of a son by his own widow. That widow was not a party to the suit, and, whether or not she had power to adopt (Brojo), it has not been established against her that she had no such power. Their Lordships think it right to draw attention to this circumstance, but they do not desire to be understood as saying that even in its absence the succession of (Brojo) and his dying after attaining full legal capacity to continue the line would not in themselves have been sufficient to bring the limiting principle into operation, and so to have so determined the authority of (A's) widow, who was not the widow of the last owner, and could not adopt a son to him.

In other words: if there is a son Brojo who attains legal capacity and dies, his mother's power is gone because of the application of the principle in 26 Bom 526.[6] This would be so even if Brojo's widow had no power to adopt. The factor that divests the grandwidow of her power is not the presence of a widow but the existence of a son who attains "full legal capacity." This seems to be the plain meaning of what Lord Haldane, on behalf of the Judicial Committee, wrote. In 12 Pat 642,[1] however, it was held that while there was a (natural-born) son the widow's power was not ended but suspended and on his death revived and this is so even though the son arrives at the age of "full legal capacity" or "ceremonial competence" before dying. Their Lordships in 12 Pat 642[1] at p. 664 observe:

They think that there is no foundation for the contention that a mother's authority to adopt is extinguished by the mere fact that her son has attained ceremonial competence, and they are satisfied that Lord Haldane had no question of this in mind.

In 43 Bom 778,[18] strongly relied on in 12 Pat 642,[1] 'it was,' to quote from 12 Patna at p. 657, laid down in clear terms that 'the right of the widow to make an adoption is not dependent on her inheriting as a Hindu female owner her husband's estate'.

An adoption resulting in a divesting was there, 43 Bom 778,[18] upheld. Their Lordships in 12 Pat 642[1] at p. 657 add:

It necessarily follows, their Lordships think, from this decision, that the vesting of the property on the death of the last holder in someone other than the adopting widow, be it either another coparcener of the joint family, or an outsider claiming by reverter, or, their Lordships would add, by inheritance, cannot be in itself the test of the continuance or extinction of the power of adoption.

What may be called the first line of thought concerned with property ends there with the conclusion that the fact that property has vested in X does not present an obstacle to C adopting. It ends with a renunciation of the view that the vesting in B, a person who dies after attaining full legal capacity, and whether he leaves a widow with power to adopt or not ends finally the power of C to adopt. It re-states the view that the presence of E or D "ends" the power of C. It leaves in a state of great uncertainty the question whether when E and D die the power of C revives. 41 Mad 855[10] approving 26 Bom 526[6] seems to indicate: (1) the existence of B and his survival to an age of full legal competence "ended" the power of C; (2) once ended, it could never revive. 12 Pat 642[1] explaining 41 Mad 855[10] said that C's power in the case put was not ended but suspended and when B died C's power revived. Next, their Lordships deal with the second line of thought, concerned with religious ideas. Now appears the observation at p. 658:

It being clear upon the decisions above referred to that the interposition of a grandson, or the son's widow, brings the mother's power of adoption to an end . . . .

Then is considered the question whether the birth or adoption of a son has that effect. The conclusion is that it has not. If the observation quoted from 12 Pat 642[1] at p. 658 supra be understood as limited to the case where the widow (D) or the grandson (E) stands between (is interposed) the grandwidow C and her power, everything is clear except for the words "and can never be revived" quoted from 26 Bom 526.[6] Strictly the above is the true meaning of their Lordships' words. That amounts to nothing more than this: that while D or E is alive and competent to adopt his or her existence prevents any adoption being made by C. That leaves at large what happens when the "interposition" is ended. Logic says that as the death of the son removes his "interposition" whereupon C's power revives, so the death of D removes her interposition and so C's power revives. Turning now to 59 Bom 360[3] at p. 364 their Lordships note the departure made by 12 Pat 642.[1] They are concerned with a case where B was in existence, became of age, married D and then with D passed, by adoption, into another family. The Judicial Committee observe at p. 364:

In the present case the natural son B with his wife D having ceased to exist for the purpose of continuing the line in the Ahmima family, his mother C was entitled to make an adoption to secure that object.

It is, of course, true that D there never became a widow and so never attracted the idea that once a widow the grand-widow's power is forever gone. Can we however have a rule which says that if B and D die together C's power, which was suspended while either of them lived (was interposed), revives, but if B dies on Monday and D on Tuesday (a thing which frequently happens in time of plague) C's power, which was ended by D's becoming a widow for a day, does not revive? The Hindu law has anomalies but this anomaly would be founded entirely on Judge-made difficulties. If this is so then the true rule is that the grand-widow's power is suspended by the interposition of various persons: son, son's widow, son's son, and revives with the removal of the obstacle. Balancing as best we can the opposing views and noting that the above is in conformity with the view expressed in 31 N L R Sup 180,[4] a Full Bench decision of the Judicial Commissioner's Court, we are of the opinion that the appeal succeeds and must be allowed with costs throughout. This being our conclusion the question of ceremonial competence does not arise.

18. ('18) 5 A I R 1918 P C 192 : 50 I C 457 : 43 Bom 778 : 46 I A 97 (P C), Pratapsing Shivsingh v. Agarsinghji Rai Singhji.

First Appeal No. 33 of 1936, Decided on 18th November 1940, from decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Akola, D/- 19th December 1935.

(a) Hindu law — Alienation — Alienation not binding on family as a whole—Mother is no more bound than sons.

The mother is no more bound by an alienation which does not bind the family as a whole than are the sons. [P 122 C 2]

(b) Hindu law — Partition — Mother's share does not accrue until family partitions.

Under the Hindu law the mother's share does not accrue until the family partitions. [P 123 C 1]

(c) Hindu law — Alienation — Mortgage — After born son has no cause of action to bring declaratory suit—He cannot create cause of action by waiting until he is dispossessed — Nor can he set up rights which he could not urge in suit of his own by way of defence in suit by mortgagee—Cause of action to challenge mortgage arises on date of its execution—Son born or conceived after execution of mortgage cannot challenge it though he can redeem it.*

An after-born son has no cause of action to sue for a declaration that a mortgage is not binding on him nor can he create a cause of action for himself by waiting until he is dispossessed and then suing for possession; nor can he set up rights which he could not urge in a suit of his own by way of defence when the mortgagee sues. The cause of action to challenge a mortgage arises at the date of its execution and consequently a son born and conceived after that date cannot challenge the mortgage though he still has a right to redeem : A I R 1940 Nag 305 (FB), Expl., and Applied. [P 123 C 2; P 124 C 1; P 125 C 1]

(d) Hindu law — Alienation — Joint family— Real alienor is family and not individual signing deed.

The real alienor according to orthodox Hindu ideas is the joint family and not the individual who puts his signature to the deed. [P 124 C 1]

(e) Hindu law — Joint family — Individual member can own part of family estate as his separate property.

An individual member of a joint Hindu family can own separate property. The family can by agreement break off a piece of its property (whether tangible or a share) and hand it over to one of its members for him to have and to hold as his separate estate. They can do this just as effectually and completely as they could to a complete outsider, and yet remain joint. It is thus possible for an individual member to acquire for himself as his own separate property a part of the family estate. [P 124 C 1, 2]

Judgment.—After the decision of the Full Bench* only two points remain. The first relates to the fields Survey Nos. 17, 5/2, 6/2, 63/2 and 88. Both sides are agreed that the shares which defendants 6 and 7, Janrao and Dnyandeo, have in these fields should be released from the mortgage. But they are not agreed about the extent of their shares. According to the learned counsel for the plaintiffs, the family consists of Govinda (defendant 4), and his two sons, Janrao and Dnyandeo, (defendants 6 and 7), and the mother of the sons, defendant 5, Saraswatibai. The learned counsel contends that each would have a share on partition and therefore the extent of defendants 6 and 7's interests is only one-half and so that is all that can be released. The contention of the other side is that if the mother is taken into account then her share would also have to be excluded and that would leave the plaintiffs with only one-fourth. But, they say, no question about her share has been raised hitherto and so all they claim is two-third. We think this is sound. If the mother's rights are to be taken into account, then the plaintiffs can only get one-fourth because the mother is no more bound by an alienation which does not bind the family as a whole than are the sons. But, as counsel for the defendants admits, no question about her share has been raised, and in any event her share does not accrue until the family partitions (which it has not done hitherto), therefore all that the defendants can claim is two-thirds. We accordingly direct that a two-third share in the fields mentioned be released from the mortgage and be excluded from the decree.

The next question is more difficult and pivots around the decision of the Full Bench. Lalji's son Bapurao (now defendant 1) was born on 9th December 1926. The cause of action on the mortgage which this suit seeks to enforce did not accrue till 21st March 1927. Therefore, Bapurao was born after the mortgage (which is dated 21st March 1922) was executed and before the cause of action on it accrued. Bapurao's learned counsel relies on the following passages in the Full Bench decision I L R (1940) Nag 573[1] :

> The cause of action arises at the moment the alienee enters into possession where the suit is for possession. It may be there are other causes of action arising at different dates.
> Whichever cause of action is in question it belongs to those in existence when the cause of action arises.
>
> . . . .
>
> If a coparcener is not in existence when such a cause of action arises he cannot sue.
> When the coparceners are defendants different considerations arise.

It is argued by him that Bapurao was in existence when the cause of action in this suit arose and consequently had he been a plaintiff he could have sued for a declaration that the mortgage did not bind him, and if he could have done that, then he can set up the same right by way of defence. It is also argued in the alternative that even if he could not have sued, the Full Bench decides that different considerations apply in the case of defendants and therefore, as he is in possession, he can challenge the mortgage. This is not a proper interpretation of our decision. The question referred was whether an after-born coparcener can challenge an alienation made before the date of his conception. It was assumed all the way through the arguments, and that assumption underlies much of our opinions, that if he could challenge the alienation by way of suit he would also be able to do so by way of defence. The test was whether he could sue and as that answered the other question attention was concentrated on the first point. As regards the other point, namely that "when the coparceners are defendants different considerations arise," it was not developed because the case was not argued from that angle. It was never doubted or contested that the after-born son has a right of redemption—indeed that is why he was joined as a defendant to this suit—but as advantage has been taken of this sentence in the Full Bench decision by the learned counsel who appeared before us but who had not appeared either at the earlier stage of the case or before the Full Bench, it will be necessary to explain what was meant. A mortgage splits the bundle of rights which constitute ownership into two parts. One part passes out of the mortgagor and goes to the mortgagee. This is the transfer of the interest spoken of in S. 58 (a), T. P. Act. The other part remains in the mortgagor and constitutes the right to redeem. As we say it has never been doubted that the right to redeem resides in the family even after the mortgage and that therefore the after-born son obtains an interest in that right by birth the moment he is conceived. The dispute in this case, and before the Full Bench, did not touch that right at all. The arguments there were confined, so far as mortgages are concerned, (and this is a mortgage case), to the other part of the bundle of rights which pass to the mortgagee. Those rights pass under the mortgage. Therefore unless the mortgage can be challenged the mortgagee is entitled to have those rights enforced. The Full Bench decides that if the challenging coparcener is born (or to be more accurate conceived) after the cause of action arises, then he cannot challenge the alienation.

But the cause of action spoken of there is the cause of action which accrues to the after-born son to challenge the alienation and not to the cause of action which accrues to the alienee to enforce his transfer. The cause of action to challenge a mortgage accrues at the date of the mortgage. A suit for a declaration can be filed the moment the mortgage is executed. In other cases, the cause of action would accrue at other times, for example, in the case of dispossession by a trespasser, it would accrue at the date of the dispossession when the right to sue for possession first accrued; so also in the case of an unregistered sale or mortgage which requires registration. We did not mean that in the case of a mortgage, though the after-born son has no cause of action to bring a declaratory suit he can create a cause of action for himself by waiting until he is dispossessed and then suing for possession; nor did we mean that though he could not have sued for a declaration he can set up rights which he could not urge in a suit of his own by way of defence when the mortgagee sues. In the view we take, the after-born son has no cause of action at all if the transfer is good, at the time, or if it must be deemed to have been good by reason of the coparceners in being at the date of the alienation not choosing to challenge it within the time allowed by law. In the Full Bench case we were both agreed as to the conclusion and Bose J. fully concurred with the view taken by the Chief Justice but he also felt that the matter could be traced back even further than the Chief Justice had gone and that the root of the rule is to be found in the doctrine of notional partition. According to his view, there is no escape from the logic of the ancient and rigid Hindu law position which is still followed in Allahabad unless the doctrine of notional partition is introduced. As he pointed out, according to orthodox Hindu notions all family property is owned by the fluctuating entity known as the joint family. No individual coparcener owns any part of that property as an individual. Until partition he has no separate rights and no separate share. He has no separate existence for those purposes. His identity is merged in the family as completely as an ounce of water or sand is merged in the gallon or pound of which it forms a part, and until partition his separate identity cannot be distinguished for these purposes any more than can that of the ounce of water or sand. If there is an alienation it must be the family as a complete whole which alienates. If not, there is no alienation. There is nobody to alienate. There is nothing which this nobody can own to alienate. It is true that the family either acts as a whole, each member joining in the alienation, or that it acts through the manager or whoever else is invested with authority to act on its behalf. But the real alienor according to orthodox Hindu ideas is the family and not the individual who puts his signature to the deed.

But the moment there is a partition, however partial it may be, the moment a piece of property, whether a plot of land or an ascertained share, is broken off from the whole and given to an individual member as his separate estate, of course he can do what he likes with it. An individual member of a joint Hindu family can own separate property and a joint Hindu family can separate and yet not divide its estate by metes and bounds. In between these extremes lies another possibility. The family can by agreement break off a piece of its property (whether tangible or a share) and hand it over to one of its members for him to have and to hold as his separate estate. They can do this just as effectually and completely as they could to a complete outsider, and yet remain joint. In any one of these ways, it is possible for an individual member to acquire for himself as his own separate property a part of the family estate. If they partition they can assign to any given member any part of the property they please. It does not matter whether it is equal to his share or not. It does not matter that it comprises the entire family estate. That is their affair. If they are satisfied nobody else can question their action except that the after-born son may in certain limited circumstances claim to reopen such a partition. Those circumstances are set out at p. 613 of the Full Bench decision by Bose J. in his opinion. So also, if the family chooses to gift its entire estate to a stranger. If the family agrees, there is an end of the matter. The property transferred goes and is lost to the family from that moment and there is nothing to which the after-born son can succeed. The position is the same if the transfer is made to a coparcener. In his case it may be made in anticipation of partition as the whole or part of the share which he is to receive when and if the family divides, or it may be a pure gift, or it may be for any other consideration. But it is clear that such transfer can be made provided the whole family agrees. Of course the members of the family then in being (or the after-born son in the circumstances mentioned) could get such an agreement set aside if suitable grounds existed, or they could show that they had never agreed, but if the agreement and transfer were really made, they would be binding and valid until avoided. All this is, we think, commonplace. The next step is not as easy.

The inconvenience of the orthodox position was early recognized though its logic is inescapable and attempts were made to break away from it. This caused a split in which one side adhered and still adheres, as in Allahabad, to the extreme orthodox and logical position, while the other took a more liberal attitude which has resulted in the view we take of alienations in this province. But the difficulty all through has been to trace this down to some logical and legal principle. Bose J. has endeavoured to do this in his opinion in the Full Bench case and according to his view the more liberal among the early commentators developed what we might term the principle of notional partition, that is to say, they regarded a transfer first as a partition, partial or otherwise, which was immediately followed by the alienation. Looked at from this point of view, the family is deemed to separate off the alienated property from the rest of the family property and hand it over to the alienating member. As we have shown, this can be done in several ways and it does not matter for these purposes which is selected because they all come to the same thing in the end, namely that the property passes completely out of the family and is lost to it from the moment of the alienation. Nor does the fact that any coparcener then in being has the privilege of avoiding this notional partition make it any the less binding till avoided. If they choose not to avoid it or to challenge it, it stands, and if they die before doing so, their right to avoid lapses and no one else not claiming through or under them can exercise it on their behalf.

But whether this ratio decidendi, which is that of Bose J. is right or not (and we can see difficulties, as for instance where there are minors at the date of the alienation) we are both of opinion that the Full Bench decides that the son who is born or conceived after the cause of action to challenge the alienation arises cannot do so. The cause of action to challenge the mortgage here arose on 21st March 1922. Bapurao was born and conceived after this and so he cannot challenge the mortgage though he still has a right to redeem. As, in our view, the Full Bench has decided the point, it will be idle to examine the cases cited at the last hearing because we cannot now reopen the question. The result is that the appeal succeeds except as regards the two-third share in the fields we have specified above belonging to defendants 6 and 7. The decree of the lower Court will therefore be set aside and a foreclosure decree will now be passed in the plaintiffs' favour in respect of all the mortgaged property except the two-thirds share mentioned above. The costs of the suit and of the appeal will be paid by the defendants. A further six months will be allowed for redemption.

Civil Revn. Appln. No. 525 of 1939, Decided on 24th September 1940.

(a) Master and servant — Master when can justify refusal to pay wages during period of suspension of servant, stated.

A local body has no more authority and power over its servants and employees than any other person or body unless such powers are expressly conferred by statute. An ordinary master not given special powers by statute or by some rule or law flowing from a statute has no power to suspend a servant. He can either dismiss him or continue him in service on fresh terms. In either case, the servant is entitled to be paid up to the date of dismissal in the one case or of continuance in service in the other. A master can only justify a refusal to pay the wages during the period of suspension on the ground that he had a right to dismiss the servant because of some wrongful action justifying dismissal or that instead of exercising the right he came to a fresh agreement with the servant under which the servant rather than be dismissed agreed to forgo his salary during a certain period and agreed to continue to serve on fresh terms under a fresh contract. But it would be necessary for the master to prove in such a case first that there is this fresh agreement and secondly that he was justified in dismissing the servant and thus forcing him into a fresh engagement : Case law referred. [P 126 C 2; P 127 C 1]

(b) Master and servant—Misconduct on part of servant justifying his dismissal condoned by master — Master cannot subsequently claim right to dismiss him or impose any other punishment in respect of offence which has been condoned.

Once a master has condoned any misconduct on part of servant which would have justified dismissal or a fine, he cannot, after such condonation, go back upon his election to condone and claim a right to dismiss him or impose a fine or any other punishment in respect of the offence which has been condoned : A I R 1925 Cal 87, Rel. on. [P 127 C 2]

Order. — The defendant is a District Council. The plaintiff is one of its teachers on a salary of Rs. 44 a month. On 28th April 1937 the plaintiff was suspended and was subsequently reinstated on 12th June 1937. The claim is in respect of the plaintiff's salary during the period of suspension which salary the defendant refuses to pay. The facts are as follows: A report was made against the plaintiff by a member of the District Council. It is not clear when the report was made nor is it clear when the offence to which that report relates was committed. All that we can gather is that the report and the offence were made and occurred some time before 24th April 1937.

The offence complained of in that report was that the plaintiff had abused the office bearers of the Local Board and the District Council. The nature of the abuse was not set forth. The Vice-Chairman of the District Council acting on this report passed orders suspending the plaintiff on 28th April 1937. The plaintiff was thereupon asked to submit an explanation. He did so and an inquiry appears to have been made because the next thing that we know is that on 10th June 1937 the School Board of the District Council confirmed the action of the Vice-Chairman suspending the plaintiff and at the same time ordered the plaintiff to rejoin his duty on 12th June 1937.

The plaintiff rejoined. He had originally been attached to the Takarkhed school but on re-appointment he was posted to Khartalegaon. While there another complaint was made against him in respect of another matter and the District Council thereupon passed a resolution on 5th August 1938 to the effect that the plaintiff should be degraded down to a salary of Rs. 15 a month and that if he did not accept the same his services should be dispensed with. On 16th August 1938 the School Board of the District Council passed a resolution which sets out the resolution of the District Council itself and resolved that the plaintiff be degraded in accordance with the resolution of the District Council and also added that "the period of suspension be treated as a suspension period without allowance." It is not clear what period this refers to but it appears to have been assumed throughout that the period referred to is the period of suspension which I have mentioned above. This matter then went to the Deputy Commissioner and he passed an order on 3rd April 1939 setting aside the orders of the District Council. It is contended on behalf of the District Council that it does not know anything about this order of the Deputy Commissioner as it was not referred to in the lower Court. I find, however, that it is a portion of Ex. D-1 which has been placed on record wholesale. No trouble has been taken to separate out any portion of this voluminous document and it is clear that the whole of it has been tendered in evidence. In any case, reference has been made indiscriminately to portions of this document. In the circumstances, seeing that it is the defendant's own evidence and seeing that it is a copy of an official document sent by the Deputy Commissioner himself to the Chairman of the District Council, I see no reason why I should not take judicial notice of it. It is agreed by both sides that there is no written agreement of service in this case. The learned counsel for the applicant has not been able to refer me to any laws or rules relating to the engagement of teachers and the conditions of their service by the District Council. He asks for an adjournment but, in my opinion, the case has no merits and I see no reason why the matter should be kept pending any longer. It is argued in the first place on behalf of the District Council that the civil Court has no jurisdiction because a servant of the District Council is on the same footing as a servant of His Majesty and holds office at pleasure, consequently the District Council being on a par with His Majesty in this respect the jurisdiction of the civil Court is barred. For these wide and sweeping claims, reliance is placed on A I R 1940 Lah 71,[1] ILR (1938) ALL 252[2] and I L R (1937) Mad 532.[3]

It is not necessary for me to decide in this case whether the wide and sweeping propositions which are contained in the argument addressed apply in all cases where there are rules or regulations framed by Government. That was the position in the Allahabad case, and so far as the Privy Council case is concerned, it is a case in which a servant of the Crown was concerned. It may be that if there is a special statute, or if rules are framed under an Act by Government which set out that a servant of a local body shall hold office at pleasure, then the rule enunciated by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of servants of the Crown will apply. But in the present case no such rules have been brought to my notice, no such rules were pleaded and no such rules were produced in the lower Court. So far as the Lahore case is concerned, I am not clear whether there are such rules in the Punjab or not. If there are then as I say the matter is distinguishable. If however the learned Judge who decided the Lahore case quoted above meant to state that every employee of a local body was on the same footing as a servant of His Majesty, I am with respect unable to agree. A local body has no more authority and power over its servants and employees than any other person or body unless such powers are expressly conferred by statute. The matter therefore must be governed along the ordinary lines of master and servant.

It is to my mind clear that an ordinary master not given special powers by statute or by some rule or law flowing from a statute has no power to suspend a servant. He can either dismiss him or continue him in service on fresh terms. In either case the servant is entitled to be paid up to the date of dismissal in the one case or of continuance in service in the other. This rule is enunciated in A I R 1938 Cal 759[4] and A I R 1921 Cal 346.[5] Reliance was also placed on 30 N L R 173.[6] The Nagpur case is not quite in point, but it is of assistance in this way. It decides that a servant is entitled to be paid his wages up to the date of dismissal even if he has not worked in the interval. A servant who is suspended is clearly not working in the interval. If therefore a servant who is dismissed is entitled to be paid his wages up to the date of dismissal, it is clear that a servant who has not been dismissed but continued in service has a right to similar treatment.

In an ordinary case of master and servant, a master who dismisses his servant has to justify his action in a Court of law if the servant brings an action for wrongful dismissal. If the servant succeeds in showing that the dismissal was without justification, he is entitled either to his wages or to damages. If a master has no power of suspension, then he can only justify a refusal to pay the wages during the period of suspension on the ground that he had a right to dismiss the servant because of some wrongful action justifying dismissal or that, instead of exercising the right he came to a fresh agreement with the servant under which the servant rather than be dismissed agreed to forgo his salary during a certain period and agreed to continue to serve on fresh terms under a fresh contract. But it would be necessary for the master to prove in such a case first, that there is this fresh agreement, and secondly that he was justified in dismissing the servant and thus forcing him into a fresh engagement. Not only have these matters not been proved but the order of the Deputy Commissioner shows that there was never at any time any justification for the order of suspension because no proper enquiry was made. That in turn means that there is no proof of any misconduct on the servant's part and as I have said there is no vestige of proof of such misconduct in this case.

Apart from that it is clear from the order of 10th June 1937 that the plaintiff was reinstated in service on 12th June 1937. No conditions were imposed, and the plaintiff rejoined service on the strength of that order. There was therefore no fresh contract when the plaintiff rejoined. There was no undertaking by him or agreement that he would forgo his salary during the period of suspension. There was no agreement that he would continue to serve on a lower salary. The orders in respect of these were not passed till much later, namely on 5th August 1938, but then it was too late, quite apart from the fact that they were passed in respect of another matter. Once a master has condoned any misconduct which would have justified dismissal or a fine, he cannot after such condonation go back upon his election to condone and claim a right to dismiss him (servant) or impose a fine or any other punishment in respect of the offence which has been condoned. This rule is to be found in AIR 1925 Cal 87[7] and in many other cases. The reason is obvious. A servant even though he misconducts himself has a right to seek other employment, and it is proper and just that he should be given the earliest opportunity of seeking such fresh employment. As time goes by and he grows older, his chances of obtaining employment grow less and less. Therefore the rule is that a servant must be dismissed at once or given the chance of serving upon a fresh contract. If no such terms are imposed then clearly new terms cannot be imposed at some later date after the election to condone has been made, for the simple reason that had these conditions been put forward at the time, the servant might have preferred dismissal and the opportunity of obtaining other service. That is the reason underlying the rule which, in my opinion, is a fair, just and proper one. For all these reasons, it is clear that the order of the lower Court is right. The application is therefore dismissed with costs. Counsel's fee Rs. 15.

Second Appeal No. 335 of 1938, Decided on 8th July 1940, from appellate decree of Addl. District Judge, Narsingpur, D/- 28th March 1938.

(a) C. P. Local Self-Government Act (4 of 1920), S. 23 — S. 23 does not apply to village panchayat.

Section 23 of the Act has no application to the village panchayat. [P 128 C 2]

(b) C. P. Village Panchayat Act (5 of 1920), S. 12 (1) (d) — Holding of market is measure of public utility — Village Panchayat can undertake control of it without reference to District Council.

The holding of a market is a measure of public utility and as such the village panchayat can undertake control and administration of it and be responsible for the arrangement of conservancy and cleanliness and general maintenance of order in the market. The control of a market can be undertaken without reference to the District Council as there is no mention of the District Council in S. 12 and a Court of law cannot insert that expression when it is not there. Judgment. — This is a plaintiff's appeal from a differing judgment of the Additional District Judge, Narsingpore, in Civil Regular Appeal No. 43-A of 1937, decided on 28th March 1938. The appellant filed the suit out of which this appeal arises against the village panchayat of Semri Harchand for a decree of permanent injunction restraining the village panchayat from recovering the market fees from him and for refund of Rs. 16-7-6 already recovered from him under coercive process. It is common ground that up to 1930 Semri market used to be held on the Hoshangabad-Sohagpur road and that it was removed to its present site which is malguzari plot No. 272 at the instance of the Deputy Commissioner Mr. D. J. N. Lee. The plaintiff admittedly keeps his shop in that market on every Monday when a market is held. His contention is that the village panchayat, viz., the defendant, has no power to impose any tax or levy fees from any person having a shop in the market as the market was held on a site which is the private property of the malguzar. This contention was overruled in the lower appellate Court.

It is urged here that the village panchayat would have the power to levy fees from the shopkeepers in the market only if the control of the market had been vested in the panchayat by any notification of the Provincial Government as contemplated in S. 23, Local Self-Government Act. It is further contended that the panchayat could not under S. 12 (1), Village Panchayat Act, 1920, undertake the control and administration of a private market without the permission of either the District Council or the Provincial Government. I see no force in these contentions. Section 23, Local Self-Government Act, is altogether irrelevant as it has no application to the village panchayat. It is because the Central Provinces Local Self-Government Act, 1920, does not directly confer on the District Councils the right of levying fees and tolls and of control in any market that it vests the Provincial Government with power to confer such rights by means of a notification, but S. 12, Village Panchayat Act, confers a discretionary power on panchayats to undertake the control and administration of certain matters specified in that section. That section does not expressly mention markets but there can be no doubt that holding of a market being a measure of public utility would be a matter falling under the head (d) of S. 12 (1). The contention that the village panchayat cannot undertake control of a market without reference to the District Council must fail for the reason that there is no mention of the District Council in that section, and a Court of law cannot insert that expression when it is not there. In fact there was a provision like what is contended for here in the section as enacted originally but the reference to the District Council was deleted by the C. P. Act 9 of 1935. I have no doubt that the holding of a market is a measure of public utility and as such the village panchayat could undertake control and administration of it and be responsible for the arrangement of conservancy and cleanliness and general maintenance of order in the market. The panchayat assumed control of the market by a formal resolution, Ex. D-1. It had therefore power to levy fees on persons exposing goods for sale in that market under S. 15 (1) (c) with the approval of the District Council. The procedure as laid down in that section relating to imposition of any tax, toll or fees was followed in this case and no contention is raised in that behalf. There is no substance in this appeal which is therefore dismissed with costs in all Courts.

(a) C. P. Local Fund Audit Act (9 of 1933), S. 14—Appeal to High Court arising out of application under S. 14—No ad valorem court-fee can be demanded.

The District Judge acting under S. 14 is not intended to act as a Court but as a special tribunal, in much the same way as it does under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The appeal from his decision to High Court is not from a Court but from a special tribunal. Moreover, the jurisdiction which S. 14, C. P. Local Fund Audit Act, confers is not revisional nor can the "appeal" to the High Court be called a "reference." Section 4, Court-fees Act, therefore does not apply nor Art. 1 of Sch. 1. No ad valorem court-fee can therefore be demanded on the memorandum of appeal to High Court arising out of application under S. 14, C. P. Local Fund Audit Act. [P 129 C 2 ; P 130 C 1]

(b) Court-fees Act (1870), Schedules — Schedules do not confer right to impose court-fee.

The schedules to the Court-fees Act only determine the method of assessment and do not confer a right to impose and collect court-fees. [P 130 C 1]

C. B. Parakh — for Appellants.

W. R. Puranik, Advocate-General — for Respondent.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of an application made under S. 14, C. P. Local Fund Audit Act (9 of 1933) and the question is whether court-fees on appeal should be paid ad valorem on the amount by which the appeal seeks to reduce the decree of the District Judge. The scheme of the Act is that the Examiner of Local Fund Accounts is empowered to charge such sums as he considers fit under S. 10 of the Act against the persons mentioned there and to certify such charge. What happens thereafter is not clear. This is another of the local Acts which the Courts find so difficult to understand and construe. Section 14 provides that any person aggrieved by any charge made under S. 10 may either apply to the District Judge or to the Local Government to have such charge modified, altered or set aside. If he applies to the Local Government that body can, after hearing the applicant, pass such orders thereon as it thinks fit. The word used for the decision of the Local Government is "orders." If, however, the application is made to the District Judge, then the District Judge is empowered to confirm, modify or remit the charge, and to pass such decree as he thinks fit. The word used there is "decree." Then follows the proviso to S. 14. That provides that > the aggrieved person shall have a right to file one appeal in accordance with the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The term used here is "appeal" and it evidently refers to an "appeal" from the "decree" of the District Judge. Section 13 deals with the matter of recovery and divides all possible cases under the Act into two categories. The first relates to cases in which "no appeal has been preferred under S. 14," and the second to cases in which an appeal has been preferred. In the former case the sum stated in the certificate of the examiner has to be recovered by the Deputy Commissioner as if it were an arrear of land revenue, and, in the latter case, "the sum stated in the order of the appellate authority." What is the position of the District Judge in all this? It will be seen that he has been empowered to pass a decree and not to make an order. It will also be seen that the person aggrieved has been empowered to apply (not appeal) to the District Judge and that the only appeal contemplated by S. 14 is the appeal from the "decree" of the District Judge. What the decision of the appellate authority is intended to be I do not know. As the appeal is to be in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code from a "decree" of the District Judge, I would have thought that the decision of the appellate authority would have ended in a "decree" in accordance with the provisions of the Code. But S. 13 speaks of the decision of the appellate authority as an "order".

However, reading all these provisions together, I think it is clear that the District Judge is not intended to act as a Court but as a special tribunal, in much the same way as it does under the Workmen's Compensation Act. Many considerations lead me to this view. In the first place, the appeal or the application, whichever it is, is to the District Judge and not the District Court. In the next place we have the two alternative tribunals of appeal, the High Court and the Local Government; and in the third place, we have an astonishingly loose use of the expressions "apply", "appeal", "decree" and "order", terms which have well-known technical meanings when one is dealing with Courts. The charging section in the Court-fees Act, so far as the High Court is concerned, is S. 4. It authorises the levy of court-fees when the Court is exercising the following jurisdictions, (1) its extraordinary original civil jurisdiction, (2) its extraordinary original criminal jurisdiction, (3) its appellate jurisdiction under the Letters Patent and (4) its jurisdiction as regards appeals from the Courts subject to its superintendence; or in the exercise of its jurisdiction as a Court of reference or revision.

The memorandum in question clearly does not relate to the first three jurisdictions, and as regards the fourth, the appeal is not, on the view taken above, from a Court but from a special tribunal. As to the difference between the two, see a recent decision of the Division Bench in I L R (1939) Nag 124[1] where it was held that an award by a District Judge acting as a Commissioner under the Workmen's Compensation Act is not a "judgment" within the meaning of the Letters Patent because the District Judge is not a Court when acting in that capacity. That this is also the position in respect of orders of the District Judge acting under the Land Acquisition Act is implicit in the Court-fees Act itself. Section 8 deals specially with these cases. In my opinion, this section would be unnecessary if the District Judge's awards were "judgments" in the ordinary sense because then exactly the same result in respect of the fee payable would be reached by the application of Art. 1, Sch. 1. It is only on the assumption that this article does not apply that S. 8 becomes necessary. There is no similar special provision in respect of the kind of appeal contemplated by S. 14, Local Fund Audit Act. The next type of jurisdiction which S. 4, Court-fees Act, legislates for is when the High Court acts as a Court of reference or revision. The jurisdiction which S. 14, Local Fund Audit Act, confers is not revisional, nor in my opinion can the "appeal" to the High Court be called a "reference". A reference can only be made by a Court or some person in authority. Here what is contemplated is an appeal by an aggrieved party. In the circumstances I do not see how any court-fee at all can be demanded. Article 1 to Sch. 1 though general cannot apply unless the right to collect is conferred in the body of the Act. The schedules only determine the method of assessment and do not confer a right to impose and collect court-fees.

(a) Limitation—Suit against certain person described as major — Person found to be minor and guardian appointed—Suit must be taken to have been instituted for purpose of limitation on date when plaint is presented and not on date when guardian is appointed — Suit cannot be said to be not instituted until guardian is appointed under O. 32, R. 3, Civil P. C.

The Limitation Act contemplates a suit brought against a particular person; it does not matter whether that person is a major or a minor, so long as the suit is brought it is brought against that person. Consequently the suit against a minor so far as the Limitation Act is concerned, is against the proper person, whether he is described as a major or a minor, and therefore is within time if it is within time on the date on which the suit is instituted by the presentation of the plaint. The question of guardianship is a separate matter and relates not to the institution of the suit but to the right of the plaintiff to carry it on against the person who in point of fact is a minor. Order 32, R. 3, Civil P. C., does not mean that the suit is a nullity until a guardian is appointed or that no suit can be taken to have been instituted until a guardian has been appointed. (b) Specific Relief Act (1877), S. 9 — One co-owner ousting other co-owners and taking exclusive possession — Suit under S. 9 more than six months after ouster — Ouster holds good even if title of plaintiff may not be extinguished.

It may well be that a joint owner of property is still at the date of suit under S. 9 entitled to the property and would be given possession in a suit properly instituted for that purpose. But, nevertheless, it is open to one co-owner of property to oust the others and to obtain exclusive possession for himself. The title of the others may not be extinguished when this is done, but if that ouster took place more than six months before the institution of the suit under S. 9, then for the purposes of S. 9 that ouster would hold good even though the title of the plaintiff may not be extinguished. Order.—The suit was under S. 9, Specific Relief Act. The lower Court holds that the plaintiff was in possession within six months of the suit, that is to say on 7th January 1938, and that the defendants ousted him and therefore has passed an order in the plaintiff's favour. Two questions are raised in revision. The first is whether the suit is within limitation and the second is whether the Court could pass an order placing the plaintiff in exclusive possession without determining whether the parties had been in joint possession and therefore entitled to joint possession. As regards the first point, the matter arises in this way. The cause of action is stated in the application to have arisen on 8th January 1938. The suit was filed on 24th February 1938. In the entitling defendant 3 was shown as a major. In the course of the proceedings it was objected that he was in point of fact a minor. The plaintiff accepted this without contest and a guardian was appointed on 5th September 1938. It is argued on behalf of the defendants that the suit as against the minor defendant must be taken to have been instituted on 5th September 1938 and that as this makes it more than six months beyond the date of dispossession the suit under S. 9 did not lie. Reliance is placed for this on 38 Mad 1076.[1] I am not able to agree. Order 32, R. 3, Civil P. C., as amended locally, states that :

> Where the defendant is a minor, the Court, on being satisfied of the fact of his minority, shall appoint a proper person to be guardian for the suit of such minor.

This appears to me to contemplate distinctly a suit brought against a certain defendant in which a dispute about minority is raised and in which the Court has to be satisfied about the fact of minority and then on being satisfied it has to appoint a proper person to be guardian. It does not mean that the suit is a nullity until that is done or that no suit can be taken to have been instituted until a guardian has been appointed. It seems to me clear that the Limitation Act contemplates a suit brought against a particular person: it does not matter whether that person is a major or a minor : so long as the suit is brought it is brought against that person. The suit is not instituted against the guardian but against the minor himself and the minor does not become another person simply because he is described as a major. He still is the same person. Consequently, the suit, so far as the Limitation Act is concerned, is against the proper person, whether he is described as a major or a minor, and therefore is within time if it is within time on the date on which the suit is instituted by the presentation of the plaint. The question of guardianship is a separate matter and relates not to the institution of the suit but to the right of the plaintiff to carry it on against the person who in point of fact is a minor. If no proper guardian is appointed, the suit of course in the result becomes a nullity and that is the decision in 38 Mad 1076.[1] But it is a nullity not because it is not instituted in time but because the procedure for continuing the suit against the minor and for obtaining a decree or order against him has not been carried into effect.

The next question is whether the lower Court is right in ordering the property to be placed in the exclusive possession of the plaintiff. The plaint claims that the plaintiff was in exclusive possession and that he was dispossessed. The written statements of the defendants state on the other hand that they and not the plaintiff have been in possession. Therefore neither side contended that within the six months preceding the suit either had been in joint possession. Each claimed to be in exclusive possession. Consequently the lower Court was right in not going into the question of joint possession and in placing that party in exclusive possession which, on the facts before it, it considered to have been in possession at the date of the dispossession.

Reliance is however placed by the learned counsel for the applicant on certain statements in the written statements where the defendants admit that the property is the joint property of the plaintiff and the defendants and on a statement of defendant 5 where she admits that they have a joint title. That however has nothing to do with the question of possession under S. 9. It may well be that a joint owner of property is still at the date of suit under S. 9 entitled to the property and would be given possession in a suit properly instituted for that purpose. But, nevertheless, it is open to one co-owner of property to oust the others and to obtain exclusive possession for himself. The title of the others may not be extinguished when this is done, but if that ouster took place more than six months before the institution of the suit under S. 9, then for the purposes of S. 9 that ouster would hold good even though the title of the plaintiff may not be extinguished. Consequently, the admissions of the defendants which go to the question of title do not oust the jurisdiction of the Court, and as neither side contended that they were in joint possession within six months before the suit was filed, the lower Court was right in placing the plaintiff in exclusive and not in joint posses-

Village barbers are not household servants, or labourers in the sense in which the term 'labourer' is used in Art. 7. They are also not artisans. Hence a suit by a village barber for remuneration for services rendered to his customer is not governed by Art. 7 : A I R 1918 Nag 156 and A I R 1927 Rang 279, Disting. [P 132 C 1, 2]

Order. — The plaintiff is a village barber and the defendant is a resident of that village and is one of the plaintiff's customers. The plaintiff sues for remuneration for services rendered to the defendant, and the question at issue is one of limitation. If the suit falls within Art. 7, Limitation Act, then it is beyond time; on the other hand if it falls under the general Article 102 it is within time. The lower Court finds that Art. 102 applies and has consequently decreed the claim which is for a small sum of Rs. 9. The learned counsel for the applicant contends that Art. 7 applies and so asks me to dismiss the plaintiff's claim. Article 7 is confined to suits for the wages of a household servant, artisan or labourer. It is clear that village barbers are not household servants. It is also, I think, clear that they are not labourers in the sense in which the term 'labourer' is used in that Article. It is used there with reference to a man who does work chiefly requiring bodily strength. That leaves the word 'artisan' to be considered.

Artisan is defined in the Oxford English Dictionary as "one who practises or cultivates an art : an artist" and also as "one who is employed in any of the industrial arts; a mechanic, handicraftsman, artificer." I think it is clear that a barber cannot be said to be employed in any industrial art; he is not a mechanic or craftsman or artisan in that sense. The only question is whether he can be said to cultivate an art. The word 'art' is defined in the Oxford English Dictionary and also in Webster's Dictionary and a large number of illustrations are collected under the definition to indicate the sense in which the term is ordinarily used in the English language. Nowhere is cutting of hair or shaving or trimming of beards included as one of the arts. Whether a modern barber who works on the heads of fashionable ladies can be considered an artist may perhaps be open to question. It is possible that the skill required by him places him in a higher category than was formerly the case, but in any case such persons no longer call themselves barbers. They describe themselves as hairdressers and use other names of that kind. But however that may be, it is not possible to include barbers of a remote village of the Central Provinces in the class to which a modern barber may perhaps aspire.

I am referred to a passage in 14 N L R 152[1] at p. 155 which places the village barber among village servants such as carpenters and blacksmiths. It is argued that blacksmiths and carpenters are undoubtedly artisans and there is no reason why the village barber should be placed in a higher category and be given a longer period of limitation. It is also pointed out that the learned Judges in the Rangoon High Court in 5 Rang 477[2] considered this a relevant argument in the matter of a motor driver. I do not think that either of the rulings is in point here. One may or may not consider the village barber a village servant, but that would not bring the case under the purview of Art. 7, for the servant described there is a household servant and not a village servant. As regards the Rangoon case, there can be little doubt that a motor driver is an artisan in the sense that he is employed in an industrial art, namely that of a motor mechanic. Apart from that, I do not think that the mere fact that a village barber who may not be as highly skilled a person as a village carpenter or a village blacksmith gets a longer period of limitation would justify me in straining the meaning of the words employed in Art. 7. I am of opinion therefore that the lower Court was right in holding that the case did not fall within Art. 7. The application is therefore dismissed with costs. Counsel's fee Rs. 10.

(a) Mortgage—Parties to suit—Person claiming paramount title to mortgaged property is not necessary party to mortgage suit—His title cannot be tried out unless all parties desire that or he claims some interest in equity of redemption—He is bound to be discharged when he claims paramount title and does not wish to be joined.

All that the Court is concerned with in a mortgage suit is the question of redemption. The mortgagee sues for the money which he has lent and for the enforcement of his security if the money is not paid. Only the persons who are interested in paying in order to save the property are necessary parties to the suit. All other matters are irrelevant. Consequently, in a mortgage suit a person claiming a paramount title to the mortgaged property is not a necessary party. His title to the mortgaged property cannot be tried out in the mortgage suit unless all parties desire that or unless he claims some interest in the equity of redemption either by way of an alternative case or in spite of his paramount title. He is bound to be discharged when he claims a paramount title and does not wish to be joined : A I R 1937 Nag 121, Expl., and Rel. on; A I R 1935 Nag 68, Ref.; A I R 1931 Nag 20, Disting.

(b) Mortgage—Mortgage suit—Decision when person claiming paramount title is necessary party can be interfered with in revision.

The question of parties and persons is fundamental and goes to the very root of jurisdiction. Consequently, the High Court can interfere in revision with a decision as to when a person who claims a paramount title is a necessary party to the mortgage suit : A I R 1936 Nag 157, Foll.; A I R 1935 Nag 68, Expl. [P 134 C 2]

Dr. W. S. Barlingay — for Applicant.

A. L. Halve — for Non-applicants 1 to 4.

Order. — The question here is whether a person who claims a paramount title in a mortgage suit should be discharged. The mortgage was executed by defendant 1. The plaintiff has joined defendant 2 to the suit alleging that defendant 1 and the husband of defendant 2 (the husband is now dead) formed a joint Hindu family and that the mortgage was executed by defendant 1 on behalf of the family. Defendant 2 contests this and states that her husband was separate from defendant 1 at all relevant times and that the property in suit was his exclusive property which defendant 1 had no right or authority to mortgage. The lower Court holds that defendant 2 is a necessary party as it is necessary to have her here in order to give complete relief to the plaintiff.

I am not able to see how this case differs from one in which a person has mortgaged property which another claims as his exclusive property. It is to my mind evident that the title of that other to that property cannot be tried out in a mortgage suit unless all parties desire that or unless that other claims some interest in the equity of redemption either by way of an alternative case or in spite of his paramount title. It is, I think, elementary that in a mortgage suit no question of title arises. The mortgagee clearly has no interest and in fact cannot, if he wishes to succeed, challenge the title of his mortgagor. All we are concerned with in a mortgage suit is the question of redemption. The mortgagee sues for the money which he has lent and for the enforcement of his security if the money is not paid. Only the persons who are interested in paying in order to save the property are necessary parties to the suit. All other matters are irrelevant. Unless that were so, it would be possible for complicated questions of title in relation to some vast estate to be decided in a trumpery mortgage suit concerned with a comparatively small sum of money. It would be possible for a person who wants to get property from another and have the question of title tried out to take a mortgage from a man of straw who has no possible interest in that property for some small amount and then to sue him on the mortgage and to join the real owner of the property on the ground that he claims a right to the property. The court-fees payable would be negligible on the mortgage and the complicated question of title would be tried out on payment of a small court-fee as a side issue in some trumpery mortgage matter. Clearly that is neither the object nor the intention of the law.

The learned counsel for the non-applicant however relies on 26 N L R 359,[1] A I R 1935 Nag 68[2] and A I R 1937 Nag 121.[3] So far as the first of these three cases is concerned, it was a case in which all the defendants pleaded to the mortgage and desired to fight out the question of the mortgage. Of course if that is so, they are all necessary parties. It does not matter whether some one of them claims in addition a paramount title. If he wants to fight out the mortgage matter because he says he is interested in the equity of redemption and the plaintiff agrees that he is so interested, clearly he is a necessary party. The learned counsel however relies on a somewhat wider pronouncement made by the learned Judge in that case which is to the effect that there is no inflexible rule either in law or in practice excluding questions of title from a mortgage suit and that such titles may be investigated in such a suit if it is necessary to give complete relief to the plaintiff or to secure to him, as a result of the decree in the mortgage suit, a quiet and unobstructed possession. Those observations, read in conjunction with the facts of the case in which they were made, are of course unexceptionable. But what does one mean by stating that all matters necessary to give complete relief to the plaintiff may be investigated? It is only matters in suit which can be investigated and not matters which are beyond the suit. The only relief claimed in a mortgage suit is the relief to enforce the security against persons interested in the equity of redemption. If a person is not interested in the equity of redemption whatever else he may be interested in forms no part of the relief claimed in the mortgage suit and it is not necessary to go into those other matters in order to give the plaintiff the relief which he claims, namely a right to enforce his security against those interested in the equity of redemption.

As regards A I R 1935 Nag 68,[2] that is a very short judgment in which no facts are given. Staples, A. J. C. merely states, after referring to a Patna ruling which has not been referred to here, that it would be just and convenient to join the applicant as a party to the suit before him and to adjudicate upon her claim. Unless one knows the facts on which the learned Judge proceeded it is quite impossible to comment on that decision. There are undoubtedly cases in which it would be proper to inquire into these matters. I have already mentioned some of them, namely when all parties desire this to be done, or when the person claiming a paramount title also pleads to the mortgage and claims a right to contest the mortgage on the ground that he is also interested in some way in the equity of redemption.

As regards A I R 1937 Nag 121,[3] that is a case which is not in favour of the non-applicant. The decision there is that a son is not a necessary party to a suit against his father on a mortgage of joint family property because the son can bring a suit for a declaration that the mortgage decree does not bind his share. The learned Judge, however, goes on to state that if the son should himself come in and ask to be joined on the ground that he is interested in the equity of redemption and wants to be given a chance to challenge the mortgage or redeem it in the alternative, then he ought to be joined. With that of course I agree, but that is not the case here. Defendant 2 does not wish to be joined. She claims a paramount title and claims the right to be discharged. According to the ruling just cited, she is bound to be discharged in those circumstances.

It is next urged that whatever be the rights or wrongs of the matter, the lower Court, even if it has decided wrongly, had jurisdiction to do so and that the High Court cannot interfere in revision with a decision when a party who claims a paramount title is necessary to the case. Again reliance is placed upon A I R 1935 Nag 68.[2] As I have already said, so far as that decision is concerned, it is not possible for me to comment on it because I do not know what the facts there were. If a more general proposition was intended, then with respect I dissent from that view and have so dissented in a ruling published in the authorized reports, I L R (1936) Nag 73.[4] When I say "dissent from that view" I do not mean that I have referred to the ruling of Staples, A. J. C. or indeed to the question of paramount title; but I have referred to and followed a number of decisions which state that the question of parties and persons is fundamental and goes to the very root of jurisdiction. This will be found at pp. 76 and 77 of my decision. As my decision is the later of the two, and as it is published in the authorized reports, and as no facts are given in the ruling of Staples, A. J. C., so that I cannot determine whether what he has said is obiter or not, I prefer, with respect, to follow my own view. In my opinion defendant 2 must be discharged from this suit on the ground that she claims a paramount title and disclaims all interest in the equity of redemption. The application is allowed, the order of the lower Court is set aside and an order will now be passed discharging defendant 2 from the suit. Costs of the revision will be paid by the plaintiff. Counsel's fee Rs. 25. Costs in the lower Court will also be paid by the plaintiff.

(a) Hindu law—Partition—Wife can sue for her share provided she has not assented, waived her right or acquiesced — Wife held did not acquiesce in partition but merely stood by and hence entitled to share.

A wife can sue for her share where there has been a partition and she has not been assigned any share and has not assented or waived her rights or acquiesced. [P 135 C 2]

None of the parties to the partition knew that the wife had any right to a share. No provision was made for her. She was never asked to waive her right to her share. She was allowed to retain, and in fact retained, certain ornaments. Though the wife used to remain present off and on at the time of discussion between the parties during the partition she merely stood by and did nothing except claim certain ornaments not as a share-holder but because she wanted them :

Held* that the wife did not acquiesce in the partition and therefore was entitled to a share. The fact that she suggested a division of the ornaments and actually got them weighed for the purpose did not involve any agreement or consent with regard to partition : 31 Cal 262 (P C) and A I R 1936 P C 20, Rel. on; A I R 1930 All 537, Ref. [P 136 C 2]

(b) Hindu law — Partition — Suit by wife for her share — Partition re-opened — wife's share should be adjusted so as to interfere with past transactions as little as possible.

Where in a suit by the wife for her share in the family property a partition is reopened, the proper course in allocating the wife's share is to so re-arrange the property as to interfere with past transactions as little as may be. [P 136 C 2 ; P 137 C 1]

(c) Hindu law—Partition—Wife taking ornaments because she wanted them — Subsequent suit for share by wife—Gold and silver must be taken into account in settling her share.

Where at a partition the wife takes certain ornaments not as a share-holder but because she wanted them the value of those ornaments must be taken into account in settling the wife's share in a subsequent suit by her for her share. [P 137 C 1]

A. R. Kulkarni, J. V. Jakatdar and M. R. Bobde and B. V. Pradhan — for Respondents 1 ; 1 and 4 ; and 2, 3 and 5, respectively.

Judgment. — This is an appeal by the wife of the father of three sons who at one time were the members of a joint Hindu family and who in 1931 or thereabouts separated. The resulting partitioning of the property was effected amicably and resulted in the family property being divided into four shares, the plaintiff, wife of the father, being, as we think, allowed to retain certain ornaments. The question in this suit is whether the plaintiff is entitled to claim a share. The learned editor of Mayne on Hindu Law and Usage (Edn. 10) at p. 544 observes as follows :

> According to the Mitakshara law, a wife is entitled on a partition between her husband and his sons to a share equal to that of a son ; but she cannot enforce a partition. She may either be the mother or the step-mother of the sons.

That proposition as late as 1930 in 52 ALL 596[1] was regarded as a proposition about which two opinions could be rationally expressed and it was there observed that it had been strongly argued by an eminent lawyer that she had no such right. All doubt on the matter is however set at rest by the decision of the Privy Council in 63 I A 33,[2] where their Lordships point out that under the Mitakshara law when the family estate is divided a wife or mother is entitled to a share but is not recognized as the owner of such share until the division of the property is actually made. In this case however it is said that granted that a wife has a right to a share, this particular wife has lost her right to re-open this partition because she consented to it, she took part in it, she acquiesced in it, and therefore she is prevented by the doctrine of acquiescence from now challenging it and she must be regarded by her conduct as having waived her right to a share. It has already been held on a preliminary issue as follows in this very case :

> The weight of authority thus lies in favour of the view that a wife is entitled to sue for repartition and to get her share in it which share was not allotted to her in the partition when she did not acquiesce in the partition or did not waive her share.

We would express the matter somewhat differently, though doubtless it comes to very much the same thing. A wife can sue for her share where there has been a partition and she has not been assigned any share and has not assented or waived her rights or acquiesced. As their Lordships of the Privy Council state in 31 Cal 262[3] at p. 272 the mother (the same applies to the wife) is not bound by a partition to which it is not shown she ever assented.

At page 271 they observe as follows :

The Judges of the High Court apparently considered that acquiescence on the part of the mother was established ..... But their Lordships have not been referred to, nor have they been able to discover any evidence of acquiescence except a vague statement by the plaintiff that no share was assigned to the mother 'because she did not make any objection.'

We have no reason to think that in this branch of law acquiescence is anything other than it is in other branches of law and acquiescence is, we think, a branch of the law of estoppel and before it begins to operate it has to have all the factors present that are indicated as necessary by the Lord Chancellor in (1865) 1 H L C 129,[4] referred to in 2 N L R 34[5] at page 40 and together with the case law on this branch of law by this Bench in A I R 1939 Nag 163.[6] In this present case the plaintiff has greatly weakened her position by alleging that she did not know of the partition at all. The learned Judge has found that she knew about the partition and there is abundant evidence to justify that conclusion of fact and we accept it. But it is equally plain, in our opinion, that nobody in this family was aware that the wife was entitled to a share. Of the contesting defendants, the two elder sons, only one has gone into the box and he said:

We never asked her that she had a share in the partition of the property. We never knew that she had any share.

It is apparent from other evidence that the only part she took in this partitioning was in connection with the household ornaments. On this plea a witness who strikes us as giving the most truthful evidence is again a witness for the contesting sons, 2 and 3, D. W. 4. He says :

I never told the plaintiff that she had a share in the property and whether she required it or not. I simply asked her if she wanted anything and she simply said that she would be satisfied if she were given the gold which was with her. I told Laxman then and there not to demand the gold which was with her. Laxman agreed to it.

There is other evidence to the effect that that attitude was taken up because these sons were not merely claiming their share in the immovables and houses and money-lending but were claiming to take away from her her ornaments and she objected to that and the matter was amicably settled by the neighbours saying that she ought to be left with her ornaments. Another witness (2 and 3 D. W. 2) says :

On all these four occasions plaintiff was present. She did not raise any objection to any of the said divisions effected. On all these occasions she did not claim any share for herself in any of the properties except that she demanded the gold which she had with her.

Taking the evidence as a whole it seems to us to be reasonably plain that this is a case in which nobody knew that the wife had any right to a share. No provision was made for her. She was never asked to waive her right to her share. She was allowed to retain and in fact she retained certain ornaments and according to the evidence of the defendants she kept a substantial amount of gold ornaments. That sort of evidence seems to bring this case directly within the Privy Council decision in 31 Cal 262,[3] that is to say a case where a woman stands by and does nothing at all except claim certain ornaments, and she claimed not as a shareholder but because she wanted them. They were being claimed in point of fact by the sons, and the sons were claiming them as of right and the neighbours came along and persuaded the sons to give up their rights and they gave up their rights for the sake of enmity. The defendants pleaded acquiescence based on her conduct and active part in the partition. They subsequently added further particulars : (1) that she suggested a division of the ornaments and had actually got her ornaments weighed for the purpose and (2) she used to remain present off and on at the time of discussion between the parties during the partition. As to (2) that comes directly within their Lordships' observations. As to (1) we think that as above indicated that did not involve any agreement or consent with regard to partition but has resulted in an amicable settlement of the claim made by the sons to certain ornaments as theirs but which right they waived and allowed their stepmother to keep them.

Mr. Bobde for the respondents has strongly urged that to allow a partition to be reopened many years after the event, after all sorts of payments have been made, suits filed by third parties or against third parties, involves immense dislocation. It is of course regrettable that dislocation is involved, but this woman filed this suit in 1933 a very short time after this partition was effected. But we think that the proper course to pursue in allocating her share would be so to rearrange the property that it interferes with past transactions as little as may be. What she is asking for is a declaration that she is entitled to a fifth. That declaration, we think, she is entitled to. She is further asking for division either through the Collector or through Court according as the nature of the property. As to the working out of the partition, we cannot of course say anything at this stage except this that it is hardly disputed on the evidence already on record that the plaintiff has received gold and silver and that whatever she has so received will be taken into account in settling her share, and that as to what she has received will be determined by evidence after an issue has been framed. Costs out of the estate.

Misc. Civil Case No. 122 of 1939, Decided on 4th September 1940.

Nagpur Electrical Light & Power Co., Ltd. — Applicant.

v.

Nagpur Municipal Committee — Opposite Party.

(a) C. P. Municipalities Act (2 of 1922), S. 83 (2) — Commissioner is competent to make a reference.

As the Commissioner has jurisdiction to hear the appeal from an order of the Deputy Commissioner he must be deemed to have the same powers as are conferred on the Deputy Commissioner under S. 83, as an appeal is only a continuation of the original proceedings. The Commissioner is therefore entitled to make a reference under S. 83 (2). [P 137 C 2; P 138 C 1]

(b) C. P. Municipalities Act (2 of 1922) — Terminal tax — Terminal tax rules of Nagpur Municipality, R. 3 — Hard drawn bare copper wire imported by rail is liable to be assessed under serial No. 5 and not under serial No. 7 of Terminal Tax Schedule.

If an article is imported by rail it must fall under the first part of R. 3 which refers specifically to railway consignments. Hence hard drawn bare copper wire imported by rail is liable to be assessed under serial No. 5 and not under serial No. 7 of the Terminal Tax Schedule in accordance with the first part of R. 3 of the Terminal Tax Rules. [P 138 C 1]

M. R. Bobde — for Applicant.

Dr. W. S. Barlingey — for Opposite Party.

Order. — This case arises on a reference made by the Commissioner, Nagpur Division, Nagpur, under sub-s. (2) of S. 83, Municipalities Act, II of 1922. The question is whether hard drawn bare copper wire is assessable to terminal tax under serial No. 5 or serial No. 7 of the Terminal Tax Schedule of the Nagpur Municipal Committee. Up to August 1937, the Nagpur Municipal Committee had been levying terminal tax on hard drawn bare copper wire imported by rail to Nagpur classifying that article under electric goods specified in serial No. 5 of the Terminal Tax Schedule. But, on an objection raised by the auditor the standing sub-committee of the Municipal Committee sanctioned the levy of a higher rate of Re. 1-8-0 instead of 2 annas per maund under serial No. 7 of that Schedule. The action of the sub-committee was upheld by the committee by its resolution No. 104 dated 30th July 1938. The Nagpur Electric Light and Power Company Limited which was aggrieved by that resolution filed an appeal in the Court of the Deputy Commissioner under S. 83, C. P. Municipalities Act of 1922. The Deputy Commissioner upheld the Municipal Committee's resolution whereon the Nagpur Electric Light and Power Company Limited preferred an appeal to the Commissioner. It is as a second appellate Court that the Commissioner has referred the question to this Court for its opinion.

On behalf of the Municipal Committee an objection was raised in limine that the Commissioner was incompetent to make a reference and that the proper course for the Commissioner was to have remanded the case to the Court of the Deputy Commissioner with a direction to that officer to make a reference to this Court under S. 83 (2), C. P. Municipalities Act. I am unable to see any substance in this objection. The Commissioner under S. 58, Municipalities Act, is vested with the same authority and control over the Deputy Commissioner as he could exercise in the revenue administration. Under S. 33 (2), C. P. Land Revenue Act, a second appeal lies to the Commissioner from any order of the Deputy Commissioner on any of the grounds mentioned in cl. (c) of sub-s. (2) of that section. That the Commissioner is competent to hear the appeal appears to be beyond doubt. If the Commissioner had jurisdiction to hear the appeal he must be deemed to have the same powers as are conferred on the Deputy Commissioner under S. 83, C. P. Municipalities Act, as an appeal is only a continuation of the original proceedings : see 15 Cal 94[1] at p. 98. The appellate Court is, as indicated in S. 107, Civil P. C., empowered to pass any order which the law authorises the original Court to pass. Under S. 83, C. P. Municipalities Act, the Deputy Commissioner could determine the appeal finally or under sub-s. (2) of that section refer the case for the decision of this Court. The Commissioner would therefore be entitled to exercise the same powers as the Deputy Commissioner could. I hold that the reference has been properly made. Coming to the merits of the case, I have no doubt that so far as the hard drawn bare copper wire was imported to Nagpur by rail it was liable to be assessed under serial No. 5 and not under serial No. 7 of the Terminal Tax Schedule in accordance with the first part of R. 3 of the Terminal Tax Rules. The rule as a whole runs as follows :

If any question arises as to the heading in the schedule of articles under which any particular consignment falls, the classification adopted by the railway authorities for the levy of the railway freight upon that consignment shall be accepted for the purpose of the terminal tax. When an article is mentioned in the Schedule specifically and is also included in a general category, the tax shall be levied at the rate mentioned for the specific item. When any article is not specifically mentioned and may come under two or more headings in the Schedule, the tax shall be levied at the highest rate fixed for any such headings.

Analysing that section it would appear that the articles which are assessable to terminal tax are broadly divided into two classes; those which are imported by rail and those which are imported otherwise than by rail. The latter class of articles are sub-divided into two classes, (1) where an article is mentioned in the schedule specifically, and (2) when an article is not specifically mentioned. If an article is imported by rail it must fall under the first part of R. 3 which refers specifically to railway consignments. In that case the Municipal Committee is bound to accept the classification adopted by the railway authorities for the levy of the railway freight upon a consignment. That rule leaves no scope for discretion. It is not denied in this case that the goods which were imported by the Electric Company were all imported by rail. The Municipal Committee could not therefore apply the third part of R. 3 and levy the terminal tax at the higher rate. I find from G. I. P. R. Goods Tariff, Part. 1-A, page 194 that the bare hard drawn copper wire is classed under the head 'electrical appliances and fittings.' The Municipal Committee is under Part 1 of R. 3 of the Terminal Tax Schedule bound to accept that classification.

It is true that if the same article were imported into Nagpur otherwise than by rail, the contention of the Municial Committee would have some force. In view of the admitted fact that the article was a rail borne import, any discussion of this question would be academic. I may only point out that part 2 (i. e. the second sentence in R. 3 of the Terminal Tax Rules) only applies to an article which is mentioned specifically, that is by the specific description that article is itself known in the market and that when an article falls under two headings, one more specific as a class than another, the last part of that rule would authorise the Committee to levy tax at the higher rate. It must however be conceded that in a case of an article such as the present, it would be manifestly absurd to levy taxes at different rates because the means of transport are different. This absurdity is the more glaring as this particular article would have to pay the tax at Re. 1-8-0 per maund while the other kinds of electric goods would be paying only at 2 annas per maund. It is not permissible to presume that the authority which framed this rule intended such a startling and capricious result. Consequently, it must be held that were the Municipal Committee to levy the higher rate in the hypothetical case put forward on its behalf, it would be acting in contravention of the spirit of the rule. To avoid an anomaly, the appropriate course would be to amend the wording of R. 3. On the particular facts of this case, I have no doubt that it falls under the first part of R. 3 so as to leave no alternative to the committee but to accept the classification adopted by the railway authorities. The resolution No. 104 dated 30th July 1938 cannot be sustained. The Municipal Committee will pay the costs of this reference to the Company. Counsel fees Rs. 100.

ORDER OF REFERENCE

Gruer J. — In this mortgage suit the applicants (defendants 3 and 4) were subsequent mortgagees. Defendant 1 was the original mortgagor and the plaintiffs (non-applicants 1 and 2) were the prior mortgagees. These applicants, subsequent mortgagees, claimed to be allowed to pay off the prior mortgage and to have a decree in their favour for the combined amounts of the two mortgages in Form No. 9 of Appendix D read with O. 34, R. 4, Civil P. C. The lower Court, Fourth Sub-Judge, second class, Nagpur, points out that the total claim on the subsequent mortgages is Rs. 2557 plus Rs. 4502 = Rs. 7059 which is beyond the inherent jurisdiction of a second class Sub-Judge. It therefore holds that these mortgages of defendants 3 and 4 cannot be enquired into in the present suit. The present application against that finding is not opposed by the plaintiffs who say that they have nothing to urge. It is opposed by defendant 2 who points out that O. 34, R. 4, Civil P. C., provides for the case of subsequent mortgagees and for the adjudication of the respective rights and liabilities of the parties to the suit in the manner and form set forth in Form No. 9, Form No. 10 or Form No. 11, as the case may be, of Appendix D with such variations as the circumstances of the case may require,

Now Form No. 9 provides for a statement of the amount due on the subsequent mortgage so that evidently that amount would have to be determined in the suit and all objections to the mortgage would have to be decided. It is said however that though this no doubt would have to be done if the Court had jurisdiction to entertain the total claim it cannot be done where the pecuniary jurisdiction of the Court has been exceeded as is the case here. Section 6, Civil P. C., says:

Save in so far as is otherwise expressly provided, nothing herein contained shall operate to give any Court jurisdiction over suits the amount or value of the subject-matter of which exceeds the pecuniary limits (if any) of its ordinary jurisdiction.

The valuation of a suit for purposes of jurisdiction is determined by the valuation in the plaint. That is the general rule, but here by reason of O. 34, R. 1, Civil P. C., the subsequent mortgagees having a right of redemption had to be joined as parties, and by reason of R. 4, sub-r. 4, their rights and liabilities had to be determined in the manner and form set forth in form No. 9 seeing that they themselves wished to redeem. The Court therefore apparently has no option but to investigate the validity of the mortgages and the amount due not only on the mortgage primarily in suit dated 22nd December 1925 but the two subsequent mortgages of 1931 and 1933 of which the principal sums are Rs. 4000 and Rs. 3000 respectively. I doubt therefore whether the lower Court's order refusing to consider these mortgages can stand. It seems to me that if it had jurisdiction it was bound to go on with the suit as a whole, otherwise to return the plaint to be presented to the Court having jurisdiction.

The question whether jurisdiction has been exceeded in such a case is somewhat puzzling, and I have not been able to find any authority bearing directly on the point. There are of course cases in which it has been held that the Court has power to pass a decree in excess of its pecuniary jurisdiction: for instance where mesne profits accruing pendente lite are concerned, I L R (1937) 2 Cal 176,[1] and where the amount finally due on accounts exceeds jurisdiction, 9 N L R 112;[2] 8 C P L R 86.[3] I doubt, however, whether the analogy of these cases is a good one. In 51 Cal 737[4] the suit brought was one for redemption, and it was held that jurisdiction depended on the amount ultimately found to be due. That case turned on S. 8, Suits Valuation Act, and is of course distinguishable from one like the present where the suit as brought is for sale on the mortgage. At p. 743 of that ruling it is said:

Prima facie it is the plaintiff's claim which determines jurisdiction, and the jurisdiction continues whatever the event unless a different principle comes into operation to prevent such a result or to make the proceedings from the first abortive.

1. ('37) 24 A I R 1937 Cal 761 : 172 I C 591 : I L R (1937) 2 Cal 176, Hemanga Bhooshan Roy v. Bheem Gharami.

It may well be argued that here the investigation of the subsequent mortgages is implicit in the case from the beginning, and will really be part of the subject-matter of the suit unless the defendants decline to redeem. It is also contended that the subsequent mortgagees' demand for investigation of their mortgages is in the nature of a counter-claim and that court-fees should be paid. That question does not arise directly in this revision application, but it is important that the proper procedure in such cases should be clearly laid down. The question in my opinion is one of some difficulty and should be decided by a Bench. I should refer it as follows:

"(1) When in a mortgage suit a subsequent mortgagee is added who wants his rights to be investigated and decided how is the suit to be valued for purposes of jurisdiction, and is jurisdiction lost if the amounts claimed on the prior and subsequent mortgages taken together exceed the pecuniary jurisdiction of the Court?

(2) If the Court cannot deal with the whole claim should it dispose of the suit without enquiring into the subsequent mortgages or should it return the plaint for presentation to the proper Court?

(3) Should court-fees be payable also on the claim under the subsequent mortgages and if so, by whom?"

This reference be submitted to my Lord the Chief Justice for passing orders about a Bench.

Opinion. — The facts leading up to this reference and the points to be decided are set out in the order of reference itself. The position is briefly that in a mortgage suit in which a decree for sale is sought defendants 3 and 4 have been joined as subsequent mortgagees. Plaintiffs' mortgage involved a sum of Rs. 1330-8-11 only and so was within the pecuniary jurisdiction of the Court of the Sub-Judge, second class, in which it was brought, but the claim on the two subsequent mortgages comes to Rs. 7059, which is beyond the pecuniary jurisdiction (Rs. 5000) of a second class Sub-Judge. These subsequent mortgagees want to pay off the prior mortgage and have a decree on the foot of their mortgages in Form No. 9, Appendix D, Civil P. C., read with O. 34, R. 4, of the Code. On objection raised by defendant 2, who is the legal representative of the purchaser of the mortgaged property from defendant 1 the lower Court framed a preliminary issue whether the subsequent mortgages of defendants 3 and 4 could be enquired into in this suit and has held that it cannot as it would thereby be acting beyond its jurisdiction.

The suit was rightly valued for purposes of court-fee on the amount due on plaintiffs' mortgage. Under S. 7 (ix-A), Court-fees Act, that is also now the valuation for court-fees in the Central Provinces in suits to foreclose a mortgage or, where the mortgage is made by conditional sale, to have the sale declared absolute. The plaintiffs' mortgage is a simple one not falling under S. 7 (ix-A), but it has to be valued on the amount claimed, and according to S. 8, Suits Valuation Act, the value for purposes of jurisdiction would be the same: 58 Cal 829.[5] Learned counsel for defendant 2 relies on S. 6, Civil P. C., and says that the amount or value of the subject-matter of the suit includes the amounts due on the subsequent mortgages and therefore the pecuniary limits are exceeded. In our opinion, the subject-matter of the suit is plaintiffs' mortgage as stated by them, and this is not altered by the obligation to join subsequent mortgagees or by the possibility that such subsequent mortgagees may in their defence claim to redeem and to have their own mortgages investigated. Our answer to the first question is that the suit for purposes of jurisdiction has to be valued ad valorem on the amount due on the plaintiffs' prior mortgage, and jurisdiction is not lost if the amounts claimed on the prior and subsequent mortgages taken together exceed Rs. 5000, the pecuniary jurisdiction of the Court.

On this finding, the second point does not arise. So we refrain from answering it. The third point is: "Should court-fees be payable also on the claim under the subsequent mortgage, and if so, by whom?" This is neither a set-off nor a counter-claim on which court-fees would have to be paid. These puisne mortgagees ask for this relief in their written statement, which does not require to be stamped at all. It is no doubt advantageous to puisne mortgagees to obtain a decree on their mortgages without paying any court-fees and it would be especially so where the later mortgages happen to be for very large sums. The legislature no doubt could have provided for payment of court-fees by the puisne mortgagees when they claimed a determination, or recourse perhaps might have been had to S. 9, Suits Valuation Act. But in the absence of any such provision or rule we find that no court-fees are payable on the claim under the subsequent mortgages. We answer the reference accordingly.

(a) Adverse possession—Cosharers—Name of some not entered in mutation register—Possession of other cosharers does not become adverse to them.

Where some of the cosharers enter into possession under lawful title, viz., that of co-owners, their possession cannot be treated as being adverse to other cosharers. The fact that names of such other cosharers have not been entered in the register of proprietary mutation does not necessarily show that the possession of the co-heirs was adverse to them : A I R 1915 Nag 125, Rel. on. [P 142 C 2]

(b) Adverse possession — Mortgagor and mortgagee — Mortgagee's possession secured under foreclosure decree is not adverse against mortgagor who is not party to the decree.

Whether mortgagee's possession becomes adverse or not depends upon the nature of the right which the mortgagee asserts while entering into possession of the mortgaged property. If he enters into possession pursuant to the rights acquired by him under the mortgage his possession will not be adverse. It is only when he takes possession in assertion of a right independently of the mortgage that his possession will become adverse. [P 143 C 1]

A mortgagee who obtains a decree for foreclosure on the basis of his mortgage comes into possession of the mortgaged property on the basis of his mortgage. His possession, in so far as it affects the party excluded from the mortgage suit, would be that of a mortgagee and not adverse to the mortgagors, for the obvious reason that the foreclosure decree does not destroy his equity of redemption : Case law reviewed. [P 145 C 1]

Judgment. — This is plaintiffs' appeal from the concurring judgment of the Additional District Judge, Chhindwara, in Civil Appeal No. 5-A of 1937 delivered on 30th October 1937. This appeal arises out of a protracted and contested litigation which had come up to the Judicial Commissioner's Court in interlocutory stages in Civil Revision No. 365 of 1934 decided on 29th October 1934 and again to the High Court in Civil Revision No. 688 of 1935 dated 5th November 1936. In the last mentioned civil revision Pollock J., directed that there should be a decision of two points : (1) whether Mt. Imam Bi was sufficiently represented in the mortgage suit and therefore bound by these proceedings, and (2) whether the plaintiffs had been in adverse possession for more than 12 years. The trial Court determined both these issues in the negative and passed a decree as follows :

I pass a decree in plaintiffs' favour and declare that land No. 34=173.20 acres is a portion of Patti No. 1 of 4 annas belonging to plaintiffs and Imam Bi jointly and that it was wrongly included in Patti No. 2 of 12 annas in the last settlement. I also declare that lands Nos. 280=266.90, 90=1.05, 87=1.05, 229=.25, 140=.48 form part of Patti No. 2 of 12 annas and that they were wrongly included in Patti No. 3, i. e. the shamlat patti in the last settlement. I also declare that land No. 223=10.12 forms part of Patti No. 2. I further declare that plaintiffs hold 1/3rd share in Patti No. 2 of 12 annas. I further declare that plaintiffs and Imam Bi jointly hold ½ share in shamlat patti No. 3.

On appeal from that decree the first appellate Court remanded the case for findings on issues 1-C and 2-C out of the issues which had been framed by Mr. Shrivastava on 29th February 1932. They were :

1-C: Whether plaintiff and his predecessors remained in exclusive possession of the said 4 annas share from 5th May 1894 till to-day ?

2-C: Whether right of defendant 3 over her share if any is extinguished by plaintiffs' adverse possession since 1894 ?

The finding on issue 1 was in the affirmative and on issue 2 was in the negative. The lower appellate Court agreed with the findings of the trial Court and confirmed its decree. This appeal is preferred against that decree. The plaintiffs' case is that as a result of an imperfect partition in 1898-99 the village Sirghodi was divided into three pattis. Patti No. 1 of 4 annas was allotted to Imam Bi, Nasiruddin and Abdul Gaffur, and Patti No. 3 was kept joint. Later on, the plaintiffs acquired another 4 annas share in Patti No. 2 together with a proportionate share in the joint Patti No. 3. The plaintiffs thus claimed 8 annas share in the village. They applied for an imperfect partition in 1928-29 and in those proceedings disputes arose not only as to the extent of the pattis but also the plaintiffs' interest in them. The revenue officer referred the plaintiffs to the civil Court and the plaintiffs filed the suit out of which this appeal arises on 15th January 1931 claiming the following declaratory reliefs : (1) that the plaintiffs have full proprietary rights over 265.70 acres constituting patti No. 1, (2) that they have one-third proprietary interest in the 799.84 acres of land constituting patti No. 2, and (3) that they have a half share in 121.69 acres of land constituting patti No. 3.

The village Sirghodi was originally owned by the predecessor of Abdur Razak the father of respondent 3, Mt. Imam Bi. He had 4 annas share in it which he mortgaged to one Isnaji son of Dhannu Sao. The latter filed Civil Suit No. 47 of 1893 against Mt. Abbas Bi widow of Abdur Razak, Abdul Rahim son of Abdur Razak, and Abdul Gaffur son of Abdul Kadir, who were all heirs of the mortgagor Abdul Razak and obtained a final decree for foreclosure pursuant to which he took possession of foreclosed 4 annas share on 5th May 1894. Mt. Imam Bi Abdur Razak's daughter was not impleaded in the suit. The plaintiffs also acquired a share of 4 annas out of patti No. 2 from Nasiruddin but the particulars relating to it are not material for the disposal of this appeal. The main point which on the arguments arises in this appeal is whether the possession of the plaintiffs-appellants and their predecessor-in-interest was adverse to Mt. Imam Bi, respondent 3, as to extinguish her equity of redemption. On behalf of the appellants it is contended that the possession of the heirs of Abdur Razak who were impleaded in the mortgage suit had been adverse to Mt. Imam Bi since the death of her father in 1888-89 and that in any case the plaintiffs' possession since 5th May 1894 when they obtained actual possession of the property in execution of the foreclosure decree passed in the mortgage suit became adverse to her so as to extinguish her right.

As to the period prior to 5th May 1894 the question of adverse possession does not appear to be material for the obvious reason that even if the possession of Mt. Abbas Bi and Abdul Rahim (Abdur Razak's heirs) is assumed to be adverse to Mt. Imam Bi their adverse possession would commence only on the death of Abdur Razak which occurred in 1888 or 1889 and could not extinguish Mt. Imam Bi's right in 1893 in which year the appellants filed their suit to enforce their mortgage (Civil Suit No. 47 of 1893). Mt. Imam Bi's right of redemption was then outstanding and she was a necessary party to the mortgage suit. As she was not impleaded in the suit the mortgage decree cannot obviously affect her rights: see Mulla's Civil Procedure Code, p. 983. That appears to me to be a proposition so plain as not to admit of any controversy. I however do not agree that the possession of Mt. Abbas Bi and Abdul Rahim was at its inception adverse. It is true that Mt. Imam Bi's name was not entered in the register of proprietary mutation but that would not necessarily show that the possession of the co-heirs was adverse to Mt. Imam Bi. Inasmuch as they entered into possession under a lawful title, viz. that of co-owners, their possession could not be treated as being adverse to Mt. Imam Bi: see 11 N L R 164.[1] Unless there is a proof of ouster or clear denial of title of Mt. Imam Bi the possession held by her co-heirs must be deemed to be on her behalf and for her benefit. No evidence has been pointed out to show ouster or denial of possession on the part of Abbas Bi and Abdul Rahim. It is pertinent to notice that the contention in its present form was not raised in any of the previous stages of this long drawn out litigation.

There survives the question whether the possession of the plaintiffs who claimed under the foreclosure decree passed in Civil Suit No. 47 of 1893 became adverse to Mt. Imam Bi (who was not impleaded in the mortgage suit) from 5th May 1894 when their possession began. The appellants' contention is that inasmuch as the plaintiffs entered into possession of the property foreclosed by them as absolute and exclusive owners their possession must be regarded as being adverse to Mt. Imam Bi who was not a party to the suit and that her right of redemption was extinguished in 1906 when the appellants completed their 12 years of adverse possession. In a case of this character it was always recognized that the possession of the mortgagee would not be adverse to any interest excluded from the mortgage suit, in view of the principle laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 32 Cal 296[2] in these terms:

> Their Lordships are satisfied that the possession has been that of the mortgagees throughout, and the question at issue is exclusively one between mortgagor and mortgagee. As between them neither exclusive possession by the mortgagee for any length of time short of the statutory period of 60 years, nor any acquiesence by the mortgagor not amounting to a release of the equity of redemption will be a bar or defence to a suit for redemption if the parties are otherwise entitled to redeem.

It is however urged that a long series of recent decisions have deprived the aforesaid Privy Council decision of its authority. I have therefore to examine some of the important and typical cases cited on either side. It cannot be gainsaid that if a person whose interest in the mortgaged property necessitates his joinder in the mortgage suit is not impleaded in it any decree whether for sale or foreclosure passed in the suit does not bind the person so excluded from the suit. That person would have clearly a right under Art. 148 of Sch. 1, Limitation Act of 1908 to redeem the property within 60 years. That right would no doubt be extinguished by the adverse possession on the part of the mortgagee. Whether mortgagee's possession becomes adverse or not depends upon the nature of the right which the mortgagee asserts while entering into possession of the mortgaged property. If he enters into possession pursuant to the rights acquired by him under the mortgage his possession will in my opinion not be adverse. It is only when he takes possession in assertion of a right independently of the mortgage that his possession will become adverse.

I have now to examine the various cases to see what were the facts of each case and on what principle the case was decided. 32 Cal 296[2] is understood to be the leading case. The facts of that case are somewhat complicated but the outline of the case may be stated in brief. It was a suit for redemption of two mortgages of 1878. After the execution of the mortgages the mortgaged property was sold in execution of the decree obtained by a person other than the mortgagee against some of the mortgagors. The property was purchased in execution by the son of one of the mortgagors and it was not disputed that he was a benamidar for the mortgagees. In one of the suits one of the mortgagors by name Naurez and in another suit Nabibaksh another mortgagor were not impleaded. The question arose whether the judicial sales affected the interest of Naurez and Nabibaksh. Their Lordships of the Privy Council at p. 312 observed that though the sales could not be treated as void the Court had no jurisdiction to sell the property of persons who were not parties to the proceedings or properly represented on the record, and that as against such persons the decrees and sales purporting to be made would be a nullity and might be disregarded without any proceeding to set them aside. That point was again emphasised at p. 315. In 47 ALL 73[3] it was laid down following 32 Cal 296[2] that :

> A person who lawfully comes into possession of land as a mortgagee cannot, by setting up during the continuance of such relation any title adverse to that of the mortgagor or inconsistent with the real legal relation between them, and that however notoriously and to the knowledge of the other party, acquire by the operation of the law of adverse possession a title as owner or any other title inconsistent with that under which he was let into possession.

In this case Sakaldip Singh and Ghazi Mal had executed a mortgage in 1865 in favour of Naurang Singh and Ujagar Singh. In 1869 Sakaldip Singh, Subh Karan Singh and Prayag Singh executed a zar-i-peshgi mortgage for 10 years in favour of the same mortgagees. In 1870 Binda Singh executed a third mortgage in favour of the same mortgagees. All these mortgagors had joint interest in the property. In 1869 Sakaldip Singh and Prayag Singh sold their equity of redemption to Bhawani Din Singh, Thakur Prasad Singh and Diwan Singh and in 1872 Binda Singh sold his equity of redemption to the same persons. The representatives of Thakur Prasad Singh sued for redemption of half the properties sold by the above deeds of sale alleging that the interest of Bhawani Din Singh, the owner of the other half of the equity of redemption, had passed to Naurang Singh one of the mortgagees. It was found that the possession of the mortgagees Naurang Singh and Ujagar Singh and their representatives was not adverse to those mortgagors who had not joined in the sales of the equity of redemption. It was pointed out that so long as the right of redemption was outstanding it was not open to the mortgagees in possession to set up an adverse title.

In 34 ALL 213[4] one Amir Haidar had executed mortgages in 1885 and 1886. Thereafter he bequeathed his property to his four grandsons. In 1889, three of them who were majors acting on their own behalf and as guardian of the fourth, sold a part of the mortgaged property to the mortgagees in satisfaction of the mortgage. In 1892 or 1893 the fourth grandson attained majority and brought a suit to redeem his one-fourth share in the year 1905. It was held that the sale of 1889 did not bind the plaintiff and that the mortgagees' possession was not adverse. Their Lordships observed at p. 222 that unless the plaintiff's remedy is barred by the Limitation Act, 15 of 1877, he was entitled to the relief prayed for, namely, redemption of mortgage to the extent of his one-fourth share. In A I R 1930 Oudh 17[5] there was a mortgage by three brothers but the mortgaged property was sold by only one of them and there was no evidence that the other brothers consented to this sale. The mortgagees who purchased the equity of redemption from him were in possession when the other two brothers who did not join in the sale sued for redemption of the mortgage. It was held following 32 Cal 296[2] that the mortgagees' possession was not adverse.

In A I R 1940 Oudh 97[6] it was held that where there are several co-mortgagors and the entire equity of redemption in the mortgage is transferred to the mortgagee by some only of the co-mortgagors, the possession of the mortgagee as regards other co-mortgagors remains only that of a mortgagee, and that a suit by such co-mortgagors would be governed by Art. 148, Limitation Act. As against these cases are those on which reliance is placed on behalf of the appellants. In 4 Lah 249[7] it was laid down that a mortgagee can set up adverse possession, if his possession at its inception was that of a trespasser. The facts were that a mortgage was executed in 1880 by the father of the plaintiffs in that case. That mortgage was superseded by another mortgage in 1884 executed by the same mortgagor. The plaintiffs' father in 1888 sold the mortgaged property to the representatives of the mortgagee and delivered possession of it and mutation effected in their names in 1890. It turned out that the sale of 1890 was an unregistered one but it was admitted for the purpose of proving the nature of vendees' possession as showing that of trespasser's. It was held, a mortgagee could set up adverse possession if his possession at its inception was that of a trespasser.

In 16 Lah 12[8] it was on the facts of the case held that the possession of the mortgagees was adverse to the mortgagors as they had taken possession under a sale deed from the mortgagors and their entry into possession was not in their capacity as the mortgagors but as vendees. In that case one Fiaz Ali Khan had a half share in two properties known as Kothi Bagh and Serai and the remaining half belonged to his minor nephews. Kothi Bagh property was subject to a mortgage. In 1893 Fiaz Ali Khan purporting to act for himself, and as guardian of his minor nephews sold both these properties to the mortgagees who took possession of Kothi Bagh property which was mortgaged to them as well as of Serai which had not been mortgaged to them. In 1923 Fiaz Ali Khan's nephews sued the successor in interest of the purchasers of Kothi Bagh and Serai for possession of the properties. It was found that the possession of the purchasers was not attributable to their rights under the mortgage but to the right under the sale deed of 1893 and consequently their possession had become adverse.

In 44 Mad 253[9] the plaintiff's father and three others mortgaged some property in 1871. There was an arrangement between the mortgagors and mortgagees in 1885 whereby the mortgage was discharged but that arrangement was by an oral transaction and not by a registered document. It was held following 43 Mad 244[10] that the possession of the mortgagees though began under an invalid arrangement was adverse to the mortgagors. In 53 Bom 676[11] there was a mortgage executed in 1870 which was followed by sale of the mortgaged property to the mortgagees in 1882. The sale was invalid under S. 9, Khoti Act, and in a previous litigation it was held that the mortgagees' possession had become adverse from the date of the invalid sale. In 50 ALL 986[12] there was a usufructuary mortgage with possession in 1873 which was followed in 1901 by the sale of the mortgaged property by the mortgagors to the mortgagees. In a suit for redemption by the representatives of the mortgagors it was held that the mortgagees' possession became adverse since 1901 when the parties by a common agreement put an end to the mortgagees' estate.

On analysis of the two lines of cases examined above the principle underlying the decisions becomes apparent. When there is a single mortgagor and he voluntarily assigns his equity of redemption to the mortgagee, he thereby intends to extinguish the mortgage and consequently the mortgagee's possession, being that of an owner, would be adverse to the mortgagor. The same result would follow in case of several joint mortgagors transferring their equity of redemption to the mortgagee as well as in a case of some (one or more) of the mortgagors assigning their equity of redemption to the mortgagee in a manner binding on the other joint mortgagor or mortgagors. That is because the equity of redemption having coalesced with security, the mortgage itself comes to an end. The transferee's possession would be adverse even whether the assignment or transfer of equity of redemption is valid or invalid in form (e. g., by an unregistered instrument). In all these cases the mortgagee does not enter into possession under colour of mortgage or by working out his rights under the mortgage. His possession, originating as it does, independently of the mortgage cannot be regarded as a derivative or permissive possession. Among the cases reviewed above there is no doubt a conflict between 34 ALL 213[4] and 16 Lah 12,[8] but that is in my opinion more apparent than real. In the former case, the sale of the equity of redemption by three co-heirs was held to be not binding on the 4th co-heir. At p. 222 of 34 ALL 213[4] their Lordships of the Privy Council make it clear that there was no acquiescence on the part of that co-heir in the assignment of the equity of redemption. In the Lahore case, the sale by Faiz Ali Khan was found to be binding on his nephews. The result was that while in the one case the mortgage was not extinguished vis-a-vis the 4th co-heir, it was wholly wiped out in the Lahore case.

A mortgagee who obtains a decree for foreclosure on the basis of his mortgage comes into possession of the mortgaged property on the basis of his mortgage. His possession, in so far as it affects the party excluded from the mortgage suit, would be that of a mortgagee, for the obvious reason that the foreclosure decree does not destroy his equity of redemption. If the possession of the mortgagee obtained under a decree which is not binding on a party excluded from the suit is treated as being adverse to the excluded party it would lead to manifestly unreasonable result, for in every such case, the 60 years period of limitation available by law for the exercise of the right of redemption would for no fault of the party be reduced to 12 years. Under the law it is the duty of the mortgagee to implead all persons entitled to claim redemption and he cannot urge his own default as an excuse for curtailing and eventually extinguishing their right. For these reasons, I cannot accede to the appellants' contention that the appellants' possession became adverse. The result is that the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Criminal Appeals Nos. 42 and 43 of 1940, Decided on 27th July 1940, from order of First Class Magistrate, Buldana, D/- 2nd January 1940.

(a) Evidence Act (1872), S. 30 — Evidence against accused lacking requisite volume and certainty — Self-inculpatory confession by co-accused implicating accused can be used against latter.

Section 30 postulates that a self-inculpatory confession by a co-accused can be used against the accused where the evidence afforded against him—and some such evidence there must be—lacks the requisite volume and certainty to insure conviction. [P 149 C 1]

An information was given to the police that certain persons including the accused were to participate in a dacoity on a certain night and when late at night they were found to be away from their houses and a guard was kept by the police on their houses, they were found attempting to return to them at 3 o'clock in the morning and gave explanations of their absence which were unacceptable:

Held that the facts raised a very strong suspicion against the accused and that suspicion was confirmed and made certain by the confessions of their accomplices, confessions in which the accomplices did not exclude their own share in the dacoity : A I R 1930 Nag 242 (F B), Ref. [P 149 C 1]

(b) Criminal trial—Confession — Confession retracted — It does not follow that confession is untrue or was involuntary — Retracted confession should be used with caution and when true can be used against other co-accused.

It is wrong to say that when a confession is retracted it has no value at all as against the co-accused. The retraction of a confession may throw doubt either on the truth of it or on the fact that it was voluntarily made, but it certainly does not follow because a confession is retracted that it was either untrue or involuntary and the truth or voluntariness of a confession operates equally, such a confession being self inculpatory in respect of the person who made it and the person implicated therein. Such retracted confessions must be used with caution, but when it is possible to come to the conclusion that the confessions cannot be otherwise than true they may be taken into consideration in connexion with the evidence appearing in the case whether they are retracted or no : A I R 1934 Cal 853, Not approved; 28 Cal 689 and 38 Cal 559, Expl., and Approved. [P 149 C 2; P 150 C 1]

(c) Criminal trial — Confession — Confession retracted in respect of its voluntariness — No express denial of its truth—Court is not absolved from examining truth of confession and considering whether it can be taken into account along with other evidence.

The fact that the retractions of a confession are merely in respect of the voluntariness of the statements and there is no express denial of the fact that the confessions were true in substance does not absolve the Court from examining the question whether the confessions are in fact true or not and, if true, whether they can be taken into consideration along with the other evidence. [P 150 C 1]

(d) Penal Code (1860), S. 395 — Dacoity not accompanied by particular violence or brutality — Maximum sentence under S. 395 is not necessary.

In a case where the dacoity is not accompanied by any particular violence or brutality, the maximum sentence permitted by S. 395 is not necessary. [P 152 C 1]

Judgment. — This appeal is by seven persons and Criminal Appeal No. 43 of 1940 by one Ganpatsingh. All these eight persons have been convicted of dacoity and all have been sentenced in the aggregate to ten years' rigorous imprisonment each. Three dacoities are said to have been committed in the course of one night at the same village and all the appellants have been sentenced to six years rigorous imprisonment for the first dacoity, to two years for the second and to two years for the third. The fact that there are two appeals arises as Ganpatsingh claimed that he accompanied the other persons on instructions of the police and was in fact a police informant, and that consequently he should not have been convicted at all. His appeal has been separately argued, but this judgment will cover both appeals. The dacoity took place on the night of 16th August at the village of Pangri which is about four miles from Fattekherda, the nearest police station. Of the accused Abdul Gafoor, Syed Usman, Sheikh Hussein, Syed Miroo and Ramsingh are inhabitants of Fattekherda. Umarkhan is a resident of Pangri, and Sherali was temporarily staying at Pangri. Ganpatsingh is an inhabitant of Fattekherda. The raid on the village which occurred during a drizzling August night began at about 10 in the evening and lasted for about two hours.

The village is a small one of about 30 houses. The first house to be visited was that of Sawalaram (P. W. 30). The raid was conducted with very considerable noise so as to terrify the rest of the villagers, and corrugated iron roofs were beaten with sticks and stones thrown. Sawalaram was caught by two of the assailants and beaten with sticks and was told to hand over Rs. 1100 which he was said to have with him. He denied that he had any money. He was dragged out of his house and the assailants searched the house. His mother Mt. Ahelabai, who had been sleeping near him, called out to a servant, Hariba, to open the main door of the house; this was by way of precaution. This man did so and was beaten. The main part of the house was then ransacked, boxes were burst open, but nothing was found, and the dacoits eventually left the house taking with them no more than Rs. 25. The next house visited was that of Balwanta (P. W. 11) which was near by. Balwanta and the other inmates of his house had already fled, having heard the uproar at Sawalaram's. No details of the actual ransacking of this house are available, but when Balwanta returned after the dacoits had left the village, boxes were found broken open, clothes and papers littered on the floor, and silver ornaments were missing. After this the dacoits came back to the house of Bhiwaji (P. W. 6), which is next door to Sawalaram's. Bhiwaji fled to the Mahar quarter of the village, and when he came back he found a similar state of things to that which had prevailed in Balwanta's house. Silver ornaments were missing and money had been stolen. After that the house of Kachra is said to have been attacked, but this is not included in the charges in this case.

In the course of the events of this night the victims profess to have recognized five of the assailants. Sawalaram and his mother both recognized Abdul Gafoor as did Bhiwaji and Balwanta, although the latter says that he recognized him by his voice alone when a question was put by him to Umarkhan whom also he recognized by his voice. Umarkhan was also recognized by Sawalaram and his mother, and both profess to have seen him. They also speak to recognizing Sherali who was on a visit to their village, and in addition Sawalaram recognizes Ramsingh whom he identifies as wearing a gunny bag by way of a hood to keep off the rain, and Mt. Ahelabai identifies Sheikh Hussein, who is identified by no one else, as a man who was making a noise by beating the corrugated iron roof with his lathi. Syed Usman, Syed Miroo and Ganpatsingh were at no time identified in the village. The general concensus of the witnesses is that the raiding party numbered about nine. The village patel after the dacoits had departed made a hurried enquiry. Sawalaram who had been severely beaten was unable to give any details at the time, and Gyanu Mahar, the village kamdar, left at 3 o'clock in the morning to report at the Fattekherda police station. He reached there at 4 in the morning and made his report. He found a crowd outside the police station and sat at Fattekherda till 1 o'clock as the police told him that he was wanted to help to carry the Sub-Inspector's luggage to Pangri when the latter proceeded to go for investigation. The crowd was as a matter of fact occasioned by the fact that the police had already arrested four men before Gyanu arrived to make his report of the dacoity, and although it has been strongly contended by the learned counsel for the seven appellants that Gyanu must have been fully aware of the identity of these people and that it was because he was so aware that the written report that he made at the dictation of the victims when he returned to Fattekherda was influenced by this knowledge, it is strange that not a single question was asked him in cross-examination to elicit from him that he knew who the people who had been arrested were or even that he knew that anyone had been arrested in respect of the dacoity.

The police at Fattekherda were not unaware that a dacoity was about to be committed although they were unaware of the locality where it was to take place. The station-house officer at the time was Sub-Inspector Pitale (P. W. 1), and he had received information on 13th August and on 15th August that some Rohillas and Bundelas of Fattekherda were planning a dacoity. Both these rumours had turned out to be false, and when he was warned again on 16th August at 9 P. M., he decided to verify the statement of his informant Lalsingh (P. W. 5) who is a brother of Ganpatsingh and who had brought Ganpatsingh, who, he says, was his own informant, to the police station that night to impress on the authorities the genuineness of his information. The Sub-Inspector accordingly visited the houses of certain people as they were suspicious characters, and he found that four of them were absent, namely Ramsingh (also Chainsingh who lives next door but who does not appear in the proceedings), Syed Miroo, Abdul Gafoor and Syed Usman. He sent for additional police constables and called out choukidars and other people and set posts round these houses. Towards 3 o'clock in the morning all these four persons were captured on the way back to their houses. Abdul Gafoor was accosted outside his own house, but ran away and was apprehended in his bagicha about a furlong away and captured after some resistance. Syed Usman was met near the baithak of Rohillas and claimed that although he was a married man with a family, he had been sleeping in the baithak and had gone out to ease himself and was returning. Ramsingh was met near his own house and said that he had come back from his field. He gives the time as before midnight.

The circumstances of the apprehension of Syed Miroo are somewhat different. When the other people were caught, there was a considerable noise, and the party watching Syed Miroo's house ran back to the police station thinking that their man had been caught. The others had, but not Syed Miroo, and consequently a constable was ordered to go back to Syed Miroo's house. A call was then made at the house and a reply was given that Syed Miroo was not there. The party waited and after some time they heard a thud on the earth as of someone jumping over a compound wall. They then heard a cough, they repeated the challenge and Syed Miroo came out of the house. I give these details in view of the apparent discrepancy which arises from the evidence of the police constable concerned, Mahomed Subhan, when he states that after arresting Ramsingh he was ordered to go to Miroo's house, when according to the Sub-Inspector a guard had already been posted there. It is thus clear that four of the people brought before the Court were actually arrested before any news of the dacoity had reached the police officers. The remaining three appellants and also Ganpatsingh were arrested on later days.

Some of the stolen property has been recovered from some of the accused. The fact that the dacoity did occur has not been disputed, neither has the identification of the articles recovered as being the property of those who suffered in the dacoities; all that is disputed is the identity of the raiders and their identification by the victims. Property was recovered from Sheikh Hussein, Sherali and Umarkhan in circumstances which make their participation in the dacoity — and it may be noted that they were all identified—positive. An ornament was also recovered from Ganpatsingh, and this I will deal with later. In addition, Sheikh Hussein, Umarkhan and Sherali all made detailed confessions which implicated all of the accused. These confessions were in no way self-exculpatory and tallied in a remarkable degree in wealth of detail. All these three confessions were retracted in the Court of Session. There was also a confession recorded as such, although Ganpatsingh countered the statement, by Ganpatsingh. This may be left out of account as in the circumstances of Ganpatsingh's connexion with the affair the learned counsel appearing for the Crown has very rightly conceded the position contended for by the learned counsel for the appellants that Ganpatsingh's statement cannot be taken into evidence as against them. An attempt was made to argue that no evidence concerning the recovery of the property based on S. 27, Evidence Act, was admissible in view of the Privy Council ruling in A I R 1939 P C 47.[1] It was pointed out to the learned counsel that no fewer than four Judges of this Court including myself have recently held contrary to the interpretation that the learned counsel wished to put on this ruling, and consequently the argument was not pressed.

On the question of the identification principal stress is laid on the fact that the victims mentioned no names until the following afternoon when the Sub-Inspector arrived in the village and written complaints were taken from them which were written out by Gyanu. It is contended that by that time Gyanu must have known the names of the persons who had been arrested and had detailed these to the victims. This argument, however, is based only on supposition, and admittedly there is no evidence whatever to support it, and if it were true and all these identifications were false and prompted by the police and the kamdar, one would have expected the identifications to have included Syed Usman and Syed Miroo who had been arrested as well as those of Abdul Gafoor and Ramsingh. There is, however, no mention of these two persons. Included by name in the written report is also Umarkhan of whom the police knew nothing up to that time, and one of the names mentioned is of a man who was not arrested. This militates against police tutoring. One of the minor details which form the grounds of attack is that Bhiwaji stated that he was so afraid that he went to the Mahar part of the village and hid in Gyanu's house and that therefore he could not have been able to identify Gafoor, whom he says he did, and one Sabjalkhan whom he mentioned in his report, (Ex. P-27). It is clear, however, from his evidence that he is referring to different times. When Sawalaram's house was attacked, he hid near by and identified Gafoor. When the assailants entered his own house, which was the third, Sawalaram's house being the first, it was then that he ran to the Maharpura. There is thus no inconsistency.

The only other point is that Hariba, Sawalaram's servant, who was told to open the door and who was himself beaten, stated in cross-examination that when everything was over, he met his master again who told him that he was struck by thieves but could not recognize them, and that his wife and mother had said the same. It is not very difficult to elicit answers of this kind in cross-examination in the case of villagers like Hariba, and on the evidence of the patel it is apparent that Sawalaram was in no fit condition to give details before Gyanu was sent in to make the preliminary report. I consider that the evidence of identification is acceptable and true, and had there been any tutoring or embellishment on the part of the police, a much more perfect case would have been made out, particularly in respect of two of the accused who had already been arrested and against whom the evidence is less than against the others, namely Syed Usman and Syed Miroo. The evidence against the five people, Abdul Gafoor, Sheikh Hussein, Ramsingh, Umarkhan and Sherali is convincing. All have been identified as participating in the dacoity, property was recovered from three of them, and of those from whom property was not recovered Ramsingh was actually wearing a gunny bag over his head when arrested at 3 o'clock in the morning, and he was dressed like this when identified by Sawalaram; and Abdul Gafoor has been identified by all three victims. In respect of the remaining accused their conviction is dependant on whether the only substantive evidence against them, namely the circumstances of their arrest before the fact that any dacoity had actually been committed was known, can be supported by the confessions of their three co-accused, Sheikh Hussein, Umarkhan and Sherali. A reference has naturally been made to the Full Bench decision in the Judicial Commissioner's Court, Nagpur, in 26 N L R 229,[2] and reliance is placed on the judgment epitomized in the headnote, which runs :

The self-inculpatory confession of an accused implicating his co-accused is not a fact upon which alone the conviction of his co-accused can legally be based. It cannot be said that such a confession, corroborated by other evidence, forms a legal basis for his conviction; for it is not permissible to start with the confession and proceed to enquire how far it receives corroboration from other evidence on record. Where there is other relevant matter implicating the co-accused, the course which the Judge is permitted by S. 30, Evidence Act, to take is to consider the confession along with the said matter and decide after such consideration whether or not conviction is justified.

The problem of course resolves itself into the question of fact whether the evidence against Syed Miroo and Syed Usman is sufficient to form a basis for conviction which would warrant the Court in taking the material appearing in the self-inculpatory confessions of Sheikh Hussein, Umarkhan and Sherali into account against the non-confessing accused therein implicated. Here we have the fact that information was given to the police that certain persons including the two accused Syed Miroo and Syed Usman were to participate in a dacoity that night, and when late at night they were found to be away from their houses and a guard was kept on their houses, they were found attempting to return to them at 3 o'clock in the morning and gave explanations of their absence which were unacceptable. It is urged that this is not enough to form a basis for a conviction and that it is possible that they may have been absent for purposes which they have not chosen to disclose and that these circumstances do not necessarily implicate them in the dacoity which took place. My considered opinion is that the circumstances do form a sufficient basis. Were a stronger basis required connecting them with the dacoity, a basis on which conviction itself would be permissible, then there would be no need of corroboration, or, to use the words of S. 30, Evidence Act, "of taking such confession into consideration," and the provisions of S. 30, Evidence Act, would be rendered otiose. The very existence of this provision postulates that it may be used in cases where the evidence afforded — and some such evidence there must be — lacks the requisite volume and certainty to insure conviction. The facts which have been proved, excluding what appears in the confessions raises a very strong suspicion against these two persons, and that suspicion has been confirmed and made certain by the confessions of their accomplices, confessions in which the accomplices do not exclude their own share in the dacoity.

Next it is urged that these confessions lose their entire force as against these two accused Syed Miroo and Syed Usman because they have been retracted, and the authority given for this proposition is a decision of the Calcutta High Court in 62 Cal 312.[3] In that case the conviction in a jury trial was set aside because inter alia the trying Judge did not in his charge to the jury inform them that when a confession is retracted, it has no value at all as against the co-accused. With the greatest respect I am unable to agree with this exposition of the law. The retraction of a confession may throw doubt either on the truth of it or on the fact that it was voluntarily made, but it certainly does not follow because a confession is retracted that it was either untrue or involuntary, and the truth or voluntariness of a confession operates equally —such a confession being self-inculpatory— in respect of the person who made it and the person implicated therein. The extent to which such a confession operates against another person therein implicated has been discussed in the preceding paragraph. I can see no reason at all to hold that merely because these confessions have been retracted in the Court of Session, they were involuntarily made. The motive for making a self-inculpatory confession (and there is no question that all these three confessions are entirely self-inculpatory) is the very simple one of an expectation of leniency in the matter of sentence, and where a number of people are jointly tried and some have confessed to a Magistrate before the trial and some have not, it is again not unnatural that persons who have made confessions should retract them under pressure and persuasion by their fellows who have not confessed. There is of course ample opportunity for this while parties are under-trial prisoners, and there is nothing to support the statements made by two of these three confessing accused that the confessions were the result of police torture; that indeed is the common reason given and, barring the reason that they had changed their minds and thought better of it and were no longer trying to save their own skins, is the only reason for retracting which the confessing accused could possibly give. I am satisfied that these confessions were voluntary and that a mere allegation to the contrary raises no inherent probability that the confessions were not voluntarily made.

3. ('34) 21 AIR 1934 Cal 853 : 154 I C 273 : 36 Cr L J 485 : 62 Cal 312 : 39 C W N 27, Kashimuddin v. Emperor.

It must then be seen whether the confessions are true. In 62 Cal 312[3] the learned Judges referred in support of the proposition there enunciated to the decision in 38 Cal 559.[4] In that case Jenkins C. J. stated that to place any reliance on retracted confessions against a co-accused would be most unsafe, and referred to 28 Cal 689.[5] But a perusal of the following paragraphs will indicate that the learned Chief Justice disregarded the confessions implicating the co-accused because on examination they were found to be false, and in 28 Cal 689[5] it was not laid down as was laid down in 62 Cal 312[3] that such a confession has no value at all against the co-accused, but only that it should carry practically no weight, which dictum was somewhat modified by the subsequent remark that a very full corroboration would be necessary in such a case.

Now, no doubt when a confession is retracted and the truth of it denied, the person retracting has lied on one occasion or the other, and although in the case before me the retractions are merely in respect of the voluntariness of the statements and there is no express denial of the fact that the confessions were true in substance, it must be presumed that if these accused had been asked by the Magistrate, as they should have been, whether the confessions were false in substance or no, they would have replied in the affirmative. This does not, in my opinion, absolve the Court from examining the question whether the confessions are in fact true or not and, if true, whether they can be taken into consideration along with the other evidence. In the case before me the confessions are given with a wealth of detail in each case, and mutual corroboration which can leave no doubt at all as to their truth. It is to be noted that neither in 28 Cal 689[5] nor in 38 Cal 559[4] is it laid down that no weight at all is to be given to such retracted confessions. I am in respectful agreement with the proposition that such retracted confessions must be used with caution, but when it is possible to come to the conclusion that the confessions cannot be otherwise than true, I consider that they may be taken into consideration in connexion with the evidence appearing in the case, whether they are retracted or no.

In the present case all the three confessions agree as to the distribution of the booty which in the case of property other than cash was so inconsiderable that single ornaments had to be shared by the participants in the dacoity in pairs, and the distribution agrees in each case. There are differences in the confessions in respect of statements as to which persons entered which house in the four visits and the irruptions made into the houses that night, that is, discrepancies which are really no more than omissions except in the case of statements of the people who caught hold of Sawalaram, which bear the mark of truth and honesty and individual and uncollaboratory narrative, and police tutoring would not attempt to produce such detailed narrative on unessential points. On the one point on which they ought to be clear and in agreement and on which agreement is to be expected, namely the division of the spoils, they are in agreement. Where the confessions inspired by the police, the police would have taken care to see that there was equal and meticulous agreement on the question of who were the persons who actually caught hold of Sawalaram when his house was invaded. The result is that I am satisfied that the confessions are true, that they were voluntarily made and that they can be taken into consideration against the accused Syed Miroo and Syed Usman.

Ganpatsingh's case is a peculiar one. There is no doubt that he was the informant who warned the police as the result of which the houses of all the accused who have been arrested, residing in the village, except Sheikh Hussein were watched and their arrests effected. It is also clear that he was told to accompany the dacoits and when he protested against this was told sharply to obey orders and to report at the station house the next morning. The learned Magistrate has found that he betrayed his trust to the extent of retaining some of the stolen property in consequence of which he was arrested, and he has been given the sentence of ten years' rigorous imprisonment as if he had wholeheartedly participated in the dacoity with the others. I am of opinion that Ganpatsingh has been the victim of circumstances in that the Sub-Inspector Pitale who was in charge of the station house and to whom information was given, and at whose orders he accompanied the dacoits, was transferred during the early stages of the investigation. He admits that he was given an ornament which was subsequently recovered from him, and his story is that after the return of the expedition and the booty had been divided he went to the station house but did not find the Sub-Inspector there, so went to his own house, and when sent for the next morning said that he would come later as he was dressing a wound which he had received from a stone during the dacoity. He was then brought to the station house and had left behind the money and the ornament in his own house as he was on his way back from easing himself when the constable met him, and he then related the whole story to the Sub-Inspector. This would be on the morning of the 17th. He was then ill for a day or two, and when he went to the station house again, the Sub-Inspector was not there, a change in officers having taken place. He said he would relate everything to the previous Sub-Inspector, Mr. Pitale. He handed over the money which he had received to the new Sub-Inspector Desasingh, but not the kadola, as in his peculiar position of an informer he did not trust a new man. After he was arrested he had the kadola handed over by his daughter. Now, a good deal of this is confirmed by the prosecution witnesses.

Sub-Inspector Pitale did not investigate the case beyond 20th August and admits directing Ganpatsingh to accompany the dacoits. He admits seeing Ganpatsingh on the following day, namely 17th August, and Ganpatsingh stated to him that he would produce his portion of the stolen property, that is to say, that the police were aware on the next day that their informer had stolen property with him, which would appear to make any deliberate concealment on his part useless. The Sub-Inspector says that he instructed the station-house moharir, Ramsing, to seize the property from Ganpatsingh and also says in cross-examination that he saw Ganpatsingh on the after-noon of the 17th as he was going off to investigate and directed him to hand over the property, if any, to the thana moharir. This phrase, "if any," does not seem to agree with what he stated in cross-examination where he implies that Ganpatsingh had admitted that he had property, and Ramsingh, the moharir, also gives a slightly different version where he states that the station house officer's orders to him were that any property which might be produced by Ganpatsingh should be seized and that as Ganpatsingh did not produce any property he did not do anything more about it. This last portion of the evidence appears to me an excuse for not having recovered the property earlier when they were aware of its existence. Desasingh, the relieving Sub-Inspector, is P. W. 4, and he received orders to take over the investigation on 19th August and he began investigation the following day. He at once began with questioning Ganpatsingh, and after the latter had handed over the money he searched Ganpatsingh's house and arrested him the same day. This was before he had any communication with Sub-Inspector Pitale, from whom he took over, at the scene of the dacoity. On the 25th at Mehkar, Ganpatsingh agreed to produce the property, and they went to his house where the property was produced. The Sub-Inspector Desasingh says he was aware from the thana record that Ganpatsingh was the informer in the case and he arrested him because he had agreed to produce the money and had an injury to his forehead. He admits that Ganpatsingh immediately claimed to be an informer and that he had done what he had under the instructions of Sub-Inspector Pitale; yet he does not remember asking Pitale about this when he met him the next day at Pangri. Neither does he remember if Ganpatsingh's brother Lalsingh (P. W. 5) requested that Sub-Inspector Pitale should be sent for before Ganpatsingh was arrested. He arrested him on his own initiative without consulting his predecessor.

Now, what has weighed heavily with the learned Magistrate in convicting Ganpatsingh is the fact that the kadola was not recovered from him until a week later. It is of course quite possible that owing to the change of Sub-Inspectors, Ganpatsingh might have been under the impression that the new Sub-Inspector would not be aware that he had already told Pitale that he had an ornament in his possession and that he might be left in undisturbed possession of it. On the other hand, it is equally probable that Ganpatsingh, a police informer, who as such leads a precarious existence at the best of times, might well have distrusted a newcomer and considered that he would be endangering himself if he owned that he possessed part of the proceeds of the dacoity without being satisfied that the new Sub-Inspector knew that his predecessor had ordered him to accompany the dacoits, and I think the statement of his brother Lalsingh (P. W. 5) in cross examination to the effect that in the Mehkar lock-up he met Ganpatsingh and said "You are not a thief. You were sent by Pitale. If there is any property with you, give it up," and that Ganpatsingh said "I was sent by Pitale. I cannot trust the other police officers" is true and reasonable. I think it probable that if there had not been this change of controlling officers at the beginning of the investigation, Ganpatsingh would not have been arrested at all. It is admitted by the learned counsel who appears for the Crown that at the most he can only press in respect of Ganpatsingh for a conviction under S. 411, I. P. C. Admittedly Ganpatsingh went with the dacoits in the capacity of a spy, and apparently an unwilling one, as he considered he had done his duty sufficiently to the police in giving the names of the people who were going to commit the dacoity. Having gone with them, he could not without awakening suspicion have declined to receive any share in the booty. It is also apparent that he admitted possession of his share on the following morning. I consider he should be given the benefit of the doubt and acquitted. He is accordingly acquitted and I direct that he be set at liberty forthwith.

There now remains the question of sentence on the other accused. The learned Magistrate appears to have adopted a somewhat unusual principle. He has sentenced the accused to six years rigorous imprisonment on account of the entry into the house of Sawalaram and two years rigorous imprisonment each for the entry into the other houses and directed that the sentences shall run consecutively, making the aggregate to ten years which is the maximum penalty for the offence. The offence so far as Sawalaram's house is concerned does not appear to be any more heinous than that of the entry into the other houses, and it is difficult to see any other reason for this allotment than that the Magistrate desired to pass the maximum sentence and was unable to divide it by three. Further I do not consider that this is a case in which the passing of the maximum sentence permitted by S. 395, I. P. C., was necessary. The dacoity was not accompanied by any particular violence or brutality. The sentences are reduced to five years rigorous imprisonment in each case.

Nathmal Mathuradas Chandak — Appellant

Balkrishna Gangabisan Marwadi — Respondent.

Misc. Appeal No. 140 of 1937, Decided on 20th September 1938, from order of 1st Addl. District Judge, Wardha, D/- 13th January 1937.

(a) Res judicata—Order on execution application to be res judicata on point whether it is "in accordance with law" must be made on merits — Order being ambiguous to be construed in applicant's favour—Order held not res judicata.

If there is a previous order of the Court operating as res judicata which holds that the application under consideration was not made in accordance with law, then clearly that matter cannot be reagitated at a subsequent stage of the execution. But before an order can operate as res judicata, it must clearly decide that the application in question was not in accordance with law. If it merely rejects or dismisses the application on some other ground then there is no decision on the merits and when there is no decision on the merits, there is of course no res judicata. If it is ambiguous whether an order is on merits, then the ambiguity must be construed in favour of the person against whom the order is made. Hence an order "decree-holder absent. Application incorrect. He be awaited for 2nd November 1933," or a subsequent order "decree-holder absent. He has not yet turned up as yet though he was awaited till today. Application is therefore rejected with cost" will not operate as res judicata. [P 153 C 2; P 154 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 21, R. 11 (2) (b)—Order not specifying addresses of judgment-debtors is in accordance with law.

All that O. 21, R. 11 (2) (b) requires is that the names of the parties should be specified in the application. It says nothing about the addresses. An application not specifying addresses of judgment-debtors is, therefore, in accordance with law. [P 154 C 1]

(c) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 21, R. 11 (2) (h) — Execution application showing costs slightly less than those awarded is in accordance with law.

If the decree-holder asks for more costs than are actually due to him, that might be another matter, but when he asks for something less, and the difference is of a trivial character, it cannot be held that the application is so vitiated as to be incapable of execution at all. [P 154 C 2]

(d) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 21, R. 11 (2) (e) — Application not specifying date of payment is in accordance with law.

All that O. 21, R. 11, sub-cl. (e) requires is that the payments made should be specified in the application. It says nothing about the dates of these payments. Therefore application not specifying such dates is in accordance with law. [P 154 C 2]

(e) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 21, Rr. 11 (2) (j), 12 and 13 — Application not showing particulars of moveables to be attached is in accordance with law.

Order 21, R. 11 (2) (j) states nothing about the specification of the property. All that the decree-holder is required to set forth is the mode in which he seeks the assistance of the Court. This mode is sufficiently indicated when he states that he seeks attachment of the moveables of the judgment-debtor. It is clear from O. 21, Rr. 11 and 12 that the Code has drawn a distinction between moveables in the possession of the judgment-debtor and moveables belonging to him but not in his possession and immovable property in his possession. When the Code itself draws such a distinction and does not ask for a list of moveables when they are in the possession of the judgment-debtor, it is impossible to state that an application which does just what the Code requires is not in accordance with law. An application which does not specify particulars of moveable to be attached is, therefore, in accordance with law. [P 155 C 1]

(f) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 100 — Objection that execution application is fraudulent, not raised in first two Courts, must be disallowed in High Court.

An objection raised, in High Court but not raised in either of the Courts below to the effect that the present application for execution is fraudulent in that the decree-holder has suppressed certain particulars with the intention of misleading the Court must be disallowed. [P 155 C 1]

(g) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 100 — Objection that execution application was defective as not mentioning previous application must be disallowed to be raised for first time in second appeal.

An objection taken in High Court but not taken in the Courts below, namely that the present application for execution is defective in that it does not refer to the previous application and also does not mention the results of the previous application to which it refers must be disallowed. [P 155 C 1, 2]

M. R. Indurkar — for Appellant.

A. V. Khare, W. B. Pendharkar, S. P. Gole and K. P. Vaidya — for Respondent.

Order.—The main question here is whether the execution application, dated 14th March 1936, out of which this appeal arises, is within time. That depends upon the construction to be placed upon a previous application, dated 25th October 1933 and upon the two orders, dated 28th October 1933 and 2nd November 1933 passed on it. The first Court held that the application of 25th October 1933 was an application for execution made in accordance with law and that consequently the present application was within time. The lower appellate Court reversed this finding and came to the conclusion that the previous application was not in accordance with law because it did not mention either the place of residence of the judgment-debtor or the correct amount of costs due in execution. Consequently it has thrown out the present application and the decree-holder appeals.

Now I do not think there can be much doubt about the law. Under Art. 182, Limitation Act, an execution application is within time if it is filed within three years from the date of a previous application "made in accordance with law" to the proper Court or within three years of the date of the final order passed on such an application. The question then is whether the application of 25th October 1933 was "made in accordance with law." It has been decided in 31 N L R 126[1] that a liberal construction must be placed upon Art. 182 (5), Limitation Act. The objection of limitation is at all times a technical one and there is no reason why a Court of justice should endeavour to throw out a just claim unless the judgment-debtor can bring himself strictly within the four corners of the technicality upon which he relies. If he is technical, then there is no reason why he should not be met with technicality. Of course, if there is a previous order of the Court operating as res judicata which holds that the application under consideration was not made in accordance with law, then clearly that matter cannot be reagitated at a subsequent stage of the execution. But, before an order can operate as res judicata in the present circumstances, it must clearly decide that the application in question was not in accordance with law. If it merely rejects or dismisses the application on some other ground as, for instance, the non-appearance of the decree-holder, then there is no decision on the merits and when there is no decision on the merits, there is of course no res judicata. This has been decided by a Full Bench of the Judicial Commissioner's Court in 28 N L R 7[2] and also by a single Judge in 31 N L R 333.[3] Therefore what I have to see is whether there was a decision on the merits in respect of the application of 25th October 1933.

The first order passed in connexion with that application is dated 28th October 1933 and is to this effect: "Decree-holder absent. Application incorrect. He be awaited for 2nd November 1933." There is clearly no decision in this order. All it states is that the application is incorrect and therefore the decree-holder be awaited, that is to say, the Judge did not decide the question but made up his mind to await the explanation of the decree-holder and to withhold his decision until he had heard what he had to say. That order therefore clearly does not operate as res judicata in respect of this matter. The next order is dated 2nd November 1933 and is in these terms :

> Decree-holder absent. He has not yet turned up as yet though he was awaited till to-day. Application is therefore rejected with cost.

Here it is clear that the learned Judge has not rejected the application because it was not in accordance with law or because it was incorrect but because though he waited for the decree-dolder to turn up, he did not do so. That is to say the application was dismissed in default. It is unnecessary for me to decide whether a Judge in execution has power to dismiss an application in default or not. What I have to consider at the moment is whether there was a decision on the merits. It is clear from that order that there was not, and consequently it cannot operate as res judicata on this point. At the outside, all that can be urged in connexion with the order of 2nd November 1933 is that it was ambiguous but if that is so, then the ambiguity must be construed in favour of the person against whom the order is made. It would be unjust to place a party at a disadvantage because a Court uses language capable of two meanings. However, as I have said, in my opinion, there is no ambiguity. The application was clearly rejected not because it was incorrect but because the decree-holder did not turn up after he had been given an opportunity to do so. That being so, it is the duty of the Courts now to decide whether the previous application was in accordance with law or not. I fully agree with the learned counsel for the respondent that merely because an application of some sort is put in at a previous stage and nothing more is done about it, that would not serve to operate as a step-in-aid of execution. As I have said the application was attacked in the lower appellate Court on the two grounds set forth above. Two additional grounds were also urged in the arguments before me, namely that though there were repayments the dates of those repayments have not been mentioned in the application and also that the moveable property of which attachment is sought has not been described. I will deal with these objections one by one.

First of all as regards the address of the judgment-debtor all that O. 21, R. 11 (2) (b) requires is that the names of the parties should be specified in the application. It says nothing about the addresses. If this is compared with O. 7, R. 1 dealing with the particulars required in a plaint it will be seen that in the case of a plaint not only is the name of the defendant necessary but also his place of residence. Therefore, if a decree-holder complies precisely with the terms of O. 21, R. 11, it is impossible to say that his application is not in accordance with law, especially when the Code itself draws the distinction to which I have referred between plaints and applications for execution. It may be that in a given case the particulars required by the Code would be insufficient but in that case it is always open either for the Court or for the other side to ask for further and better particulars. The point is that an application which complies strictly with the terms of O. 21, R. 11 cannot be said to be not in accordance with law.

Turning next to the question of costs, this is dealt with in O. 21, R. 11 (2) (h). The amount of costs awarded in the present case amounted to Rs. 16-4-0 and the amount shown was Rs. 14. The question is whether this mistake or inaccuracy is enough to make the application so wrong as to be not in accordance with law. Now, these particulars are required to enable the Court to get on with the execution and to further the ends of justice, so I do not think they should be used in such a way as to frustrate justice. If the decree-holder had asked for more costs than were actually due to him, that might have been another matter, but here when he asks for something less and the difference is of such a trivial character, I find it impossible to hold that the application is so vitiated as to be incapable of execution at all. Therefore, although there has been a slight inaccurary, there has, in my opinion, been a substantial compliance with the provisions in this behalf.

Turning next to the objection about the omission to give the dates of payments all that sub-clause (e) requires is that the payments made should be specified in the application. It says nothing about the dates of these payments. Therefore, as I have said, technicality can be met with technicality and, so long as the requirements of the Code have been complied with, it is impossible to hold that the application is not in accordance with law. The same remarks apply to the objection that the property against which execution is sought has not been specified. As a matter of fact, it has been specified in a general manner. The application asks that the moveable property be attached. It is true it does not state whose moveable property, but since execution is sought against the judgment-debtor alone, it can only mean the moveable property of the judgment-debtor. Therefore, what remains to be determined is whether this property must be particularized. I have no doubt that it is desirable that this should be done and I have no doubt that when it is not done, it will ordinarily be necessary to ask for further and better particulars. But that is not the point. The question is whether the Code requires it in the first instance. All that the clause in question of R. 11 states is :

The mode in which the assistance of the Court is required, whether (i) by the delivery of any property specifically decreed; (ii) by the attachment and sale, or by the sale without attachment, of any property, etc.

It will be noticed that it states nothing about the specification of the property. All that the decree-holder is required to set forth is the mode in which he seeks the assistance of the Court. This mode is sufficiently indicated when he states that he seeks attachment of the moveables of the judgment-debtor. Turning now to Rr. 12 and 13 of O. 21, when the application is for attachment of moveable property belonging to a judgment-debtor but not in his possession, the decree-holder is required to annex to the application an inventory of the property to be attached containing a reasonably accurate description of the same, and so also when an attachment is sought of immovable property, a description of it is required. It is clear then that the Code has drawn a distinction between moveables in the possession of the judgment-debtor and moveables belonging to him but not in his possession and immovable property in his possession. When the Code itself draws such a distinction and does not ask for a list of moveables when they are in the possession of the judgment-debtor, it is impossible to state that an application which does just what the Code requires is not in accordance with law. Consequently, I agree with the first Court that this application was made in accordance with law and disagree with the lower appellate Court. It follows the present application is within time.

An objection was raised in this Court which was not raised in either of the Courts below to the effect that the present application is fraudulent in that the decree-holder has suppressed certain particulars with the intention of misleading the Court. Since no plea of fraud was raised, I decline to allow it to be raised at this stage. Another objection is also taken which was not taken in the Courts below, namely that the present application for execution is defective in that it does not refer to the previous application of 25th October 1933 and also does not mention the results of the previous applications to which it does refer. It is stated that both were necessary under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure. I agree that those details are necessary but they are details which are mere matters of procedure and therefore an omission can be rectified in the course of the proceedings. When the judgment-debtor appeared in this case, the only objection he raised was an objection about limitation and he himself furnished the necessary particulars in respect of the missing application. This was on 4th July 1936. If the present objection had been taken at that stage, the decree-holder could easily have amended his application and the application would then have been within time even if regarded as having been filed on 4th July 1936. Since these objections were not taken at that stage and have been taken for the first time in second appeal, I disallow them. The appeal is allowed. The order of the lower appellate Court is reversed and that of the first Court restored. Execution will now continue. Costs here and in the lower appellate Court will be paid by the respondent. Counsel's fee Rs. 25.

Civil Revn. Nos. 386 and 387 of 1940, Decided on 24th October 1940, for revision of order of Addl. Dist. Judge, Ellichpur, D/- 29th April 1940.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 476 — S. 476 assumes that offence appears to have been committed.

It is not correct to say that only after the Courts have come to a conclusion that an offence of the kind contemplated by S. 476 appears to have been committed they can direct their minds to the next question, namely whether it is expedient in the interests of justice that a prosecution should be launched. The section assumes that an offence appears to have been committed. [P 156 C 2]

(b) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 476 — Decision of lower Courts under Ss. 476 and 476B cannot be interfered with by High Court under S. 115, Civil P. C.

The sum and substance of S. 476 is that before a prosecution can be launched either the first or the appellate Court must be of opinion both that an offence appears to have been committed and that it is expedient to prosecute. If in their opinion either of these elements is absent, then no prosecution can be launched. It is consequently not necessary for these two Courts to deal with both questions when in their opinion the answer to either is in the negative; also they can consider the questions in any order they please. And if they take up those questions or either of them and deal with them judicially and reach a conclusion, then the High Court has no jurisdiction whatever to interfere in revision under S. 115, Civil P. C., however wrong or erroneous the High Court may consider that conclusion to be. [P 157 C 1]

Order. — This order will govern Civil Revision No. 386/40 and Civil Revision No. 387/40. They are directed against the orders of the lower Courts refusing to prosecute the non-applicants for the offences of perjury, forgery and false personation, said to have been committed either in, or in relation to, a proceeding in the first Court. Both Courts hold that there is no reasonable certainty of conviction and that in their opinion it is not expedient in the interests of justice that the prosecution asked for should be launched. The revision here is a civil revision under S. 115, Civil P. C., and I am of opinion that this Court has no jurisdiction to interfere. The matter is governed by Ss. 195, 476 and 476B, Criminal P. C. Under S. 195 no prosecution in respect of these offences can be launched except in the manner provided by S. 476. Section 476 confers the power to prosecute. That power is conferred in the first instance on the Court in which, or in relation to a proceeding in which, the offence or offences appear to have been committed. If that Court refuses to prosecute, then the power is transferred to the appellate Court under S. 476B. Except for these two Courts, no other Court, person or body has power to prosecute, not even the High Court unless it happens to be the appellate Court contemplated by Section 476B.

If therefore the lower Courts consider the matter under Ss. 476 and 476B and come to the conclusion that it is not, in their opinion, expedient in the interests of justice to prosecute, this Court has no power to compel them to do so. The discretion is theirs and theirs alone. The privilege belongs to them and no other person or body or tribunal can usurp it, or substitute its discretion for that of these Courts. They have to be of opinion that it is expedient to prosecute, not anybody else. See as to this a decision of the House of Lords in (1919) 88 L J Ch 287[1] at p. 294 and also 30 N L R 255[2] at p. 257. It is possible that this Court can interfere in revision if the lower Courts do not consider the matter under those sections or if they direct their minds to matters which are foreign to those sections, or if they act arbitrarily or capriciously. In that event, the order could be set aside and the lower Courts could be directed to apply their minds to the only matters material under those sections. But in no event could this Court acting under S. 115 substitute its opinion for that of either the first Court or the appellate Court and direct a prosecution however much it may be of opinion that it is desirable that one should be lauched.

Once the lower Courts consider the questions which arise under S. 476 and deal with the matter on the merits, then however wrong or erroneous their opinions may be, this Court cannot interfere. In no circumstances could, or at any rate in my opinion should, this Court send the case back in a matter of this kind for reconsideration on the same evidence and the same materials, because an order of that kind would be nothing more than a direction to the lower Court to act in accordance with the view of the High Court. In other words, it is tantamount to a direction to the lower Courts to substitute the opinion of the High Court for their opinions. That is something which the Legislature does not allow. It is something which S. 195 read with S. 476 expressly prohibits. The undesirability of remanding cases in such circumstances has been pointed out in 7 Rang 538[3] and stressed by me in 19 N L J 158[4] at p. 160. Coming now to S. 476, the material portion is as follows :

When . . . Court is . . . of opinion that it is expedient in the interests of justice that an inquiry should be made into any offence referred to etc. . . . which appears to have been committed etc. . . .

It is strenuously argued that Courts in such circumstances have to consider first whether an offence appears to have been committed or not, and only after they have come to a conclusion that an offence of the kind contemplated by S. 476 appears to have been committed can they direct their minds to the next question, namely whether it is expedient in the interests of justice that a prosecution should be launched. In my opinion, that is wrong. The section assumes that an offence appears to have been committed. Unless such an assumption were made it would be impossible to ask a Court to direct its mind to considering whether a prosecution should be launched. No Court would prosecute for an offence which does not appear to anybody to have been committed, and it would be idle and foolish to ask it to consider whether in such circumstances it is expedient in the interests of justice to prosecute. The answer is self evident. Of course it is not. The section is dealing with a situation in which the Court has already had the matter before it in another capacity and ordinarily the Judge who presided at that stage will have had an opportunity of considering whether an offence of the kind we are dealing with appears to have been committed. If he indicates at that stage that in his opinion one does appear to have been committed, then clearly it is not necessary either for him or his successor to cover the same ground and all that is left for consideration is whether it is expedient in the ends of justice to prosecute.

If however the Judge in the original proceedings has not expressed an opinion to that effect, then the Court at this stage can either take it for granted that an offence appears to have been committed and state that even assuming that it is not in its opinion expedient to prosecute for reasons given, or it can look into the matter and state that in its opinion no offence appears to have been committed and if it reaches that conclusion, then clearly the only conclusion it can reach on the question of expediency is that in its opinion a prosecution is not expedient. The sum and substance of S. 476 is that before a prosecution can be launched either the first or the appellate Court must be of opinion both that an offence appears to have been committed and that it is expedient to prosecute. If in their opinion either of these elements is absent, then no prosecution can be launched. It is consequently not necessary for these two Courts to deal with both questions when in their opinion the answer to either is in the negative; also they can consider the questions in any order they please. And I repeat again that the opinion has to be their opinion and not the opinion of the High Court in revision. Also, if they take up those questions or either of them and deal with them judicially and reach a conclusion, then the High Court has no jurisdiction whatever to interfere in revision under S. 115, Civil P. C., however wrong or erroneous the High Court may consider that conclusion to be.

In the present case the first Court after setting out the facts and the allegations of the applicant about the commission of the various offences applied its mind to the question of expediency and came to the conclusion that a prosecution would not be likely to succeed and that it was not in the interests of justice to file complaints. The appellate Court went more fully into the matter. In para. 7 of its order, it directed its mind to the question whether there was sufficient material on record to reach a prima facie and definite conclusion that the offences complained of had been committed. It examined the evidence carefully — its order covers 17 typewritten pages—and it reached the conclusion that there is no sufficient material on record which would justify it in taking action under S. 476. It had power to do this. It entertained the matter and exercised jurisdiction. It has acted judicially. Consequently, its conclusions are final and this Court has no jurisdiction to interfere under S. 115, Civil P. C., whether the conclusions are right or wrong. The applications are dismissed with costs. Counsel's fee in Jaikisan's case (C. R. 387/40) Rs. 40, and in Maroti's case (C. R. 386/40) Rs. 35.

Civil Revn. No. 645 of 1937, Decided on 15th March 1938, for revision of order of Sub-Judge, Second Class, Ellichpur, D/- 4th August 1937.

Civil P. C. (1908), O. 21, Rr. 46 and 47 — Judgment-debtor owning share in property in possession of stranger — R. 46 as well as R. 47 comes into operation—Prohibitory orders should be issued not only to judgment-debtor but also to stranger in possession.

Rule 46 must be read with Rr. 43 and 47. Rule 46 applies even if the ownership of the judgment-debtor is fractional instead of being integral. Consequently, where the judgment-debtor owns a share or interest in some property which is in the possession of a stranger, R. 46 as well as R. 47 must come into operation so as to necessitate prohibitory orders being issued not only to the judgment-debtor but also to the stranger who is in possession of the property the judgment-debtor's share in which is intended to be attached. Order. — This is an application in revision against an order passed in execution proceedings (in Miscellaneous Judicial Case No. 24 of 1937) on 4th August 1937. The non-applicant decree-holder attached some quantity of cotton stored in Pandurang Ginning Factory as being the property of his judgment-debtor. The applicant who is judgment-debtor's father objected to the attachment. The lower Court found that the judgment-debtor had a half share in the cotton which alone was liable to be attached and sold. It further held that as a prohibitory notice under R. 47 of O. 21 had not been issued, the attachment was irregular and ordered a notice under R. 47 to be issued to the judgment-debtor. It, however, did not pass any order withdrawing the attachment. On behalf of the objector who feels aggrieved by the lower Court's order, it is urged that the lower Court ought to have held that the attachment had ceased or should have withdrawn the attachment. Reliance is placed on 59 Cal 808.[1] In that case, some moveable property of which the judgment-debtor was supposed to be the full owner was attached under R. 43 of O. 21. On an objection made by a stranger, it was found that the judgment-debtor was only a part owner of the property. The original attachment was therefore set aside and an order was made to issue a notice to the judgment-debtor under O. 21, Rule 47. That case does not afford much guidance for the decision of this case. In the present case the property was in the possession of the objector although it was in the immediate custody of the ginning factory. The question is whether the lower Court was right in issuing a prohibitory order to him under Rule 46 of Order 21.

It is vigorously contended that R. 46 is inapplicable in the circumstances of this case and that the only rule which is relevant is R. 47. I cannot assent to this argument. Rule 46 must be read with Rr. 43 and 47. Rule 43 contemplates a case of attachment of property of which the judgment-debtor is the full owner and in possession. Rule 46 refers to a case where the property of the judgment-debtor is not in his possession but in possession of a third party. Rule 47 relates to a case where the judgment-debtor is not the full owner of the property intended to be attached. Rule 47 is silent as to whether the property should be in possession of the judgment-debtor or not. Rule 46 only says "in the case of other moveable property not in the possession of the judgment-debtor." The other moveable property is the property other than that specified in cls. (a) and (b) of sub-r. (1). It therefore relates to all moveable property which is not in the possession of the judgment-debtor.

It is argued by the learned counsel for the applicant that if the ownership of the judgment-debtor is fractional instead of being integral R. 46 does not apply. I think it ought to apply for this reason : Rule 47 speaks of "share or interest of the judgment-debtor in moveable property" but does not explicitly state whether it refers to property in his possession. In the absence of any express allusion to possession it may well be construed as meaning all moveable property which is in his own possession or in the possession of a stranger. If R. 47 must apply in either case, then in the latter case when his property which takes the form of a fractional interest is in possession of somebody else it must also fall under R. 46 (1) (c) which applies to all cases of moveable property belonging to the judgment-debtor not being in his possession. The person who is in possession of the judgment-debtor's property is in possession of the property as a whole notwithstanding that the judgment-debtor is only a part owner of it.

The position would be elucidated in this way. A judgment-debtor may own X share or interest in property A. When property A is in possession of a stranger the stranger must be taken to be in possession of the whole of property X although from the point of view of the judgment-debtor it is a fractional share. Consequently, where the judgment-debtor owns a share or interest in some property which is in the possession of a stranger, R. 46 as well as R. 47 must come into operation so as to necessitate prohibitory orders being issued not only to the judgment-debtor but also to the stranger who is in possession of the property the judgment-debtor's share in which is intended to be attached. If, as contended for by the learned counsel for the applicant, R. 46 were not to apply to such a case the result would be stultification of the attachment. While the judgment-debtor will have the prohibitory order served on him the property of which the transfer is forbidden will be sold with impunity by the person in whose possession it happens to be. That will defeat the very purpose of the attachment. Such a result could not be intended by the Legislature. I am therefore of the opinion that the lower Court was right in issuing the prohibitory order to the objector who was in possession of the entire quan-

Bhagwan Wallaji Kunbi and another — Judgment-debtors — Respondents.

Misc. Appeal No. 275 of 1939, Decided on 16th December 1940, from order of First Addl. Dist. Judge, Nagpur, D/ 15th September 1939.

(a) C. P. Debt Conciliation Act (2 of 1933), Ss. 9, 8 (2) and 9-A—Signature on statement under S. 9 by creditor's son with his father's authority and consent is valid—Creditor's failure to sign statement under S. 9 is only defect of procedure and can be cured even in appeal — In such case Court should not proceed under S. 8 (2) but should grant time to creditor to remedy defect.

A statement under S. 9 is required to be signed and verified in the manner prescribed by O. 6, Rules 14 and 15, Civil P. C. A plaint must be regarded as having been duly signed within the meaning of O. 6, R. 14 even though the plaintiff's signature is not by plaintiff himself but by some other person duly authorized by the plaintiff. Consequently, a signature on a statement under S. 9 made by the son with the authority and consent of his father must be regarded as a valid signature. The creditor's failure to sign the statement of account is only a defect of procedure which would not be fatal to the statement itself and can be cured even in appeal. The statement under S. 9 (1) would be none the less a statement because of the absence of the creditor's signature. The right procedure for the board in such a case is to give an opportunity to the creditor to rectify the defect and not to deprive him of his civil right by proceeding under S. 8 (2). [P 159 C 2; P 160 C 1, 2]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 16, R. 6—Production of certified copy on behalf of party by other person—Letter of authority is not necessary.

Under O. 16, R. 6 even a witness who is summoned merely to produce a document is deemed to have complied with the summons if he causes such document to be produced instead of attending personally to produce the same. A letter of authority for the production of a certified copy of a public document like a final decree in favour of the person producing it on behalf of the party is altogether unnecessary. Judgment. — This is plaintiff's appeal from the order passed by the first Additional District Judge, Nagpur, in Miscellaneous Appeal No. 35 of 1939 passed on 15th September 1939. The appellant obtained a final decree on a mortgage on 14th August 1937 and got the decree transferred to the Collector for the mortgaged property being sold. Pending those proceedings the respondents applied to the Debt Conciliation Board for settlement of their debts. Notices in usual course were issued to various creditors calling upon them to submit statements. The case was fixed before the Board for hearing on 14th July 1938. On that day the appellant's son by name Daulatram who was also a duly authorized agent filed a statement of accounts signed and verified by himself. On that day the other creditors were absent and failed to submit their statements with the result that their debts were declared to have been discharged. The statement filed by Daulatram however was apparently accepted without any objection and he was asked to file a certified copy of the final decree on 19th September 1938. On that day Daulatram tendered a certified copy of the final decree; curiously enough, the Board refused to accept the certified copy through him as he had no letter of authority from the creditor, and further declared the appellant's debt to have been discharged as the statement of account filed on behalf of the appellant had not been signed by him personally. Both the Courts below have concurred in the view that the statement filed on behalf of the appellant not having been signed by him personally was not a statement such as would fall within the purview of S. 9 (1), Debt Conciliation Act, and that consequently the Debt Conciliation Board was right in declaring the debt under S. 8 (2) to have been duly discharged.

I have no doubt that the Courts below have taken an erroneous view of the law. Section 9, Debt Conciliation Act, requires that the creditor should submit a statement of his debts. That statement is required to be signed and verified in the manner prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, for signing and verifying the same. That means that the statement of debts should conform to the procedure relating to pleadings as laid down in Rr. 14 and 15 of O. 6, Civil P. C., which requires the pleadings to be signed and verified. So far as the verification is concerned it can be done by any person proved to the satisfaction of the Court to be acquainted with the facts of the case. As regards the signing of the pleading it is provided in R. 14 that where a party pleading is by reason of absence or any other good cause unable to sign the pleading, it may be signed by any person duly authorized by him to sign the same or to sue or defend on his behalf. It was pointed out in 22 ALL 55[1] that the mere fact that the plaint in a suit has not been signed by the plaintiff or by any person duly authorized by him in that behalf does not necessarily make the plaint absolutely void. The signing and verification of pleadings is not a matter of substance but of procedure only: see 40 ALL 147,[2] also Mulla's Civil Procedure Code, p. 541. The omission by a party to sign his pleadings is a defect which can be cured even in appeal. It is therefore clear that the appellant's failure to sign the statement of account was only a defect of procedure which would not be fatal to the statement itself. The statement under s. 9 (i), Debt Conciliation Act, would be nonetheless a statement because of the absence of the creditor's signature.

In the present case the statement was signed by Daulatram who held the power of attorney from his father to sign and verify pleadings. He was moreover a member of the joint family along with his father and was virtually a party to the proceeding. Consequently, his signature would be as good as the signature made by his father. Moreover, he signed the statement under the direction of his father. It is evident that the irregularity was of the flimsiest kind. My attention is invited to 1939 N L J 171.[3] That was a case of absence of verification and is not apposite. In I L R (1939) Nag 515[4] the Division Bench held that a plaint should be regarded as having been duly signed within the meaning of O. 6, R. 14, Civil P.C., even though the plaintiff's signature is not by plaintiff himself but by some other person duly authorized by the plaintiff. Following this view it must be held that the signature made by Daulatram with the authority and consent of his father was a valid signature. In fact the Board itself already accepted it without any objection on the day on which it was submitted. On 19th September 1938, they refused to accept the certified copy of the final decree tendered by one Daulatram on the ground that he held no letter of authority from the creditor. Possibly if he had letter of authority and the certified copy of the final decree had been accepted on that day the Board might not have turned their attention to the nominal irregularity in the statement. Under O. 16, R. 6, even a witness who is summoned merely to produce a document is deemed to have complied with the summons if he causes such document to be produced instead of attending personally to produce the same. A letter of authority for the production of a certified copy of a public document like a final decree was altogether unnecessary.

In my opinion when the statement as required by S. 9 (1) was actually filed, the debt to which the statement referred could not be declared to have been discharged under S. 8 (2). It may be conceded that S. 9A should be read along with S. 9 (1) in construing sub-s. (2) of S. 8, but S. 9A simply lays down a rule of procedure. Any defect of procedure cannot affect the substance of a party's claim. The Board exceeded their jurisdiction in making the declaration that they did under S. 8 (2), Debt Conciliation Act, in the face of the statement which they had actually received, a statement which was sound in substance though defective in form. The right procedure for the Board was to have given an opportunity to the appellant to rectify the defect and not to deprive him of his civil right. As the Debt Conciliation Board had no jurisdiction to declare the debt due on the final decree obtained by the appellant as having been duly discharged, their order under S. 8 (2), Debt Conciliation Act, must be pronounced to be void and of no effect. The lower appellate Court's order is set aside. It is however directed that the final decree proceedings will be stayed for a month to give an opportunity to the respondents to apply to the Debt Relief Court under S. 6, Central Provinces and Berar Relief of Indebtedness Act, 1939. As however the appellant was in default in not having submitted his statement in proper form, it is just and reasonable that he should bear the costs of these proceedings in all Courts.

VIVIAN BOSE J.

Palia Harcharanlal Palia Thakurdas Brahmin — Appellant

v.

Raja Hirdesingh Ju Deo Raja Prahlad Singh Rajgond — Respondent.

Misc. Appeal No. 275 of 1937, Decided on 17th October 1938, from order of Addl. Dist. Judge, Narsinghpur, D/- 21st July 1937.

C. P. Debt Conciliation Act (2 of 1933), S. 2 (e) — Words "recoverable as an arrear of land revenue" mean debt recoverable in conceivable circumstances as land revenue—Nature of debt must be looked to — Compromise decree in suit for arrears of thekajama in proprietor's favour is excluded from purview of S. 2 (e).

The words "recoverable as an arrear of land revenue" in S. 2 (e) must be given their ordinary English meaning, that is to say, must be treated as words of description describing what could conceivably happen. Hence the definition in S. 2 (e) means that if the debt could be recovered in conceivable circumstances as an arrear of land revenue, then it is excluded from the definition. The nature of the debt, and not the point of time or the remedy for the recovery of the debt as land revenue under S. 157, C. P. Land Revenue Act, has to be looked to. A compromise decree passed in a suit for thekajama in favour of the proprietor is therefore excluded from the definition in S. 2 (e).

K. B. Tare — for Appellant.
M. N. Jog — for Respondent.

Judgment. — The appellant is the protected thekedar of mouza Piparia and the respondent is the proprietor. The respondent sued the appellant for a certain sum of money due to him as the thekajama for the year 1930-31. The suit was compromised on 7th July 1933 and it was agreed that Rs. 500 was to be paid with future interest in annual instalments of Rs. 100 each. After the respondent had obtained a decree, the appellant went to the Debt Conciliation Board and included this debt for conciliation. The respondent declined to accept the agreement and so a certificate was granted to the appellant under S. 15 (1), Debt Conciliation Act. It is dated 20th May 1936. The question now is whether the respondent can execute his decree or not. It is urged on his behalf that the Debt Conciliation Board had no power to take cognizance of the debt in suit because it is excluded from the definition of 'debt' given in S. 2 (e) of the Act. That definition states that :

Debt includes all liabilities owing to a creditor in cash or kind, secured or unsecured, payable under a decree or order of a civil Court or otherwise ..... but shall not include ..... anything recoverable as an arrear of land revenue.

The question is whether the debt in suit is covered by the exclusion or not. There can be no doubt that arrears of thekajama are recoverable as arrears of land revenue provided certain steps are taken and provided they are taken within a certain time. The relevant provision of law is S. 157, Land Revenue Act. Under that section if the application is made to the requisite revenue officer and if it is made within six months, then the arrears of thekajama can be recovered as arrears of land revenue, but not otherwise. It is therefore argued on behalf of the appellant that at all relevant times the debt in suit was not recoverable as arrears of land revenue and therefore does not fall within the exclusion referred to in S. 2 (e). It seems to me that such an interpretation would lead to difficulties. It would mean that a debt which remains identical throughout may at one stage be covered by the exclusion and at another not. Consider this case. A debtor applies to the Debt Conciliation Board and includes among his debts arrears of thekajama which at the date of the application are less than six months old. According to the definition that debt will be recoverable as an arrear of land revenue provided the requisite steps are taken. What is the Debt Conciliation Officer then to do? Is he to wait and see whether these steps will be taken in due course or is he to ascertain the intention of the creditor as to whether he intends to avail himself of the summary remedy provided by S. 157 or whether he intends to choose the more dilatory course of civil proceedings ? Or again, let us assume that the Debt Conciliation Officer comes to the conclusion that the summary remedy is the one which the creditor has in view and therefore excludes this debt from the conciliation. Then for some reason or other, the creditor instead of applying under S. 157 brings a civil suit. What is to happen ? Is he to be allowed to proceed with that civil suit because no certificate has been given under S. 15 (1), or what ?

It seems to me that the only way of avoiding these difficulties and the anomaly of having the self-same debt considered at one stage to be recoverable as an arrear of land revenue and at another not, is by giving the words "recoverable as an arrear of land revenue" their ordinary English meaning, that is to say, to treat them as words of description describing what could conceivably happen. Looked at from this point of view, the definition means that if the debt could be recovered in conceivable circumstances as an arrear of land revenue, then it is excluded from the definition. We are not then to look to the point of time, or to the remedy, but to the nature of the debt, and that is what, in my opinion, the definition aims at. Looked at from that point of view, it is clear, as the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court holds that this debt falls within the exclusion. It follows that the Debt Conciliation Officer had no power to include it within the purview of his proceedings. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs. Counsel's fee Rs. 25.

Appeal No. 328 of 1937, Decided on 5th October 1939, from appellate decree of 4th Addl. Disttrict Judge, Nagpur, D/- 17th April 1937.

Deed—Construction — Sale deed — Subject-matter of sale particularly described — That description cannot be varied by subsequent statement in ambiguous form of boundary lines on one side.

Where the subject-matter which is conveyed is particularly described in the deed of conveyance that description cannot be varied by a subsequent statement in an ambiguous form of boundary lines on one side. [P 163 C 2]

In a sale deed the description of the property sold was as follows : "One tiled simple house . . . . and there is courtyard behind . . . . . In this there are a pacca latrine and a water pipe. Length of all this is 33 feet south north and breadth 18 feet east west. This land together with the site, superstructure and the land within the boundary limits. . . . Boundaries of this (are as follows) : On the east there is a lane of three feet and a half as also a Sawari bungalow":

Held that what was conveyed was a courtyard that was 18 feet wide. The fact that it was stated that on the east there was a lane of 3½ feet as also a Sawari bungalow was not sufficient in law to cut down the grant so as to vary the parcel conveyed to a site not 18 feet wide but 14 feet wide : (1905) 2 Ch 164, Rel. on. [P 163 C 1]

This land together with the site, superstructure and the land within the boundary limits. . . . Boundaries of this (are as follows) : On the east there is a lane of three feet and a half as also a Sawari bungalow . . . . . .

In point of fact the house is 14 feet wide and to the east there is a lane or passage way varying in width 4 to 5 feet, and on the east of that there is the Sawari bungalow. The dispute is about the right to the lane. If the description is read as being substantially the sale of a site 18 feet wide then the passage way except for a few inches at one end passes and the defendant wins this case. If, on the other hand, it is taken that the eastern boundary is this passage way or lane then the lane is excluded from the conveyance and the plaintiff wins. A good deal of argument has been addressed to me showing that this is an ambiguous document and that therefore it is necessary to look to extrinsic facts in order to ascertain its true meaning. I am, however, of the opinion that the view expressed in Dart on Vendors and Purchasers, Vol. II (Edn. 8), p. 865, would apply here. There the learned editors are concerned with the case in (1866) L R 1 H L 222[1] and particularly Lord Westbury's dissenting view that the construction of a plan, which will be treated as part of the deed was matter of law, so long only as its accuracy was unimpeached; being proved to be inaccurate, it became a question of fact what parcels were comprised in the lease; for it did not follow that, because the boundary line was drawn from the north-east corner of the house as incorrectly represented on the plan, it would have been drawn from the same point, if the true site of the house had been shown.

In that case Lord Westbury observed :

. . . . . the question here is not one of the interpretation of the deed itself, or even of the construction of the description of the parcels, but of the inference to be derived from a map as to the relative position of two objects, one of which was proved to be erroneously laid down. As soon as that proof was admitted, it became obvious that the true position in nature of the thing erroneously laid down, and the true relative position of the adjoining objects, must both be ascertained by external evidence.

That he came to the conclusion was a question for the jury and not a matter of law depending upon the construction of the deed. But quite apart from external evidence which goes to show that the vendor under the sale deed was himself a purchaser under another sale deed which described this property in a way to show that it was 18 feet wide and bounded on the east by the Sawari bungalow it seems to me that as a matter of construction the sale deed contains a prior description which is particular and which is not cut down by a general description as to boundaries. In (1905) 2 Ch 164[2] at pp. 174 and 175 the following observation is to be found :

I cannot . . . . . agree with the learned Judge that the present case is one in which the undoubted rule that, when you have in the words of description a sufficiently certain definition of what is conveyed, inaccuracy of dimensions or of plans as delineated will not vitiate or affect that which is there sufficiently defined, applies, because the description itself is a description of a piece of land situate on the seashore of certain dimensions which are set forth. Those dimensions, in my opinion, are not an addition to something which has already been certainly described, but are part and parcel of the description itself. The words are not an inaccurate statement of a quality of that which had already been certainly described or defined, but are part and parcel of that description or definition. The dimensions in this case, to use the words appearing on p. 247 of Sheppard's Touchstone, are an essential part of the description and not a cumulative description in a case in which there is in the first place a sufficient certainty and demonstration.

Thus what is described and defined as the subject-matter of the sale is a site on which there is a house, a wall, and a compound, and that that site is 18 feet wide. One in point of fact finds that there is in that locality a site belonging to the vendor on which there is a house, a wall and a courtyard that is 18 feet wide. It seems to me that what is conveyed is therein described and the fact that it is stated that on the east there is a lane of 3½ feet as also a Sawari bungalow is not sufficient in law to cut down the grant so as to vary the parcel conveyed to a site not 18 feet wide but 14 feet wide : see also (1883) 22 Ch D 177[3] at p. 181, where Jessel, M. R., observed :

Then it is described as bounded on the east by (inter alia) the defendant's property. But this general description of the boundaries does not cut down the effect of the prior description. When after a description of a property it is stated that on one side it is bounded by a certain other property, and it appears that it is not so bounded for every inch, there is an inaccuracy in the statement of the boundary, but this is not enough to exclude what is not so bounded if it appears from the evidence to have been part of the property dealt with, and the previous description of that property is sufficient to include it.

Here it should be borne in mind that if the eastern boundary was a lane the statement of the boundary as also a Sawari bungalow is entirely meaningless. In fact, it was argued by Mr. Kulkarni for the respondent that these two words were mere surplusage. On the other hand it is to be observed if the description is followed out completely, that is to say, if full value is given to the words "breadth 18 feet east to west" that this carries to the Sawari bungalow for three-quarters of the length of the lane where the lane is 4 feet wide and the house is 14 feet wide and it does leave as the eastern boundary a part of the lane for the other quarter of the total length. I do not however rely on this point because it is one that has clearly not been in the mind of any of the parties to this transaction or to this case. But I rely upon the decision in (1905) 2 Ch 164[2] above mentioned and hold that as a matter of construction this is a case where the subject-matter is particularly described and that that description cannot be varied by a subsequent statement in an ambiguous form of boundary lines on one side. The appeal is accordingly allowed and the suit is dismissed with costs.

Jankilal Raghunath Rai Agarwal and others — Applicants

v.

Deputy Commissioner, Bilaspur, and another — Non-applicants.

Civil Revision No. 256 of 1940, Decided on 13th February 1941, to revise order of Addl. Dist. Judge, Bilaspur, D/- 10th February 1940.

(a) C. P. Land Alienation Act (2 of 1916), S. 9 (1) (2) and (3) and Ss. 3, 1 (2) and (3) and 25 (2) — Date of commencement of Act in S. 9 (1) and (2) refers to date fixed under S. 1 (3)—Mortgage by conditional sale by Kanwar of Bilaspur in 1926 — Notifications under Ss. 1 (2) and 3 making Act applicable to Bilaspur and declaring Kanwars to be aboriginals issued in 1933—Subsequently on foreclosure decree being made absolute mortgagee put in possession—S. 9 does not apply—Deputy Commissioner cannot apply under S. 25 (2) of the Act.

The date of the commencement of the Act in S. 9 (1) and (2) refers to the date fixed under S. 1 (3), i. e., 15th April 1917. [P 165 C 2]

A Kanwar of Bilaspur tahsil mortgaged his village share by conditional sale in 1926. In 1933 notifications under Ss. 1 (2) and 3 were issued making the Act applicable to the Bilaspur tahsil and declaring the Kanwars to be aboriginal tribes for the purposes of the Act. Subsequently, the mortgagee enforced his mortgage by a suit and, on the making of the foreclosure decree absolute, was put in possession :

Held that S. 9 (1) did not affect the mortgage because it was not a mortgage made by a member of an aboriginal tribe after the commencement of the Act, since, when the mortgagor made it, he was not a member of an aboriginal tribe, nor did S. 9 (2) affect it because it was not a mortgage made by a member of an aboriginal tribe before the commencement of the Act, since it was not made before the commencement of the Act and therefore S. 9 (3) did not apply. Consequently, the Deputy Commissioner had no authority to apply under S. 25 (2) for revision of the mortgage decree. [P 165 C 2]

(b) C. P. Land Alienation Act (2 of 1916), S. 25 (3) — Right of revision under S. 25 (3) is not reserved to Deputy Commissioner alone but is open to any party aggrieved.

The right of revision under S. 25 (3) is not reserved to the Deputy Commissioner alone but is open to any other aggrieved party. Section 25 (3) is merely an enabling provision and removes any doubt whether the Deputy Commissioner as an outsider to the litigation could apply for revision. [P 165 C 2; P 166 C 1]

Order. — The following dates are necessary to be stated in order to understand this revision application. On 15th April 1917 the Central Provinces Land Alienation Act (II of 1916) came into force. On 3rd August 1926 one Madan Singh, a Kanwar by caste, mortgaged his village share by conditional sale to the present applicants. On 14th November 1933 the Local Government published two notifications under Ss. 1 (2) and 3, Central Provinces Land Alienation Act, (II of 1916), making the Act applicable to the Bilaspur tahsil of the Bilaspur district and declaring the Kanwars to be aboriginal tribes for the purposes of the said Act. In 1936 the mortgagees brought an action on their mortgage against the non-applicant Madan Singh. On 1st October 1936 the applicants obtained a preliminary decree in this suit. On 7th February 1938 the foreclosure decree was made absolute. On 7th April 1938 possession was delivered to the mortgagees applicants. On 15th September 1938 mutation of their names was effected in the revenue records. On 7th December 1938 the Deputy Commissioner made an application under S. 25 (2) of the Act to the Additional District Judge. Section 25 (2) provides as follows:

When it appears to the Deputy Commissioner that any Civil Court has, after the commencement of this Act, passed a decree or order contrary to any of the provisions thereof, the Deputy Commissioner may, within two months of the date upon which he is informed of such decree or order, apply for the revision of such decree or order to the Court, if any, to which an appeal would lie from such decree or order, or in any other case to the High Court and if the Court finds that such decree or order is contrary to any of the provisions of this Act, it shall alter it so as to make it consistent with this Act.

The Additional District Judge has found that the foreclosure decree is contrary to the provisions of the Act and he has accordingly set it aside and has referred the case to the Deputy Commissioner under S. 9 (3) of the Act. Against this order the present revision application has been made. Section 3 of the Act empowers the Chief Commissioner, now the Provincial Government, to declare by notification what bodies of persons in any area are to be deemed aboriginal tribes for the purposes of the Act and a notification under that section was published on 14th November 1933. Accordingly at the date when the mortgage deed was executed the mortgagor did not belong to an aboriginal tribe and therefore there was no obstacle in the way of the present applicants accepting the mortgage. A mortgage is considered by the Act to be a temporary alienation of land and S. 6 of the Act enumerated the kinds of mortgage which a member of an aboriginal tribe may enter into. A mortgage by conditional sale, which is the form of a mortgage with which the parties to this case are concerned, is not one of these. Accordingly, at the date of the execution of the mortgage, the mortgagor was free to execute such a mortgage without any restriction. The Additional District Judge has held that, since the suit was commenced after a notification had made the mortgagor a member of an aboriginal tribe, the Court had no jurisdiction to pass a foreclosure decree and therefore the Deputy Commissioner was entitled to make this application under S. 25 (2). Section 9 of the Act provides as follows:

9. (1) If, after the commencement of this Act, a member of an aboriginal tribe makes a mortgage of his land in any manner or form not permitted by or under this Act, the Deputy Commissioner shall have authority to revise and alter the terms of the mortgage as to bring it into accordance with such form of mortgage permitted by or under this Act as the mortgagee appears to him to be equitably entitled to claim.

(2) If a member of an aboriginal tribe has, before the commencement of this Act, made a mortgage of his land in which there is a condition intended to operate by way of conditional sale, the Deputy Commissioner shall have authority to put the mortgagee to his election whether he will agree to the said condition being struck out, or will accept, in lieu of the said mortgage, a mortgage in form (a) as provided by S. 6, sub-s. (1), which shall be made for such period not exceeding the period permitted by the said section and for such sum of money as the Deputy Commissioner considers to be equitable.

(3) If a suit is instituted in any civil Court on a mortgage to which sub-s. (1) applies, or if a suit for the enforcement of a condition intended to operate by way of conditional sale in a mortgage, made before the commencement of this Act, is instituted or is pending at the commencement of this Act, in any civil Court, or if an appeal in any such suit is instituted or is pending at the commencement of this Act, the Court shall, if it finds that the mortgage is enforceable or that the mortgagee is entitled to a decree absolute for foreclosure, refer the case to the Deputy Commissioner with a view to the exercise of the power conferred by subss. (1) and (2) respectively.

It is necessary therefore to interpret S. 9 in order to see whether S. 25 (2) applies. On behalf of the non-applicants the learned Advocate-General has argued that since under Ss. 1 (2) and 3 of the Act the Act is to "extend only to such areas of the Central Provinces as the Provincial Government may, from time to time, notify in this behalf in the official gazette" and Government may notify what persons are to be deemed to be aboriginal tribe, the Act came into force in Bilaspur for members of the Kanwar community on 14th November 1933. Therefore it is argued that the mortgage in question had been made before the Act came into force and so under S. 9 (2) the Deputy Commissioner had authority to take action thereunder and under sub-s. (3) the Court was required to refer the case to the Deputy Commissioner in order that he might take action under sub-s. (2) and accordingly under S. 25 (2) the Deputy Commissioner was entitled to apply to the Additional District Judge for revision of the decree as being contrary to the provisions of the Act. To this the applicants reply that S. 9 (2) does not apply because the words "before the commencement of the Act" mean before 15th April 1917, which was the date when it came into force as is made clear by S. 1 (3) which says that the Act "shall come into force on such day as the Provincial Government may, by notification, direct", and it is also argued that S. 9 (1) does not apply because the mortgage was not made by a member of an aboriginal tribe, Kanwars not being aboriginal tribe on the date of the mortgage. Consequently, if neither S. 9 (1) nor S. 9 (2) applies, then S. 9 (3) cannot apply so as to require the civil Court to refer the case to the Deputy Commissioner and consequently the decree which the civil Court has passed is not contrary to any of the provisions of the Act and so the Deputy Commissioner has no right to apply under sub-s. (2) of S. 25. The question is which of these contentions is correct.

Apart from the notification under S. 1 (3) as to the date when the Act was to come into force the Act envisages two kinds of notifications by the Government which may take place at any time thereafter : (1) a notification under S. 1 (2) as to the areas to which the Act is to extend and (2) a notification under S. 3 as to the bodies of persons who are deemed aboriginal tribes for the purposes of the Act. If the provisions of S. 3 had been incorporated in S. 1 (2) so as to read that the Act should extend to such areas and to such bodies of persons as the Government might notify, then there would have been more force in the learned Advocate General's argument and it would have been possible to hold that S. 1 was intended to be read as a whole and that reading sub-ss. (2) and (3) together therefore the Act would only come into force for the areas and tribes affected from the time of the notification, but as it is, S. 3 being an entirely separate section from S. 1 with the defining S. 2 coming between, I can only hold that the expressions "after the commencement of this Act" and "before the commencement of this Act" in S. 9 refer to the date fixed under S. 1 (3). It is not correct to say therefore that the Act commenced for the Kanwar tribe on the date that they were notified to be aboriginal tribes. Consequently, it follows that if the commencement of the Act in S. 9 refers to the date promulgated under S. 1 (3), S. 9 does not affect the mortgage in this case at all. It was not a mortgage made by a member of an aboriginal tribe after the commencement of the Act, since, when the mortgagor made it, he was not a member of an aboriginal tribe, and so sub-s. (1) does not affect it; and it was not a mortgage made by a member of an aboriginal tribe before the commencement of the Act, because it was not made before the commencement of the Act. Therefore, under S. 9 (3), the civil Court was not required to refer the case to the Deputy Commissioner. It is true that the civil Court should under S. 25 (1) have sent to the Deputy Commissioner a copy of the decree in this suit, but that decree would not have been contrary to any of the provisions of the Act and consequently the Deputy Commissioner had no authority to apply under sub-s. (2) of S. 25 for revision of the decree.

It is not necessary in view of the above finding to consider other points raised by the applicants as to whether the Deputy Commissioner's application was within time or not. In any case, these grounds are not seriously pressed and the lower Court's reasoning for holding the application to be within time appears to be sound. One other point has been argued by the learned Advocate-General with which it is necessary to deal. It is said that no revision lies here since S. 25 (3) of the Act gives a right of applying for revision to the Deputy Commissioner and not to any other aggrieved party. I do not think there is any force in this contention. Sub-section (3) appears to be merely an enabling provision so as to remove any doubt whether the Deputy Commissioner, as an outsider to the litigation, could apply for revision. If the Legislature had intended to reserve a right of revision to the Deputy Commissioner alone nothing could have been easier than to say that the decision of the appellate Court under sub-s. (2) would be final and no revision would lie therefrom except for the Deputy Commissioner in the event of his application under sub-s. (2) being rejected.

It follows that the lower Court's order setting aside the decree is illegal and must itself be set aside. The application of the Deputy Commissioner is accordingly rejected. Costs of this application and of the application to the Court below will be paid by Madan Singh. I allow Rs. 50 as counsel's fee in this Court.

W. B. Pendharkar and A. V. Khare — for Applicant.

Order. — This is an application for revision against an order passed by the lower Court on 20th November 1939 discharging defendants 2 to 9 from the suit. In the application for revision counsel for the applicant prayed that this Court may be pleased to set aside the finding and the order of discharge and to send the case back for further trial and for passing if possible a decree against the defendants and it was also prayed in the alternative that assuming that no revision lay this petition might be accepted by way of appeal and justice be done to the plaintiff as prayed. This led the office of this Court to see as to whether an application for revision lay or it should be treated as an appeal. The application was also accompanied by a copy of the judgment and decree. That judgment showed that after discharging defendants 2 to 9 from the array of the defendants the Court proceeded to decide the case against the defendant against whom the suit was tenable and decreed the claim against him. The office note suggests that as a decree has been passed in the case it is open to the applicant to agitate the question regarding the discharge of the other defendants in an appeal which can be filed by him against the decree that has been passed and in that view it was suggested that the revision application that has been filed was not tenable. The office also wanted a decision from the Court as to whether this application should be treated as a revision or an appeal. If it is treated as an appeal, the office is of opinion, that it is not properly stamped. Counsel for the applicant urged before me as this is an application against an order discharging the defendants the order must be treated as one passed under O. 1, R. 10, and as no appeal is provided for such an order an application for revision is tenable. He relied upon A I R 1926 Nag 75[1] and 29 ALL 325[2] and some other All India Reporter cases in support of his contention.

I think it proper to decide first the question as to whether the office is right in stating that the question that is being raised in the application could be raised by the applicant in an appeal against the decree that has been passed against defendant 1. I think this is not correct. The judgment and decree of the Court below do not contain any adjudication regarding the liability of defendants 2 to 9 who were discharged by a separate order passed by the Court. The decree in the case which has been actually drawn up is a decree which can be said to be adjudicating the questions as between the plaintiff on the one hand and defendant 1 on the other only. In an appeal from such a decree it was not possible for the plaintiff applicant to have raised the contention regarding the liabilities of defendants 2 to 9. Bose J. in A I R 1938 Nag 233[3] has very clearly shown that such a question could not have been raised in an appeal against such a decree which adjudicated the rights of defendant 1 only.

1. ('26) 13 AIR 1926 Nag 75: 89 I C 331, Shanker Rao v. Raghunathrao.
2. ('07) 29 All 325 : 1907 A W N 68, Raghubans Puri v. Jyotis Swarupa.

This leaves me to decide as to whether the present application for revision should be registered as an application for revision or as a memorandum of appeal. This in its turn depends upon the construction of the order which has been passed. It may be an order under O. 1, R. 10, Civil P. C., but I find from the body of the order that the Court ordered the discharge of defendants 2 to 9 from the case as there was no cause of action against them and the Court has given its reasons for coming to the conclusion as to how there was no cause of action against these defendants. Such an adjudication will fall within the definition of a decree as given in S. 2 (2), Civil P.C. That is a formal expression of an adjudication which so far as regards the Court expressing it conclusively determines the rights of the parties with regard to all or any of the matters in controversy in the suit. As it is a decree it has to be appealed against if it is intended to be challenged. In Mulla's Civil Procedure Code, p. 477, this point is made clear and it is stated that where the name of a defendant is struck out under O. 1, R. 10, Civil P. C., on the ground that the plaint does not disclose any cause of action against him, the order operates as a decree and is appealable as such. Cases relied on are 42 Mad 219[4] and 53 ALL 466.[5] The Judicial Commissioner's Court, Nagpur, also has taken a similar view in 26 N L R 24[6] and Bose J. in A I R 1938 Nag 233[3] had followed 26 N L R 24[6] in preference to A I R 1926 Nag 75.[1] I am of opinion that this application for revision must be treated as a memorandum of appeal and should be laid before the Division Bench for further decision regarding court-fee and other matters.

Order. — The applicant to this revision is the wife of the non-applicant. She applied in the lower Court to have her husband declared an insolvent on the ground that he owes her Rs. 586-4-0 for her dower and that he is fraudulently disposing of his immovable property in order to defraud her of her claim. The dower is deferred and both the lower Courts hold that it does not constitute a "debt" within the meaning of Section 9 (1) (b), Provincial Insolvency Act, because deferred dower is not payable till death or divorce neither of which has occurred. Only two cases touch the question directly. They are 52 ALL 560[1] and 50 I C 774.[2] In both, the ground of decision is that as deferred dower is not payable till death or divorce it is not possible to place a present value on the debt, and the latter decision adds that if the wife dies without leaving any heirs it may never be claimable at all. I am unable with respect to assent to either of these reasons. The interest of the wife is a vested and not a contingent one. It is not liable to be displaced by the happening of any event, not even her own death because her heirs can claim the money if she dies : see Tyabji's Muhammadan Law, Edn. 3, p. 176. The difference between vested and contingent remainders in English law will neatly illustrate the point. If land is granted to A for life, remainder to B for life, B's estate is vested even though if B dies before A, it will never come into possession. But if land is granted to A, a bachelor for life, and after his death to B's eldest son, the remainder to the eldest son is contingent because A may never have a son.

In my opinion the wife's interest is a vested one. And as to the other reason given, namely that the wife may die without heirs, that is a contingency which is likely to happen in the case of every future interest, whether it be vested or contingent, whether a loan or a mortgage or a promissory note or any other kind of liability payable at a future date. In point of fact the Provincial Insolvency Act contemplates contingent liabilities. Section 34 (2) speaks of "all debts and liabilities, present or future, certain or contingent." What we have to construe here are the words used in S. 9 (1) (b), Provincial Insolvency Act : "the debt is a liquidated sum payable either immediately or at some certain future time." There is, in my opinion, no doubt that a debt of this kind is a liquidated sum. We know its extent and we know that the sum will not vary whether it is paid today or 20 or 50 years hence. There is no question of interest and no question of discount. All we have to consider therefore is what do the words "at some certain future time" mean. In 50 Mad 396[3] at p. 401 Odgers J. considered, though he did not decide the point, that they probably meant "any time in the future which is capable of being ascertained," and I think with respect that he is right. In my opinion the key to the meaning of these words is to be found in Ss. 34 and 45 of the Act, and the decisions which interpret them or similar words in other Acts. I think these sections should all be read together and be construed as a whole. It would be ridiculous to hold that a debt, the defeating of which could form the foundation of an application for adjudication, could nevertheless not be proved and discharged after adjudication; and it would be equally absurd to hold that a debt which is capable of being proved cannot be used as a foundation for a bankruptcy petition.

The principle has, I think, been settled by the House of Lords in (1888) 13 A C 351.[4] In that case one Fothergill was the assignee of a lease which was to continue in force for fifty years and was still in force in 1883 when the acts which gave rise to the action were committed. The lease contained a covenant by which Fothergill was bound to deliver up the demised premises at the end of the term "well and sufficiently repaired." This covenant was broken in the year 1883. The lessors thereupon sued Fothergill for damages. They were met with the defence that in the interval Fothergill had been declared a bankrupt and had been duly discharged in 1875 eight years before the breach, that this was a "debt" provable in bankruptcy even though the breach was not committed till eight years after discharge, and, as the lessors had not put in a claim they were debarred from suing. This defence succeeded. It was argued before their Lordships that it was impossible to regard the problematical breach of a covenant at an unknown future date as a debt which would be proved, but their Lordships held otherwise. It was argued that it was impossible for any man to say whether the covenant would ever be broken at all, or if it was, whether it would be broken by Fothergill, for he in turn might have assigned to another. It was also argued that it would be impossible to foresee years before the event the extent of the damage even if it could be assumed that a breach would be likely. But none of this prevailed. Their Lordships pointed out that the object of the bankruptcy laws was to discharge the bankrupt as far as possible "from every possible liability". Lord Macnaghten quoting Mellish L. J. said :

> It is quite plain that the object of these sections is that the bankrupt shall be absolutely relieved from any liability under any contract he has ever entered into.

He also said :

> The liability of the bankrupt under a contract however extreme the difficulty of valuing that liability may be must be deemed to be a debt provable in bankruptcy, and therefore a debt from which the bankrupt is released by the order of discharge.

And again, > the Act seems to treat every liability, arising from contract, which may result in payment of money or money's worth, as capable, at least prime facie of being estimated.

Their Lordships pointed out that annuities are provable in bankruptcy, and in 15 Lah 9[5] a claim for maintenance was held to be provable. In the realm of insurance the risk of a life and the duration of a voyage are computed every day by actuaries and others. In the House of Lords' case cited above, Lord Macnaghten said, dealing with the question at issue there:

I cannot think that a person of practical experience in dealing with leasehold property would have any great difficulty in making a fair estimate of the value of such a liability when he was once made acquainted with the circumstances of the particular case. Nor do I think that the Court would set aside as a matter of course an estimate founded on reasonable probability and practical experience.

And he concluded:

I cannot see that there would be any great difficulty in valuing the liability for the purpose of the Act of 1869, or, in other words, in assessing the amount of compensation which, under all the circumstances of the case, ought to be paid for the privilege of having the liability cancelled altogether.

I cannot see that there is any greater difficulty here. All that has to be estimated is the probable duration of the husband's life and the chances of his divorcing his wife. Section 45 provides a means of discounting dividends in respect of debts which are not payable at the date of the adjudication. They are to be treated as payable immediately ("presently" as the Act says) and a rebate of interest is deducted from the dividend computed from the date of the declaration of the dividend to the date when the debt would be payable. This date in a case like the present would have to be estimated along the lines suggested by the House of Lords—estimated as for example an insurance company would estimate the matter if it were called upon to do so. In my opinion, the husband's liability is a "debt" within the meaning of S. 9 (1) (b) and I hold consequently that the application lies. The order of the lower Court is set aside and the case is sent back to that Court for disposal according to law. The costs of this revision will abide the event. Counsel's fee for the applicant Rs. 10 and of the non-applicant Rs. 16.

Bhagirathibai w/o Baboo Kedarnath — Defendant — Appellant

v.

Seth Rambaran Jankiram Sunar — Plaintiff — Respondent.

Appeal No. 314 of 1937, Decided on 5th October 1939, from appellate decree of Extra Addl. Dist. Judge, Jubbulpore, D/- 16th March 1937.

Limitation Act (1908), Art. 116—Sale void ab initio against rightful owner—Vendee put in possession by vendor but dispossessed by rightful owner — Suit for damages by vendee for breach of covenant for title and quiet enjoyment contained in sale deed—Limitation runs from date of dispossession—Vendee held entitled to rely on covenant in sale deed and claim indemnity.

When a sale is void ab initio as against the rightful owner and the vendee has been put in possession of the property by the vendor the limitation to claim damages for breach of covenant of title and quiet enjoyment contained in the sale deed runs from the date of dispossession of the vendee by the rightful owner under Art. 116: A I R 1932 Nag 5 (F B), Rel. on. [P 170 C 2]

After the vendor who had no title to the property sold had put the vendee in possession, the rightful owner instituted a suit against the vendee for possession and injunction restraining him from carrying on building work on the site alleged to have been purchased by him from his vendor. The suit was decreed. An appeal therefrom by the vendee was however dismissed and the defective title of his vendor declared by the appellate Court. The decree also directed him to deliver possession to the rightful owner. The vendee subsequently sued the vendor on the basis of a covenant contained in the sale deed to the following effect: "If either the entire or a part of the property sold passes out of your possession owing to any point of law, I will be responsible for payment of the entire consideration, together with damages and costs":

Held that having lost possession owing to the Court having passed a decree, whether right or wrong, for possession against him founded upon his vendor's defective title, the vendee was entitled to rely on the clause in the sale deed and claim indemnity, and that the cause of action for damages accrued at the date of dispossession. [P 171 C 1, 2]

Held further that the vendee would not be entitled to claim indemnity if the other case was in any way a collusive or fraudulent arrangement between the parties to it in order to get a Court to pass a decree unjustified by the facts to the detriment of the vendee. The fact that the vendee in the former suit appealed once only while he could have appealed twice did not show that the other case was a collusive one. [P 171 C 2]

Judgment.—This is a defendant's appeal from a decree passed in a suit brought by the purchaser of a certain property particularized in the sale deed, EX. P-5. Broadly speaking the property is a site together with a dilapidated house thereon which appears to have subsequently been removed by the plaintiff who built a house on the site. The claim was for a variety of things some of which have been disallowed, and no point arises with regard to them: indeed, no point arises with regard to any of these items. Before me two points have been raised : (1) relating to limitation, (2) relating to the legal effect of a notification made under S. 203, Land Revenue Act. The plaintiff's claim is founded fundamentally upon a covenant contained in the above mentioned sale deed to the following effect :

> If either the entire or a part of the property sold passes out of your possession owing to any point of law, I will be responsible for payment of the entire consideration, together with damages and costs.

The date of the sale was 15th March 1926. In 1929 the malguzar of the village in which the site was situate sued the purchaser, the present plaintiff, for possession and for an injunction to stop him carrying on the work of constructing the house above mentioned which he was then engaged upon. The result of that case was that the malguzar obtained a decree ordering the present plaintiff to deliver possession. Appeal was taken from that judgment to the District Judge, and in the result the judgment was upheld and the decree for possession confirmed. It should be added that the decree for possession included an order directing the present plaintiff, the then defendant, to remove the structure on the site within four months. That decree was dated 5th September 1930, and it was confirmed on appeal on 11th December 1930. Thereupon, in point of fact, the then defendant did not put the malguzar in possession but negotiated for a purchase of the site, and succeeded in his negotiations with the result that he purchased it from the malguzar on 23rd October 1931. Now he sues the defendant under the abovementioned covenant in the earlier sale deed; and the question is: Is he entitled to recover? This is a second appeal, and only points of law can be taken. The two points of law above mentioned are taken. The first of these I shall now deal with, that is the one relating to limitation.

The argument runs as follows: Assuming that the findings in the earlier case between the malguzar and the purchaser, the present plaintiff, are accepted as correct it means that at all material times the defendant had no title; because the Court granted the earlier decree it did on the ground that in 1917 the present defendant-vendor had abandoned the site and accordingly the malguzar thereupon obtained possession and title. Therefore, when this sale was concluded in 1926 the defendant had no title and the sale was void. Therefore, no rights were created, and the plaintiff's cause of action arose at the date of the sale: and in respect of that proposition 28 N L R 31[1] at p. 42 is relied upon. That is concerned with two cases, (1874) L R 9 Ex 99[2] and (1901) 2 Ch D 825.[3] The learned Judge states as follows :

> In the first mentioned case the plaintiff founded his action on the breach of a covenant for title as well as that for quiet enjoyment, but his case as to the breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment having failed on technical grounds, it rested solely on the breach of the covenant for title. Baron Bramwell held that the breach of the covenant for title was not a continuing breach since "the covenant remains broken indeed but broken once for all." As the vendor was found to have no title to convey on the date of the conveyance, the breach of the covenant for title was held to have occurred on that date. From the observations made by Baron Bramwell in the course of his judgment viz., "of course, the statute of limitation would apply to any breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment which took place twenty years before suit" it is evident that if the action had been rightly laid as to the breach of the covenant for quiet possession, Baron Bramwell would indeed have treated the claim as being within time. In (1901) 2 Ch D 825,[3] the claim for damages was founded on the breach of the covenant for title only. It is apparent that these authorities have no direct bearing on a case in which damages are claimed on the basis of the breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment, viz., disturbance of possession.

Accordingly in that case it was held :

> When the sale is void ab initio as against the rightful owner and the vendee has been put in possession of the property by the vendor the limitation to claim damages for breach of covenant of title contained in a registered deed under Art. 116, Limitation Act, runs from the date of dispossession of the vendee by the rightful owner.

Here the cause of action is stated in the claim to have arisen on 11th December 1930 when the plaintiff's appeal in the earlier suit was dismissed and the defective title of the defendant declared by the appellate Court. Earlier it had been put thus :

> . . . . the malguzar . . . asserted her right over the said plots and filed a civil suit against the plaintiff . . . and the plaintiff contested the same but ultimately it was held by judgment and decree dated 5th September 1930 that the present defendant had no right to sell the plot to the plaintiff and that the plot belonged to the malguzar and the plaintiff was ordered to vacate the plot.

So far there is not a word said about the fundamental covenant above mentioned, but in the plaintiff's rejoinder there is this allegation:

1. ('32) 19 A I R 1932 Nag 5 : 136 I C 225 : 28 N L R 31 (F B), Kashirao v. Zabu.
2. (1874) L R 9 Ex 99 : 43 L J Ex 57 : 30 L T 393 : 22 W R 547, Spoor v. Green.
3. (1901) 2 Ch D 825 : 70 L J Ch 822 : 85 L T 90: 50 W R 237, Turner v. Moon.

> . . . . . the defendant undertook to guarantee his perfect title and indemnify the plaintiff against dispossession by whomsoever, then only the plaintiff agreed to purchase the property.

And again, he quotes the following words from the sale deed:

> If either the entire or a part of the property sold passes out of your possession owing to any point of law, I will be responsible for the payment of the entire consideration or damages and costs.

And then he alleges: "On the face of such statements the defendant cannot shirk his liability to indemnify the plaintiff." In other words, the plaintiff is pleading, very inelegantly it is true, two causes of action: (1) breach of the covenant of title, (2) breach of an express covenant of quiet enjoyment. He is pleading quite clearly that his cause of action arises when there is a breach of the second covenant, that is to say, when the decree of the lower appellate Court is passed with the result that he is directed to deliver possession to the malguzar. It seems to me therefore that even on the authority in 28 N L R 31[1] this is a case where one is concerned not with covenant for title only but with covenant for title and for quiet enjoyment and that the cause of action dates from the date of dispossession. I am therefore of the opinion that the limitation point fails.

The second point raised is as to the legal effect of a notification issued under S. 203, Land Revenue Act. The date of that notification is 3rd March 1928. The previous case went the way it did against the present plaintiff and in favour of the malguzar largely owing to certain admissions made by the present plaintiff in that suit which had the effect of persuading the Court that already in 1917 the present defendant-vendor to the knowledge of the present plaintiff-purchaser had lost title by abandonment and therefore the malguzar had gained title. It is said that that was an impossible result for a Court to arrive at in view of the effect of the wording of this notification which affected all suits then pending and directed the Court to treat the owners of sites situated as this was as persons having a heritable and transferable title. Therefore it is said that in that case the vendor (present defendant) should have been held to have had in 1926 a transferable title. But as the lower appellate Court has pointed out that notification could not possibly affect the position in 1917, 11 years before it was issued. If it could, it could equally affect the position in 1917, cure an immense range of cases of abandonment, and cause titles to be affected for an indefinite number of years past.

Quite apart from all that, in my opinion, what one is concerned with here is the fact that as a result of that previous litigation the present plaintiff has in fact lost in the eye of the law possession. It is true he has in point of fact acquired it by purchase, but that is neither here nor there. Whether that judgment is right or wrong it would make no difference. He has in fact lost possession. Having lost possession owing to a Court having passed a decree for possession against him founded upon his vendor's defective title, as that Court thought, he is, in my opinion, entitled to rely on the clause in the sale deed above quoted and claim indemnity. This of course would not be so if that other case was in any way a collusive or fraudulent arrangement between the parties to it in order to get a Court to pass a decree unjustified by the facts to the detriment of the present defendant; and it has been distinctly argued that there is some such flavour about the case, for it is said that the present plaintiff, the then defendant, lost that case largely because of his own false admissions and further that he was not very active in defending that case. It is said that he appealed once only while he could have appealed twice; had he appealed twice he might have won it. In my opinion that does not go to show that the other case was a collusive one. On the contrary the present plaintiff was in a very awkward position. He had started to build a house at the time of that case, and the loss of that case was a serious matter for him because it resulted in his being ordered to pull the house down, an order that he got out of only by re-buying the site at a figure within a hundred rupees of what he had given to the present defendant. In those circumstances, in my opinion, the two points of law argued fail. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Criminal Revn. No. 93 of 1939, Decided on 1st September 1939, for revision of order of Addl. Sess. Judge, Wardha, D/- 17th January 1939.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 145 — Person complaining about being forcibly ousted from possession by other side and asking for attachment of property and for appointment of receiver—Facts are sufficient to invest Court with jurisdiction to proceed under S. 145.

When a person comes forward and complains about being forcibly ousted from possession by the other side and asks for attachment of the property and for the appointment of a receiver and asks for action to be taken under S. 145 (which relates to land alone), there can be no reasonable doubt that he is setting forth all the necessary facts to invest the Court with jurisdiction to proceed under Section 145. (b) Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 145 and 147 — Dispute regarding right to receive offerings at certain shrine depending upon right to sit in particular spot—Order can be made either under S. 145 or under S. 147.

Where a dispute regarding the right to receive the offerings at a shrine centres around and depends upon the right to sit in a particular spot the dispute relates either to the possession of the land or to its use. Order.—This is an extraordinary case in which both sides have totally abandoned the positions which they had adopted in the first Court and each has now taken up the position of his opponent in that Court. The question at issue is whether the trial Court had jurisdiction to make an order under S. 145, or in the alternative under S. 147, Criminal P. C. That of course depends upon whether the dispute relates to land or to the user of land. The position which the applicant before me adopted in the first Court was that he was in possession and that party No. 2, the non-applicants here, were interfering with that right to possession. This is strenuously denied in this Court and it is alleged that party No. 1, the applicant here, never referred to the question of possession at all. All he asked for was that Government as guardian of the peace, and custodian of law and order, should make suitable arrangements for the collection of offerings made by pilgrims at a certain shrine and for their distribution between the parties. He contends that the dispute relates exclusively to the offerings and has nothing whatever to do with the question of possession. This is exactly the position which had been taken up by the opposite party, party No. 2, in the first Court. That party now abandons that position and states that the matter does not relate exclusively to the right to receive the offerings but is inseparably bound up with the question of possession. What I have therefore to determine is whether any question about the right to possession of this shrine is involved in this case.

The proceeding started with the application of party No. 1, dated 24th February 1938. In it he stated that he was the landlord of the village in which the shrine is situate and the manager of the shrine. Then he stated that though he had been in possession of the shrine for a long time he feared the men on the other side and that therefore in order to avoid disputes he filed a civil suit against them in the year 1929. In that suit the Court of appeal decided that the applicant was not the sole wahiwatdar and had not the sole right to the income of the shrine. Then he continued after stating that during the pendency of the suit a receiver had been appointed.

After the suit was decided the applicant took possession of the shrine in the year 1933 and since then he has been in peaceful possession of the shrine and its management. Soon after the decision of the High Court which took place on 16th March 1937 the party arrayed against the applicant wanted to take forcible possession of the shrine.

The applicant then continued with other allegations and concluded by asking that a receiver be appointed by the Court to manage the shrine and make collections from the pilgrims and keep them in deposit until the sharers were able to get the dispute about their shares determined. Then in a later application, dated 31st January 1938, the applicant stated that the receiver who had been appointed in the civil suit had ceased to function and therefore the question again arose about the right to make the collections from the pilgrims and to manage the shrine generally, and the application continued :

The non-applicant and his son and relatives, the applicants learn, are now conspiring to create somehow further trouble and oust the applicants by force from the Pahad and Darga.

They therefore asked the Magistrate to take action and "maintain the applicants in their rights." Then followed a third statement made on 25th February 1938 on solemn affirmation. There he asks that action be taken under S. 145, Criminal P. C., and that the Darga be immediately placed under attachment and a receiver appointed. The question is whether these various applications deal with the right to possession or not. In order to understand that it is necessary to obtain a clear picture of the manner in which the collections from the pilgrims are made. The applicant describes that in his evidence as witness 1 for his party. He states there that "there is a gadi on the Darga and Abdul Majid has the right to sit on it alone." It is explained here that the person who sits on this gadi is the one who receives the offerings from the various pilgrims. Therefore, it is clear that the best and perhaps the only feasible method of determining who is in possession of the shrine is by seeing who has been receiving these offerings and that, as I understand it, is the attitude adopted by the learned trying Magistrate. But to continue with the applicant's evidence: he stated later on in his evidence:

> From 2nd or 3rd May 1937, Abdul Majid's possession has been taken over by force by party No. 2. From 3rd May 1937 till the date on which this application was presented, I have got documentary evidence to prove that Abdul Majid had possession.

Reading all these applications and the evidence together, it is reasonably plain that though the main dispute between the parties relates to the income derived from the offerings made by the various pilgrims who visit the shrine, it is inextricably bound up with the question of possession. It is impossible to separate the one from the other so far as the dispute now before me is concerned. Of course as an abstract proposition of law, it is quite clear that one person may be entitled to sit on the gadi and thus receive the offerings while others are interested only in their subsequent distribution. In that sense the two questions are separate, but the criminal Courts acting under S. 145 are not interested in the latter of these two positions. All they have to see is which one of the two parties before them is really in possession. Therefore when a person comes forward and complains about being forcibly ousted from possession by the other side and asks for attachment of the property and for the appointment of a receiver and asks for action to be taken under S. 145 (which relates to land alone), there can, in my opinion, be no reasonable doubt that he is setting forth all the necessary facts to invest the Court with jurisdiction to proceed under S. 145. Acting on these various applications and the statement made on affirmation the learned Magistrate issued a preliminary order on 25th February 1938. The order is not very clear because what the learned Magistrate states is "that a dispute likely to cause a breach of the peace concerning the shares in the income" exists between the two parties before him. If that was all, I am clear that he would have had no right to proceed under S. 145, but he continues :

> I direct the said Abdul Majid on one side and Mohammad Sahib and others on the other to..... put in written statements of their respective claims as respects the fact of actual possession of the said Darga.

This last sentence makes it clear that what the learned Magistrate was investigating was the fact of possession and since in this case the dispute about the shares or rather the right to receive the income is inextricably bound up with that possession, the order read as a whole relates to the dispute between the parties regarding the possession of the land. Of the rulings cited by the learned counsel for the applicant party No. 1, 37 Cal 578,[1] related exclusively to the right to worship in a particular shrine and not to the use of the land. But the learned Judges went on to state at page 580 :

> It may be that it is impossible to perform the duties of a pujari without entering upon the land on which the temple is built. But it is the worship which is disputed and not the use of the land.

They therefore came to the conclusion that in such a case action could not be taken under S. 145. This view however is dissented from in a decision of the Madras High Court which is to be found in A I R 1938 Mad 537[2] at page 538. The learned Judge who decided that case states :

> It seems to me that where the dispute is regarding a right which is inseparably connected with the use of any land or building, it must be regarded as being within the purview of S. 147. It may be that the dispute in actual fact may have more to do with what a man does in the temple after entering into it and not so much with his actual entry into the temple; nevertheless where the right regarding which a dispute exists is one which is inseparably connected with the right to enter a building and cannot be dissociated from it the dispute cannot be said to be not one regarding an alleged right of user of the building.

With these remarks I agree and respectfully dissent from the interpretation given in the Calcutta ruling. Another Calcutta case was also relied on, namely 38 Cal 387,[3] but that merely states that > an order made under S. 145 declaring a party entitled to the actual possession of a temple and its offerings is intra vires as to the temple, but not as to the offerings.

That in my opinion is unexceptionable. The only relevance of the offerings in this case is to determine who is in possession of the land. The Courts under S. 145 can clearly

1. ('10) 37 Cal 578 : 6 I C 182 : 12 C L J 22 : 14 C W N 611, Guiram Ghosal v. Lal Behari Das.
2. ('38) 25 A I R 1938 Mad 537 : 176 I C 127 : 39 Cr L J 705 : (1938) 1 M L J 817, Velappa v. Ramaswami.
3. ('11) 38 Cal 387 : 9 I C 6 : 13 C L J 445 : 16 C W N 574, Ram Saran v. Raghu Nandan Gir.

not determine who has the right to receive these offerings. Then there is the Madras case, 29 Mad 237[4] at page 238 which merely states that the real point in question there made it clear that a dispute as to the right to use a mosque between persons claiming to be entitled to officiate as Kazi therein is a dispute coming within S. 147, Criminal Procedure Code.

As regards the ruling in 23 N L R 84[5] following the Calcutta cases just cited the learned Additional Judicial Commissioner had before him a case in which the dispute related exclusively to the right to receive a share of the income. It had nothing to do with the right to possession of the temple nor yet with the right to enter into the temple, worship there and receive the offerings at that spot. It appears to have been conceded that the offerings in that case were taken by the Raja of Mandhata and that the dispute centred around the manner in which those offerings were to be distributed after receipt. Therefore, that decision has nothing to do with the facts in this case. The objection taken is a very technical one. It is clear that the parties are anything but desirable characters—they had broken heads on previous occasions—and it is eminently desirable that a broad and common sense view should be taken and that the action of the authorities called upon to deal in a summary way with a situation likely to lead to a breach of the peace be upheld if that is at all possible. As I have said when one views the various applications made by the applicant and his evidence in a broad and common sense way it is quite clear that though the main dispute is as regards the right to receive the offerings it centres around and depends upon the right to sit in a particular spot and that relates either to the possession of the land or to its use. Therefore the order whether regarded as one made under S. 145 or under S. 147 is right. The application is dismissed.

First Appeal No. 88 of 1937, Decided on 8th January 1941, from decree of Sub-Judge, First Class, Khandwa, D/- 27th February 1937.

Specific Relief Act (1877), S. 42—Consequential relief — Fraud — A to defraud his creditors transferring his property to B — No third party defrauded —A can sue for mere declaration that property is his without claiming sale deed to be declared nominal and ineffective.

Where A to defraud his creditors transfers his property to B, A can sue for a mere declaration that the property belongs to him without claiming the relief that the sale deed be declared nominal and ineffective before any third party has been defrauded: 35 Cal 551 (PC), Expl. and Rel. on. [P 175 C 1]

P. N. Rudra — for Appellant.

K. B. Tare, and W. R. Puranik — for Respondents 1, and 1 to 3, respectively.

Judgment. — The plaintiff in this case seeks a declaration that he is the owner of certain properties. A preliminary issue was framed in the following terms :

Whether plaintiff is entitled to the relief of declaration which he seeks in this suit without claiming a relief that the sale deed executed by him in favour of defendants 2 and 3 be declared nominal and ineffective ?

On that preliminary issue the learned Judge has dismissed the suit. In our opinion he was wrong in so doing. In so saying we must not be taken as indicating in any way that this suit has any merits whatever nor must we be taken as indicating that on the merits it must obviously be dismissed. We have not gone into the merits. We have merely noted that it is founded in fraud and our conclusion is based entirely on the observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 35 Cal 551[1] which decision requires to be carefully understood in order that this case may be properly approached when it comes to the merits and in order that the present point can be fully understood. Their Lordships were there concerned with a contest between A and B. A started as the owner of certain property which property he colourably purported to transfer to B. That colourable transaction was admittedly a fraudulent one for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of A. Their Lordships had to consider B's argument that because the whole transaction was rooted in fraud therefore the maxim in pari delicto potior est conditio possedentis applied. They came to the conclusion that that maxim did not apply if A retraced his steps and sought to get the property back before any third party had been defrauded. If their Lordships' observations at pp. 558 and 559 are carefully examined, it will be seen that they are giving A a locus pœnitentiæ during which he can get rid of the effects of his fraud and that they are limiting that to circumstances during which the transaction remains unreal. Once it has any real content then their Lordships clearly indicate that it cannot be treated as a nullity because ex hypothesi if it has a real content it is not a nullity. They indicate that it has a real content if the position of third parties is thereby affected.

While the transaction is in the unreal state it may be regarded as nothing. Nothing passes; nothing is done; the whole thing is colourable and it begins and remains a mere matter of talk. There is no transfer, there is nothing to set aside and the property stays where it was. So viewed, obviously one is not concerned with a transfer passing title from A to B making B, it may be, the legal owner, trustee for A, or anything of that sort: one is not concerned therefore with a transfer which divests A and which requires a re-transfer before A can be re-invested. One is just concerned with a sham which has no effect at all. This however is assuming that A can retrace his steps. He can retrace his steps while the transaction is still merely a colourable transaction and remains unreal. It remains unreal as long as no third party is affected. Once a third party is affected, it becomes something other than unreal. Once that stage is reached, neither A nor B can say that the transaction is imaginary, colourable, or void. That being the state of the case, it is not necessary for A to seek a declaration setting aside the transaction. There is nothing to set aside. What A has got to ask for, as he has asked for here, is a declaration that the property is his. In order to get that declaration he has got to prove that he has retraced his steps in time. For that he has got to establish that the unreal nature of this transaction has never ceased. That will be the problem that he will be faced with when it comes to the merits in this case. The case will now go down for disposal on the merits. Costs hitherto incurred and of this appeal to abide the event.

v.

Shambai w/o Jiwanlal Dube and another — Accused.

Criminal Revn. No. 490 of 1940, Decided on 31st January 1941, to revise order of Magistrate First Class, Amraoti, D/- 23rd July 1940.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 488 — Mere casual residence is not sufficient to give jurisdiction.

The general rule is that an application under S. 488 can only be entertained at the place where husband and wife last resided together, and this rule has been modified to the extent that it is possible for a husband to have more than one residence for the purpose of S. 488. Mere casual residence in a place for temporary purpose with no intention of remaining is not residence so as to attract jurisdiction under S. 488. [P 175 C 2; P 176 C 1]

Where therefore the husband in order to marry a second wife visits a place where he does not reside nor has ever resided and his first wife also comes to the same place to which she also is a stranger and files an application under S. 488, the Magistrate at that place has no jurisdiction to award maintenance under S. 488: A I R 1926 Oudh 268, Rel. on; A I R 1939 Cal 333, Disting.; A I R 1918 Cal 785, Not followed. [P 176 C 2]

(b) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 488 — Husband offering to keep wife with him—Wife cannot be allowed maintenance.

A Magistrate cannot allow maintenance to the wife when the husband has offered to keep his wife with him even if the wife refuses to go with him on the alleged ground of ill-treatment which has not been established. [P 176 C 2]

B. L. Gupta — for Applicant.

G. G. Kane — for Accused.

Order. — This is a reference by the Sessions Judge, Amraoti, recommending that an order granting maintenance to Mt. Shambai passed against her husband should be set aside on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the application and also on other grounds. Jiwanlal and Shambai last lived together at Kharagpur in Bengal where Jiwanlal is employed by the Bengal Nagpur Railway. They had lived there for some years and they ceased to live together at least three years ago when Shambai returned to her native place in the United Provinces. In August last Jiwanlal went to Amraoti for the purpose of taking a second wife. While he was there for the celebration of the wedding, Shambai arrived from the United Provinces and presented her application. The Magistrate at Amraoti entertained the application on the ground that both parties had resided at Amraoti for a month or so although there is no evidence as to the time when either party arrived. Admittedly, the marriage took place on 7th July and the application was filed on the 13th. There is no evidence as to the date of Jiwanlal's arrival at Amraoti, and Shambai stated that she had stayed with him there for about a fortnight.

The general rule is that an application can only be entertained at the place where husband and wife last resided together, and this rule has been modified to the extent that it has been held possible for a husband to have more than one residence for the purpose of S. 488. But, on a perusal of all the authorities, I can find no warrant for the proposition, with one exception, that a casual visit is to be taken as residence for the purpose of granting jurisdiction. It has been held that if the husband and wife go to a place for a couple of months, the husband returning at times to his main residence but going back to the temporary one, this is sufficient to confer jurisdiction. But the proposition enunciated by Stuart C. J. in A I R 1926 Oudh 268,[1] that casual residence in a place for temporary purpose with no intention of remaining is not residence so as to attract jurisdiction has, so far as I am aware, never been disputed and has been consistently quoted with approval. This is not one of the class of cases where the parties have no permanent abode and where temporary residence, for however short a period, has been held to attract jurisdiction.

Two cases have been cited by the learned counsel for Mt. Shambai. In one of these, I L R (1939) 1 Cal 345,[2] Edgley J. held in view of the words "resides or is" in sub-s. (8) of S. 488 that an application could be made where the opposite party had his place of business, although not his actual residence within the jurisdiction of the Magistrate to whom the application was made. There the opposite party resided within the jurisdiction of the Police Magistrate of Alipore but his place of business was within the jurisdiction of the Chief Presidency Magistrate. That case can have no application to the facts before me. The other case is 21 C W N 872.[3] There it was held that although the husband was a permanent resident of Darjeeling his visits to Calcutta on business, extending to some six weeks and renewed after an interval of a week for apparently further six weeks, would confer jurisdiction on the Calcutta Magistrate in whose Court the application was made. In view of the long list of authorities to the contrary of which the most pertinent to the present facts is the decision of Stuart C. J. in A I R 1926 Oudh 268,[1] I am unable with the greatest respect to follow this isolated decision and in any case it appears that the husband there concerned was in the habit of paying business visits to Calcutta from Darjeeling, and Calcutta was a place where in the words of Edgley J. in I L R (1939) 1 Cal 345[2] he could easily be found. In the case before me, if Mt. Shambai had bona fides for demanding maintenance from her husband, she could have done so at Kharagpur at any time within the previous three years. Instead of this she takes advantage of her husband's visit to Amraoti to get married, in a place where he does not reside and has never resided and to which she too is a stranger, and calls evidence of witnesses of that place who can obviously have no knowledge of the circumstances on which her claim to maintenance is based. It is clearly improper that there should be jurisdiction to hear the application and to decide it in such circumstances. If anything further was needed to show that the husband did not reside in Amraoti and had no intention of remaining there, it is to be found in the conduct of the wife in obtaining the issue of process before process-fee was paid, presumably by inducing the clerk responsible to act irregularly, and although the application was filed on 13th July, the stamp on it was purchased on 4th July, before her husband's wedding had taken place. Such undue precipitancy is clearly indicative of her knowledge that her husband was not resident in Amraoti and had no intention of remaining there beyond the time necessary to complete his marriage.

Apart from this, the Magistrate had no reason whatever to allow maintenance when the husband had offered to keep his wife with him. In her application she stated that she was perfectly prepared to live with him in spite of the fact that she had alleged beating in the past. No evidence to substantiate this allegation of beating was brought, and yet when the husband made the offer, she repudiated it, saying that she did not want to go with him as he had already given her trouble and would give her a lot more. This is entirely at variance with her application. On these grounds as well as on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction the order is set aside.

Sitaram Shrawan Koshti—Plaintiff—Applicant

v.

Bajya Parnya Bhoi — Defendant — Non-Applicant.

Civil Revn. No. 171 of 1940, Decided on 20th November 1940, to revise decree of Sub-Judge, Second Class, Katol, D/- 15th January 1940.

(a) Usurious Loans Act (10 of 1918 as amended by Act 11 of 1934), S. 3 — Court has power to act suo motu.

Under the Act as amended locally, the Court has power to act suo motu even though the plea as to re-opening of transaction is not raised by way of defence. If interest payable and in fact charged is excessive within the meaning of S. 3 (2) of the Act it entitles the Court to review the transaction. [P 177 C 2]

(b) Pleading — Repayment — Proof of — Repayment pleaded not specifically denied and admitted in pleading — Repayment should be taken to be proved.

Where it is only possible to reach the sum named by the plaintiff in the suit if credit is given for the repayment pleaded by the defendant the Court is justified in acting on that admission, especially when the plaintiff does not specifically deny the payment pleaded. [P 177 C 2]

(c) C. P. Money-lenders Act (13 of 1934 as amended from time to time), S. 2 (v)—Regular course of business—Isolated act of money-lending is not money-lending in regular course of business.

Isolated act of money-lending is an act of business, but not necessarily an act done in the regular course of business. Consequently, the Act does not apply to such a case. The Act only applies to money-lenders and therefore before it can be applied it must be shown by the person seeking to apply it and seeking to take advantage of its provisions that the plaintiff is a money-lender. [P 177 C 2; P 178 C 1]

(d) C. P. Reduction of Interest Act (32 of 1936) — Applicability — Act in force during suit on loan but repealed before judgment in suit — Court in its judgment cannot resort to provisions of Act.

The original loan was advanced long before the Act came into force. The Act was in force when the suit was in progress but was repealed before the lower Court gave its judgment:

Held that the Act contained a prohibition which prevented persons from recovering more than a certain rate of interest between certain date specified in the Act. Consequently before a Court could act under the provisions of the Act, it must be in force. It was not in force at the date of the judgment of the lower Court and consequently the lower Court was wrong in resorting to its provisions. [P 178 C 1]

The Act only applies to money-lenders and therefore before it can be applied it must be shown by the person seeking to apply it and seeking to take advantage of its provisions that the plaintiff is a money-lender. [P 178 C 1]

R. S. Kholkute — for Applicant.

A. L. Halwe — for Non-Applicant.

Order. — The first question which arises in this revision is whether the lower Court was right in re-opening the transaction on which the suit is founded. The suit is based on a promissory note dated 20th December 1936, which in turn is based on a bond of 28th June 1933. If the transaction can be re-opened then the further question arises whether a repayment of Rs. 55 has been proved. The lower Court has evidently re-opened the transaction although it has not stated why. In my opinion the learned Judge had a right, and indeed was bound to do so, under the Usurious Loans Act as amended locally. Section 3 states that " where, in any suit to which this Act applies, whether heard ex parte or otherwise, the Court has reason to believe, etc." That means clearly that the Court has power to act suo motu even though the plea is not raised by way of defence. The interest which according to the statement of the plaintiff was payable and which was in fact charged on the bond was 2 per cent. compound and is also the interest on the promissory note in suit. That is excessive within the meaning of S. 3 (2), Usurious Loans Act, and entitles the Court to review the transaction.

That brings me to the next point, viz., whether the repayment pleaded of Rs. 55 has been proved. No evidence has been taken in the case, and the lower Court has proceeded upon the pleadings. The plaintiff stated that he did not remember whether any payment had been made towards the previous bond, also that the amount stated in the promissory note was reached by calculating interest on the sum due on the bond at 2 per cent. compound. The lower Court made a calculation, and it is only possible to reach the sum named in the promissory note if credit is given for the repayment of Rs. 55 which has been pleaded. In the circumstances the lower Court was justified in acting on that admission, especially when it is borne in mind that the plaintiff did not specifically deny the payment pleaded. The lower Court has also disallowed interest under the Money-lenders Act. There is no proof that the plaintiff is a "money-lender". The definition of "money-lender" given in the Act is "a person who, in the regular course of business, advances a loan." There is no proof here that the loan was advanced in the regular course of business. The word "regular" shows that the plaintiff must have been in the habit of advancing loans to persons as a matter of regular business. If only an isolated act of money-lending is shown to the Court it is impossible to state that that constitutes a regular course of business. It is an act of business, but not necessarily an act done in the regular course of business. Consequently, the lower Court was wrong in applying this Act.

It was argued that the burden is on the plaintiff to prove that he is not a money-lender. That however is incorrect. The Act only applies to money-lenders and therefore before it can be applied it must be shown by the person seeking to apply it and seeking to take advantage of its provisions that the plaintiff is a money-lender. Interest will therefore have to be allowed. As however the transaction was rightly re-opened this Court is left with a discretion as to the amount of interest which should be allowed. The Money-lenders Act indicates that 18 per cent. simple is a fair rate of interest on an unsecured loan. Interest will consequently be calculated at that rate upto the date of suit, and allowance will be given for the repayment of Rs. 55. The other repayment of Rs. 21 which was pleaded has already been rejected. The next question is whether the lower Court was right in applying the Reduction of Interest Act. The original loan was advanced long before the Act came into force, and consequently no question of vested interests arises. In fact, if anybody has vested interests which has been affected it is the plaintiff because on the date when he lent his money there was no thought in any one's mind that his interest would be arbitrarily reduced by the Legislature. The Act was however in force when the suit was in progress but was repealed before the lower Court gave its judgment. The Act contains a prohibition. It prevents persons from recovering more than a certain rate of interest between certain dates specified in the Act. If the prohibition is withdrawn it is clear that the original rights of the parties revive, and the Courts cannot enforce the prohibition which is withdrawn. Consequently before a Court can act under the provisions of the Act, that is to say, before it can enforce the prohibition contained therein the Act must be in force. It was not in force at the date of the judgment of the lower Court and consequently the lower Court was wrong in resorting to its provisions. The learned counsel for the defendant argues that as the plaintiff only claimed 6 per cent. in the plaint that is all he is entitled to. That is not correct. Six per cent. is claimed on the assumption that the transaction would not be re-opened. The claim in the plaint is for Rs. 58-13-0. According to the decision here it comes to only Rs. 38-8-0. The decree will accordingly be modified. Costs here and in the lower Court will be proportionate to success and failure. From date of suit to the date of this decree I allow interest at 4 per cent. per annum simple.

R. S. Dabir — for Non-Applicants.

Order. — This order will govern Civil Revision No. 792/39 and Civil Revn. No. 125/40. Dealing with the former, the first question is whether the real owner can apply to be joined as a party to a suit instituted by the benamidar after the benamidar's death. The lower Court relying on A I R 1930 Mad 221[1] holds that he cannot. With due respect to the Madras learned Judge I am of opinion that that is wrong. Their Lordships of the Privy Council have decided in 46 Cal 566[2] at p. 575 that it is open to the real owner to apply to be joined in the action brought by the benamidar. In view of that pronouncement it is clear that the real owner has a right to be joined, and as he has that right it is clear that there must be some provision in the law somewhere which entitles him to be so joined. In my opinion, the provision is to be found either in O. 1, R. 10 (2) or in S. 151, Civil P. C. In A I R 1929 Mad 268[3] at p. 270 the real owner was allowed to be joined. The learned Madras Judges applied O. 1, R. 10. But in any case whatever the proper order may be it is clear from the decision of the Privy Council that the real owner has a right to be joined.

1. ('30) 17 AIR 1930 Mad 221 : 122 I C 175 : 58 M L J 57, Doraiswami v. Chidambaram.
2. ('18) 5 AIR 1918 PC 140 : 49 IC 1 : 46 Cal 566 46 I A 1 (P C), Gur Narayan v. Sheolal Singh.

The next question is at what stage he can apply to be joined. In my opinion it is clear that he can be joined at any stage provided the suit brought by the benamidar is still alive and provided of course no injustice or inconvenience is caused to the other side. It is possible that the application might be refused if it is made at a very late stage and there is contest between the benamidar and the real owner or if the latter sets up a new case. He cannot of course be allowed to do that. In this case the person who is said to have been the benamidar died on 9th December 1938 and the application by the present applicant was made on 13th February 1939. At that date the suit had not abated; it was still alive. Order 22, R. 1 states that the death of a plaintiff shall not cause the suit to abate if the right to sue survives. The right to sue clearly survived in this case and therefore the suit did not abate. It not having been abated the real owner was entitled to apply to be joined. It is argued however that this provision is one which enures in favour of the legal representative and not of any other person. If the legal representative does not choose to apply, then, it is argued the suit abates. That in my opinion is not so. The order deals with the case in which the right to sue survives and it states that if the right to sue survives the suit does not abate. After that it is only the Limitation Act which causes the suit to abate if the application for substitution is not made within the time prescribed. If the suit does not abate and if it is still alive, then the real owner can, in my opinion, apply to be joined and once he is joined he can continue the suit. But as I have said he must continue the same suit and cannot set up a different cause of action or different pleas. It is argued that the mere fact that he is setting up a title in himself here changes the cause of action and converts the suit into one of a different character. That again is not so. The question whether he is the real owner is an independent one and his right to be joined depends upon whether he is the real owner or not. It is just as independent as whether a person is a legal representative or not. For that of course an enquiry has to be made and if the decision is that he is the legal representative (or the real owner in this case), then he is entitled to be joined and once he is joined, then the original suit continues. The fact that an enquiry independent of and different from the original suit has first to be made does not mean that the suit is converted into one of a different character. I need not in the circumstances dilate upon 22 Cal 92[4] and 4 Lah 72[5] because all they decide is that a new cause of action cannot be imported into the suit, and with that of course I agree.

It is pertinent to observe in this case that the legal representatives here do not wish to proceed with the suit and that they do not oppose the application of the applicant to be joined and proceed with the suit. The legal representatives appeared and filed an application to that effect. The learned counsel for the defendants non-applicants denies that the applicant is the real owner. Therefore unless this matter has already been enquired into and decided by the first Court an enquiry will be necessary in the same manner as an enquiry is necessary when a party applies to be joined as the legal representative and the other side denies that he is the legal representative. The mere fact that those who are said to be the legal representatives do not oppose the application does not conclude the matter. The application for revision is consequently allowed and the order of the lower Court is set aside. If no enquiry has been made as to whether the applicant is the real owner that enquiry will now be made by the lower Court. If it has been made and the conclusion is that the applicant is the real owner, then he will be joined and will be allowed to continue the suit. The costs of this revision will abide the result. That is to say, if in the result the applicant is found to be the real owner and is joined, the costs of this revision will be paid by the non-applicants. If, on the other hand, he fails, then he will pay the non-applicants their costs of this revision. Counsel's fee for the applicant Rs. 35 and for the non-applicants Rs.30. Civil Revision No.125/40 arises out of the same matter. An appeal was filed against the order of the lower Court to the District Judge, Nimar. This was filed by way of abundant caution and both sides are agreed that the appellate Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal because no appeal lay. Consequently the order of the appellate Court dismissing the appeal on the ground that the real owner cannot apply to be joined is set aside. The appeal was dismissed there without notice to the other side and so no question of costs arose. There will be no order as to costs in this revision either.

Order. — The real question here is whether an appeal lies or not. If an appeal lies it is clear that I have no jurisdiction to entertain this revision. In my opinion, an appeal lies. The facts are as follows : Plaintiff 1 made certain dispositions of property in favour of some of the defendants on 16th March 1931. In or about January 1939 she regretted her action and wanted to institute a suit for setting aside these alienations. It appears that she had not enough money to conduct the suit and so entered into an agreement with plaintiffs 2 and 3 under which they were to advance Rs. 800 towards the cost of her litigation and to obtain a one-fourth share in some of the fields in dispute. The agreement having been entered into all the three plaintiffs instituted the suit out of which these proceedings arise. After the suit had been instituted, plaintiff 1 came to an understanding with the defendants, changed her mind and stated that she desired to withdraw the suit unconditionally. The lower Court thereupon held that plaintiffs 2 and 3 had only purchased a contingent interest in the property and that if plaintiff 1 could not succeed in the suit and it was clear according to the learned Judge that she could not once she has stated that she did not wish to proceed and desired to withdraw, then plaintiffs 2 and 3 had no case and consequently it dismissed the suit as withdrawn by plaintiff 1. The question is whether this dismissal amounts to a decree within the meaning of S. 2, Civil P. C. If it does, it is appealable. The argument before me has proceeded upon the construction of O. 23, R. 1, Civil P. C. That order is not very happily worded but the meaning is clear. If the plaintiff seeking to withdraw is the sole plaintiff, then no question of permission arises unless the plaintiff wants to bring a fresh suit on the same cause of action. If she does not, then she is entitled to withdraw whether the Court likes it or not and whether the other side likes it or not. The penalty for withdrawal is that no fresh suit lies on the same cause of action. When, however, the plaintiff seeking withdrawal is not the sole plaintiff, then she cannot withdraw unless the others consent. In that case permission is required and what the Court has to determine is whether the others have consented to it or not. In the present case, the plaintiff who wanted to withdraw was not the sole plaintiff. The other plaintiffs had not consented and therefore clearly the plaintiff could not withdraw from the suit and the lower Court had no power to allow her to do so. But in my opinion the lower Court has not done that. What the lower Court states is that as soon as plaintiff 1 withdraws or compromises or abandons the suit, the other plaintiffs who derive title from her cannot succeed. Whether that is a right view of law or not is a matter with which I am not concerned. The point is that in my opinion the lower Court has decided this case on the merits and has not simply passed an order permitting withdrawal under O. 23, Rule 1.

It is argued, however, that the lower Court has clearly stated that the suit is dismissed not because in its opinion it cannot succeed on the merits but because it has been withdrawn by plaintiff 1. That in my opinion is not a true construction of the order. When read as a whole, as I have said, the lower Court considers that once plaintiff 1 abandons the claim, the others have no right of suit and therefore the sentence in which the learned Judge states that the suit is dismissed as withdrawn means that it is dismissed because plaintiff 1 has chosen to withdraw by which he means because plaintiff 1 has chosen to abandon the claim, and therefore the others have no right of suit. That as I say is a decision on the merits. As regards the rulings cited 27 Cal 362[1] and A I R 1922 Lah 267[2] have no application here because they deal with cases which were withdrawn with liberty to file a fresh suit, and the decision there is that an order allowing this is not a decree within the meaning of S. 2. In A I R 1928 Mad 496[3] the suit proceeded and there was no order of dismissal. The matter was entertained as a revision but the question whether an appeal lay or not was not decided and therefore that ruling also does not assist us here. The real difficulty which the learned counsel for the applicants has found here is that no decree has been drawn up and he has consequently found himself in a dilemma. According to 8 N L R 92[4] no appeal can be filed until a decree has been drawn up. Therefore according to the learned counsel no appeal lies. That in my opinion is not correct. An appeal clearly lies whenever the decision amounts to a decree within the meaning of S. 2. It may be that no appeal can be filed until the decree is formally drawn up but that would not invest this Court with jurisdiction to interfere in revision. The proper course, if that is really the law, would be to apply to the first Court to draw up its decree and then, if that Court refuses to do so apply either in revision, or in appeal, treating the order as a decree. That, however, is a matter which I do not decide because according to 26 N L R 24[5] it is not necessary for the party aggrieved to wait until a decree is drawn up, and the order or judgment itself can be treated as a decree within the meaning of S. 2 and an appeal can be filed. Again I do not decide whether this is right or wrong. All I decide is that the matter is appealable and therefore no revision lies. Whether all this would afford the applicants ground for asking for extension of time under S. 5, Limitation Act, is a matter which the Court before whom the appeal is brought will have to decide. I say nothing about it.

As an appeal lies the application is returned for presentation to the proper Court. The costs of this revision will be paid by the applicants, that is to say, by plaintiffs 2 and 3. There will, however, be only one set of costs as plaintiff 1 and the defendants have joined hands and now have the same interests. Counsel's fee Rupees 75. This will be divided between the three sets of non-applicants in the proportion of one-third each, that is to say, each set will get Rs. 25.

Shri Mahadeoji through Pitain Matabhik — Plaintiff — Appellant

v.

Baldeo Prasad Mahadeo Prasad and others — Defendants — Respondents.

First Appeal No. 21 of 1936, Decided on 31st January 1940, from decree of Addl. Sub-Judge, First Class, Jubbulpore, D/- 5th November 1935.

(a) Adverse possession—Person entering into possession in fiduciary character — He must prove open assertion of hostile title to prove that his possession had become adverse.

Where a person has entered into possession in a fiduciary character it would be necessary for him to allege and prove an open assertion of a hostile title in order to show that the character of his possession, from that point on had changed.

(b) Limitation Act (1908), S. 10, Explanation — Section 10 does not apply to mere custodian or manager of property handed over to him for safe custody by legal or de facto manager.

Unless the seisin to the estate resides in the person sued S. 10 cannot apply. The seisin must, for the limited purposes of this section, reside in one person or set of persons and not in two. There cannot be a manager of a manager for the purposes of the explanation. A mere custodian or manager of property handed over to him for safe custody or management by the legal or de facto manager cannot be reached by this section : A I R 1928 Bom 58, Expl. [P 185 C 1 2,] (c) Limitation Act (1908), S. 10, Explanation —Explanation applies also to de facto managers.

The explanation to S. 10 applies as much to de facto managers as to those legally entitled. Because a person who wrongfully holds as trustee and pretends to act as such cannot turn round and reprobate the right which he asserts and claim to hold adversely to his beneficiary. An estoppel would arise : A I R 1920 Cal 558, Rel. on. [P 185 C 2; P 186 C 1]

(d) Trust—Person in possession of trust property cannot resist suit for possession by rightful owner on ground that somebody else placed him in possession and that he attorned to him.

A person in possession of trust property cannot resist a suit for possession by the rightful owners on the ground that somebody else placed him in possession and that he attorned to them. He would have at the very least to establish that he was a transferee for value who purchased in good faith without notice of the trust. But that is a very different matter from saying that the property vested in him in trust for a specific purpose. [P 186 C 1, 2]

(e) Limitation Act (1908), S. 10—"Specific purpose."

The specific purpose required by the section is the specific purpose mentioned in or deducible from the deed : A I R 1922 P C 212 and A I R 1931 P C 196, Rel. on. [P 186 C 2]

(f) Trust — Trustee de son tort and de facto manager — Powers of.

A trustee de son tort and a de facto manager is subject to the obligations and liabilites of the trustee or manager legally entitled to possession but he does not necessarily have all their rights and powers. [P 186 C 2]

(g) Limitation Act (1908), S. 10 — Persons suing not on behalf of trusts but as administrators of will—Section 10 does not apply.

Where persons are suing not on behalf of the trusts of the temple but as administrators of the will in order to enable them to administer the estate, S. 10 cannot apply : A I R 1922 P C 212 and A I R 1931 P C 196, Rel. on. [P 187 C 1]

(h) Limitation Act (1908), Arts. 109, 89 and 120—Person placed in rightful possession as custodian wrongfully withholding profits—Suit to recover profits is not governed by Art. 109 or Art. 89 but by Art. 120.

Where a person has been placed in rightful possession as custodian (supratdar) and receives profits but wrongfully withholds them, a suit to recover profits is not governed by Art. 109 or Art. 89 but by Article 120. [P 187 C 2]

(i) Limitation Act (1908), Art. 62—Suit to recover profits—Art. 62 does not apply.

Article 62 only applies when the defendant has received money as distinct from profits into his hands. Hence, Art. 62 does not apply where a suit is to recover profits. [P 187 C 2]

(j) Succession Act (1925), S. 332 — Assent of administrator not given to legatee's title — Administrator and not legatee is entitled to sue.

Where it has not been proved that the administrators had given their assent to the legatee's title, the title to the property bequeathed still vests in the administrators to the will and consequently the administrators and not legatee is at the moment entitled to sue. [P 183 C 2]

K. C. Jain — for Respondents 1 and 2.

Judgment. — This appeal arises out of a suit for the proceeds of property said to have been held on trust by the defendants. It was instituted in the following circumstances. One Bhola was the owner of the property in dispute. He executed a will, dated 8th May 1919 shortly before his death. This will is Ex. P-28. In it he dedicated certain properties, including the property now in dispute, to a temple of Shree Mahadeoji which he had built in the Jubbulpore District. He also made certain other bequests to his niece, Mt. Lachhia, and to two persons, Pitai and Munda. As regards the property dedicated to the temple he made the following arrangements in respect of its management. He stated, immediately after mentioning the bequests to Lachhi, Pitai and Munda, as follows :

All those who belong to my family shall be keeping a supervision over the property of the said temple as long as their lives last but they shall not have the authority to put the property of the temple to their own use . . . . . For superintending the management of the temple I appoint Ramlal son of Bachchu Kumbar, Devi son of Gayaprasad by caste Brahmin, Baldeoprasad son of Madhoprasad Brahmin, Babboosingh son of Ranjitsingh Thakur and Kamta son of Gajadhar Kumhar, residents of Bandhaiyapura, as panchas who are to keep an eye on the matter . . . . When there is nobody alive in my family, the entire management and supervision of the whole of my property shall rest with the panchas.

He appointed no executor under the will and therefore on his death the legatees, Pitai and Munda, applied for letters of administration with the will annexed and letters were granted in their favour on 26th September 1924. Disputes thereupon arose between the administrators Pitai and Munda on the one side and the reversioners of Bhola on the other. Therefore according to their story, they placed defendant 1, Baldeo, who is one of the panchas mentioned in the will, in possession of the property in dispute as trustee in order that it might be safe, and entered into an express understanding with him that the fields should be restored to them after the conclusion of the dispute with the reversioners. Defendant 1 is said to have entered upon possession on this understanding, and he is described as a trustee of the deity in the plaint. He, along with his wife, remained in possession for a number of years. According to the plaint possession was delivered in May or June 1920. After the conclusion of the litigation with the reversioners, that is to say on or about 11th March 1929, Pitai and Munda asked defendant 1 to give back possession to them in accordance with the terms of the arrangement under which he had entered into possession. He refused and claimed that he was in possession, not in any fiduciary capacity, but as the agent of his wife who was the malguzarin of the property (the property in dispute being tenancy fields), and that he had obtained possession because the plaintiffs, who became the tenants of the fields under the will as trustees of the temple, were unable to pay the rent to the malguzar and so surrendered the fields. Pitai and Munda were therefore compelled to file a suit for possession. This they did in the Court of the subordinate Judge, Second Class, Jubbulpore, and obtained a decree which was later confirmed by the Court of the Judicial Commissioner. In that suit it was found that there was a trust and that defendant 1 had entered into possession in a fiduciary capacity. A decree for possession was accordingly given in favour of Pitai and Munda as sarbarakars of the temple of Shri Mahadeoji and possession was eventually handed over to them. The present suit is for profits and is consequent on the former litigation. It has been instituted by Shri Mahadeoji through Pitai who claims to be one of the sarbarakars of the plaintiff. In our opinion, this was wrong and the matter will now have to be set right. As the irregularity has not occasioned any injustice and has not misled any of the parties to the dispute and has not resulted in any of the questions at issue being improperly tried, we do not think it will be right to dismiss the suit altogether; nor indeed have we been asked to do so by the other side; in fact the mistake appears to have arisen partly because of the defendants' attitude in the previous case where they insisted that the idol and not the temple should sue. Amendment will therefore meet the ends of justice. The will dedicates the property to the temple and not to the deity. The relevant portion is in the following terms:

> Since the whole property is what I have acquired for myself and whereas I have had a temple of Shree Mahadeoji built in mohalla Bandhaipura, tahsil and district Jubbulpore, and it is my wish to dedicate some property to the temple so that the worship Bhog and expenses of the temple only may be carried out .... I therefore herein below write down the property that I dedicate to the said temple under the name of the temple.

It is clear then that the dedication is to the temple and not to the deity. Therefore whether the temple would have a right of suit or not (a matter on which we express no opinion) the deity Shri Mahadeoji has none. The title to the estate will eventually vest either in the trustees named in the will whoever they may be, or in the temple if it can exist as a juristic entity. But before the title to the property can completely vest in the legatee it is necessary that the assent of the administrators of the will should be obtained: see S. 332, Succession Act, which is in these terms:

> The assent of the executor or administrator is necessary to complete a legatee's title to his legacy.

There is no proof that this has been given. On the contrary, the evidence indicates that it has not. Therefore, in our opinion, the title to this property is still vested in the administrators to the will and consequently they, and neither the legatee or legatees nor the deity, are the persons who at the moment are entitled to sue. One of them, Pitai, has signed the plaint and has instituted the suit on behalf of the deity Shri Mahadeoji. The other Munda was joined as a defendant as he did not wish to join as a plaintiff, but he said that he admitted the claim. As therefore there is no dispute between Munda and himself in this matter, we consider that the ends of justice will be met by allowing Pitai to sue in a representative capacity on behalf of the administrators. The former suit for possession, instituted by Pitai and Munda against defendant 1 was instituted in a Court which was not competent to try the present suit. Therefore its findings are not res judicata and the judgment has no relevance here except to show that they are entitled to immediate possession (that of course is final between the parties) and that therefore they have a prima facie right to sue for profits. That means that we must decide the present case uninfluenced by the decision in the previous suit.

The learned counsel for the plaintiff-appellant objects to this. He says that this objection to his plea of res judicata was not taken in the lower Court and so cannot be raised here because it involves questions of fact, namely the extent of the jurisdiction of the trial Court in the former case. The reply to that is that the burden is on the plaintiff to sustain on his plea. In point of strictness his allegation should have been struck out. He did not raise the plea in his plaint, and in his reply merely stated that the matter is res judicata without setting out the materials necessary for the foundation of such a plea. The defendant therefore had no assertion of fact before him to which he could, or need have, replied. As we have said, the plaintiff's case is that possession of the property was given to defendant 1 in a fiduciary capacity. The allegations are to be found in paras. 5 and 10 of the plaint. They are in these terms :

5. That in May or June 1920 Pitai and Munda (on the advice of the other panchas named in the will with a view to keep the fields immune from the forcible possession of the adverse party namely Mulloo and others) made over to defendant 1 and to be kept in his custody as a trustee for the plaintiff with an express understanding that the fields would be restored to the plaintiff after the conclusion of the dispute of heirship between the disputing parties.

10. That defendants 1 and 2 have been in possession of the fields from May 1920 to March 1931 as trustees on behalf of the plaintiff, and have not paid anything or rendered any account of income from the said fields, and the plaintiff is entitled to get the account explained and receive the profits from the defendants of the period the said defendants have been in possession as trustees.

The only reply which defendant 1 gave to this is : "The allegations in para. 5 are not admitted. This defendant was not created a trustee as stated." Defendant 2 stated :

This defendant has been in possession as malguzar and as against her the claim, if any, is barred by limitation at least till 30th March 1932 under Art. 109, Limitation Act.

Neither defendant has raised the plea taken in the former suit about the inability of the administrators to pay the rent and their surrender to the malguzarin for that reason. They cannot, therefore, as their learned counsel claimed the right to do, take advantage of their pleas in the former suit, especially as their counsel objected to the other side being given a like advantage. Not only is there no plea to this effect in the present suit, but there is no evidence either. So this contention must fail. The contentions of the plaintiff about the manner in which, and the conditions subject to which, possession was delivered to Baldeoprasad are fully borne out by his witness P. W. 10, Kamta, and by the plaintiff, Pitai, as P. W. 15. They make it clear that the land was handed over to defendant 1 for protection and safe custody. (Suprat is the word which Pitai uses.) He was asked to manage it and it was made clear to him that he was to return it at the conclusion of the contest with the reversioners. These witnesses are supported by the jamabandis which show the deity Shri Mahadeoji as the tenant in actual occupation.

On the other side is the evidence of deendant 1, Baldeoprasad, as D. W. 1. He does not say a word about the manner and conditions under which he entered into possession of the property nor of the character in which he held it, nor does he make any attempt to controvert the evidence of P. Ws. 10 and 15. We know also that this defendant attested the will, that he was present when it was scribed, that he appeared before the registering officer when it was registered, that he is the agent of his wife the malguzarin of this property, and that he manages all her affairs. All this renders it unlikely that he would not have known about the will and that this property was trust property. When in addition we find that P. Ws. 10 and 15 are uncontradicted we see no reason why we should not believe them. If believed, and we do believe them, then it is clear that defendant 1 entered into possession in a fiduciary capacity knowing that the property was trust property comprised in a Hindu religious endowment, and that he undertook to return the same on the conclusion of the dispute between the administrators and the reversioners.

The next question is about limitation. The defendant Baldeoprasad was placed in possession in the year 1920 and this suit was not instituted till the year 1935. The plaint is dated 30th March 1935. Profits are claimed for a period of 11 years, that is to say from 1920 till the year in which Pitai and Munda got back possession under the decree in the former suit. Now so far as the right to possession is concerned, it is clear on the facts given above that the defendants, (for defendant 2 has done no act apart from her husband, and though the malguzarin, is little more than a dummy), were in permissive possession throughout, and that they have neither alleged nor proved any assertion of a hostile title. As they entered into possession in a fiduciary character it would be necessary for them to allege and prove an open assertion of a hostile title in order to show that the character of their possession from that point on had changed. Therefore under the ordinary rules of limitation, quite apart from the special rules which apply to trust estates, the defendants could at no time have resisted the claim for possession. But the question of profits does not stand on the same footing. Under the ordinary law of limitation, profits would be claimable only for three or at the outside six years, according as to whether Art. 109 or Art. 120, Limitation Act, applied. But the plaint asserts here that S. 10 applies and so these bars do not apply. Section 10 (omitting matters which do not appertain to this suit) can only apply if the suit is for the proceeds of property which has become vested in the defendant in trust for any specific purpose. The explanation to this section is in the following words:

> For the purposes of this section any property comprised in a Hindu . . . . . religious . . . . . endowment shall be deemed to be property vested in trust for a specific purpose, and the manager of any such property shall be deemed to be the trustee thereof.

In our opinion this point has been settled by their Lordships of the Privy Council. In 44 Mad 831[1] at p. 839 their Lordships decided that when property is gifted or devised to a Hindu temple or deity (it does not matter which) then it vests in the deity or the institution and not in the manager and that consequently S. 10 does not apply because the property cannot be said to have vested in such manager in trust. They reaffirmed this in 50 Cal 329[2] at p. 336. It is true the explanation to S. 10 has now made a difference and that since its introduction the manager of property comprised in a Hindu religious endowment (as also in a Mahomedan or Buddhist one) is deemed by a fiction of law to be a trustee and the property is deemed to be property vested in trust for a specific purpose, but the distinction between the person in whom the property is deemed to be vested and a mere manager of it holding under the former is still there. The seisin to the property, and by this we mean the actual de facto seisin and not necessarily the legal seisin, cannot reside in two persons at one and the same time unless of course they are co-owners or co-trustees holding under one right or one title, and what their Lordships hold is that unless the seisin to the estate resides in the person sued, the section cannot apply. This we think still holds good, the only difference being that by a fiction of law the seisin for the purposes of S. 10 is now deemed to reside in the manager when the conditions laid down in the explanation are fulfilled and that therefore one does not enquire further to see whether someone else is legally seised of the estate. But even now this fictitious seisin must for the limited purposes of this section reside in one person or set of persons and not in two. There cannot be a manager of a manager for the purposes of the explanation.

In 52 Cal 809[3] at p. 816, as also in 44 Mad 831[1] at p. 840, their Lordships of the Privy Council described the position of the shebait as "custodian of the idol and manager of its estate," and, as we have said, in their earlier decisions (before the addition of the explanation to the section), they held that such manager or custodian does not come within the purview of the section. In the same way we think that a mere custodian or manager of property handed over to him for safe custody or management by the legal or de facto manager, (that is to say by the person now deemed to be the trustee because of the explanation to S. 10), cannot be reached by this section either. As regards 52 Bom 184[4] upon which the learned counsel for the plaintiff-appellant relies, that was a case in which property was vested in the defendant as trustee for a specific purpose. There was no doubt about the trust there and it was express. It was not a case of a constructive or resultant trust. That decision therefore does not apply. Who then was the manager within the meaning of the explanation in this case — the administrators, Pitai and Munda, or defendant 1? In our view it was neither, but at best it was the former and not the latter.

Pitai and Munda acted in the previous suit as sarbarakars of the deity, and Pitai (who now sues alone) claims to occupy the same position in this case. It is clear that they entered upon possession of the property in suit, (property comprised in a Hindu religious endowment), because their case has always been that they handed over the property to defendant 1 for safe custody. In doing this they acted either as administrators (in which case S. 10 would not apply as we shall show presently) or they acted as sarbarakars. If they acted as the latter, as they say they did, then they acted as managers of the property and consequently they and not defendant 1 will be deemed to be the trustee within the meaning of S. 10. It would not matter in the least whether they entered upon the estate in that capacity in a legal right or assumed the management without title on their own responsibility, for the explanation to S. 10 applies as much to de facto managers as to those legally entitled. The reason is plain. A person who wrongfully holds as trustee and pretends to act as such cannot turn round and reprobate the right which he asserts and claim to hold adversely to his beneficiary. An estoppel would arise. It was held in 24 C W N 752[5] that a suit against a trustee de son tort for accounts during the period of his occupation lies at the instance of the lawful trustee and that no question of limitation arises. Therefore, if Pitai and Munda entered upon the property as sarbarakars, as they say they did, and assumed management of it in that capacity, then they would not be able to divest themselves of their responsibilities by handing the property over to another, especially as it is clear that they had no intention of abandoning their rights, whatever they may have been. P. W. 10 tells us that:

> There was no settlement as to for how many years the possession was to remain with the malguzar. (He is referring to Baldeo.) There was no agreement about the cultivation during the period of his charge of the land.

P. W. 15 states that the property was placed in the 'suprat' or custody of Baldeo. He says:

> We put the property in defendant's custody for protection during the suit and we asked him to pay malguzar's revenue and then return the field after the suit.

We are of opinion that this was merely an act of management on the part of Pitai and Munda in the same way as the action of a shebait who hands over temple jewels to a bank for safe custody would be. By no stretch of imagination would such an act constitute the bank a 'manager' of the jewels within the meaning of S. 10, nor would it divest the shebait of his responsibility and position. If Baldeo was a trustee at all, and it is possible to argue that he was according to the definition in Snell's Principles of Equity (Edn. 21), p. 126, he would be so in respect of a constructive and not a specific trust. His undertaking was to manage on behalf of Pitai and Munda and to restore the property, (and by implication its proceeds also), to the administrators. His direct responsibility was to them. The specific trusts, if any, would arise in their favour. That alone would be the specific purpose for which the property was vested in him if indeed it vested at all within the meaning of this section. We do not mean to suggest that the actual trustees of the temple would have no right of suit. Of course a person in possession of trust property cannot resist a suit for possession by the rightful owners on the ground that somebody else placed him in possession and that he attorned to them. He would have at the very least to establish that he was a transferee for value who purchased in good faith without notice of the trust. But that is a very different matter from saying that the property vested in him in trust for a specific purpose. As we have said, the only specific purpose deducible in the present case is the obligation to hand the property (and impliedly its proceeds as well) back to Pitai and Munda, whereas the specific purpose required by the section is the specific purpose mentioned in or deducible from the will: see 49 I A 37[6] and 10 Pat 851[7] at p. 870.

We have indicated above that at best Pitai and Munda were the managers within the meaning of the explanation and not Baldeo. That might or might not make them liable in a suit properly framed and instituted against them by the person or persons legally entitled to sue. We say nothing about that here. But it would not necessarily give them a right of suit in that capacity. A trustee de son tort and a de facto manager is subject to the obligations and liabilities of the trustee or manager legally entitled to possession but he does not necessarily have all their rights and powers. In the present case, and on the facts before us, (and again we make it clear that our decision is confined to the facts of this case and must not be taken as establishing a general proposition), we are of opinion that the only right of suit which Pitai and Munda possess is in their capacity as administrators to the will. The will is by no means clear. It dedicates the property to a temple, and then in one place it states:

> All those who belong to my family shall be keeping a supervision over the property of the said temple as long as their lives last;

and in another:

> When there is nobody alive in my family the entire management and supervision of the whole of my property shall rest with the panchas.

These passages would appear to indicate that the testator appointed the members of his family as the managing trustees for the period of their respective lives; and this interpretation is supported by the passage in which the panchas, among them defendant 1 Baldeo, are appointed for superintending the management of the temple I appoint .... as panchas who are to keep an eye on the matter.

But on the other hand the expression "all those who belong to my family" is vague, and even as regards them, all that the earlier passage states is that "they shall be keeping supervision over the property," and this conveys much the same sense as the word "superintending," used in connexion with the panchas. Then the last of these passages runs :

This appears to indicate that the panchas were to have at least joint, though not sole, management of the property so long as members of the family were alive. It is therefore by no means clear that Pitai and Munda were constituted the sarbarakars or managers of this temple under the will. They set up this right in para. 2 of the plaint but it was challenged by Baldeo in para. 2 of his written statement and the plaintiffs were called upon to establish it. Beyond producing the will, they have made no attempt to do so, and the will, as we have said, is not clear. But in any case, even if the will be construed to the utmost in favour of Pitai and Munda, it is clear that they were not made the sole managers of the temple trusts. They have not pretended to act here on behalf of the whole body of trustees (whoever they may be) nor have they shown what right they have to do so. On the contrary they assert that they are the sarbarakars. Therefore we are unable to regard the right of suit as vesting in them in that capacity.

But as we have said they are the administrators to the will and so have a right of suit in that capacity because it is clear that at the date of the cause of action, namely while the property was in the hands of Baldeo, they did not hand it over to the legatee or legatees. They had merely placed Baldeo in possession till the conclusion of their fight with the reversioner of the testator. It follows they had not administered the estate, at any rate not this portion of it, up till then. Therefore in our opinion their real right to sue is as administrators. That being so S. 10 can in no event apply, for they are suing not on behalf of the trusts of the temple but as administrators of the will in order to enable them to administer the estate. This we think follows from the decisions of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 49 I A 37[6] and 10 Pat 851[7] at page 870.

If S. 10 does not apply then the suit will be governed by the ordinary rules of limitation. The only possible articles on this view are 89, 109 and 120. We do not think Art. 109 applies because the receipt of the profits was not wrongful. Baldeo was placed in rightful possession as an agent or manager and he rightfully received the profits in that capacity. It is not his receipt of them that is wrongful but his withholding of them after receipt. As regards Art. 89 we do not think Baldeo was an agent in the sense in which the word is used there. He has been described as a custodian (supratdar) by P.W. 15 and we think that that describes his position. We are of opinion that Art. 120 applies in a case of this kind. The lower Court considered that Art. 62 applied for one period of the occupation, namely from June 1920 to 11th March 1929 and it quoted 37 ALL 40.[8] That ruling has no application here because the person sued there had received actual money and the suit was to recover the sums received. Here the suit is to recover profits and not money. There is therefore no case here of money received by the defendant. Article 62 only applies when the defendant has received money as distinct from profits into his hands.

As regards the remaining period, namely from 11th March 1929 to 31st March 1931, all that the learned Judge says is that the defendant was there as a trespasser during that period. He does not decree the claim for those years and gives no reason for not doing so. But we take it he meant (though he does not say so) that the three years rule would apply from 11th March 1929 to 31st March 1931 and so that portion of the claim is beyond limitation. This would bring the case under Art. 109 but, as we have said, we do not think that a person who has been placed in rightful possession can be regarded as wrongfully receiving the profits during the period of his occupation even though he wrongfully declines to restore possession when he ought to do so. Baldeo was there in a fiduciary capacity and that continued till he parted with possession. The fact that he asserted a hostile title would not relieve him of his fiduciary liabilities until he had perfected that title. Till then he would still in the eye of the law be holding in his fiduciary capacity and would receive the profits in that capacity. Therefore in our opinion Art. 109 does not apply.

8. ('14) 1 AIR 1914 All 544: 27 I C 533: 37 All 40: 12 A L J 1256, Masih-ud-din v. Imtiaz-un-nissa Bibi.

The suit was instituted on 30th March 1935 and so the plaintiff is not entitled to profits received before 30th March 1929. We gather from the lower Court's judgment that the defendants were in possession down to 31st March 1931. Therefore two years' profits is all that can be claimed. What these would come to has not yet been determined. The lower Court considered the issue (No. 6) unnecessary. It will therefore be necessary to remand the case for determination of the following issue: "What were the amount or profits received by the defendants from the six fields in suit during the period 30th March 1929 to 31st March 1931"? The record together with the findings will be returned on or before 1st October 1939. A fortnight's time will be allowed for the filing of objections. (After receiving the findings their Lordships delivered the following further judgment.) Continuing our judgment, dated 27th July 1939, the findings have now been received. The lower Court holds that the gross income from the fields during each of the two years in question was Rs. 186. The rent paid was Rs. 40-12-0. So the annual net income was Rs. 145-12-0. The plaintiff-appellant contests these findings. His main grievance is that he was not allowed to adduce fresh evidence. The lower Court's reasons for shutting out further evidence is that the matter had already been put in issue before remand and the evidence was already there.

The issue already framed and the one remitted by us are not the same. The old issue asks what was the "proper annual income" from the fields. The issue we remitted asks what were the actual profits received. We are not concerned in a suit of this kind with what ought to have been received but with what was actually received, so there can be no doubt that the lower Court has not understood the difference between the two issues. However, as the plaintiff is the one who is making a grievance out of this what we have to see is whether he has been prejudiced. We do not think he has. It is unlikely that anyone would get more out of the property than it was worth. In any case, it is clear that the plaintiff would not underestimate the profits which he is claiming and aim at a figure lower than that which represents the actual receipts. Therefore, before remand his evidence would always be reaching out for the higher figure. It follows that if he wanted to mend his attitude after remand it could only have been in the direction of scaling down his previous claim. Consequently he is not prejudiced by a decision which still allowed him to strive for an inflated figure.

To be more precise. Before remand the plaintiff's evidence on the old issue could only have been along two lines: (1) to show what the fields ought to have fetched with proper management and (2) to show what they actually fetched, this with a view to show that in no event could his claim be allowed to fall below this figure. After remand, under the new issue he could not do more than show what they ought to have fetched: this, not because he would be entitled to that, but by way of showing that the defendants' figures are not to be relied upon. Therefore either way, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, he would be striving to prove much the same thing before and after remand. It follows that he is not prejudiced by the frame of the new issue and the shutting out of further evidence in support of it. We can understand the defendant having been prejudiced, but he does not complain and is content to accept the figure now reached by the lower Court. The plaintiff argued that his evidence before remand was only general. But that was his own fault. The issue was specific enough: "What would be the proper annual income from every one of the six fields in the years in question?" He was required therefore to direct his attention to each field and to each year and not to some vague general issue. The objections to the findings are dismissed. The lower Court's decree dismissing the plaintiff's suit is set aside and the plaintiff's claim will now be decreed for Rs. 291-4-0 and dismissed as regards the rest. Costs will be proportionate to success and failure throughout.

STONE C. J. AND CLARKE J.

Ramgulzarilal Jagmohanlal Agarwal and another—Transferees

— Appellants

v.

Bhanuprasad Jamunaprasad Sao Agarwal — Respondent.

Misc. Appeal No. 181 of 1938, Decided on 18th October 1940, from order of Dist. Judge, Raipur, D/- 7th March 1938.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 41, R. 23 — Appellate Judge passing remand order on question of limitation—This does not mean that he has confirmed findings of lower Court on questions apart from that of limitation.

From the fact that the appellate Judge who passed the remand order found it necessary to pass a remand order on the question of limitation he cannot be taken to have confirmed the finding of the lower Court, apart from the question of limitation. Every case of remand must be considered on its own facts : A I R 1922 P C 51, Expl. [Question apart from the question of limitation was not decided.] [P 190 C 2; P 191 C 1]

(b) Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 54— Question of fraudulent preference decided by lower Court on ground of onus of proof — Decision can be challenged in second appeal.

The finding of the lower appellate Court on the question of fraudulent preference would ordinarily be one of fact and outside the province of High Court sitting in second appeal, but whether the burden has been correctly laid or not is a question of law and can be considered in second appeal. [P 191 C 1]

(c) Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 54— Onus of proof—Transfers by insolvent of all his property on eve of insolvency—Transfers being in respect of old debts and made in favour of relation — Other acts of preference in favour of other creditors in evidence—Onus to prove that transfers are not fraudulent is shifted on to transferees.

It is true that the onus to prove that the transfer is fraudulent is initially on the person applying for annulment but where the evidence shows that with the exception of a small residential house the insolvent transferred all his property on the eve of bankruptcy and the transfers are in respect of old debts and are made in favour of a relation and there is evidence of other acts of preference in favour of other creditors, committed by the debtor shortly before or after the transaction impugned, these circumstances are quite sufficient to shift the onus of proof on to the transferees : Case law reviewed. [P 194 C 1, 2]

(d) Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 54— Transfer by insolvent of his village share by sale of proprietary rights and surrender of occupancy rights—S. 54 can operate on surrender deed.

A surrender is certainly a transfer of an interest in property. Where the insolvent has tried to transfer the whole of his village share by the device of doing it in two stages : (a) by selling the proprietary rights and (b) by surrendering the occupancy rights, the whole transaction amounts to one complete transfer of the whole of the village share and S. 54 operates on the deed of surrender. [P 194 C 2]

M. B. Kinkhede and A. R. Kulkarni— for Appellants.

M. Adhikari and N. K. Banerji — for Respondent.

Judgment. — This is an appeal by the transferees of a 5 annas share of a village. The transfer was brought by means of two documents, a sale deed of the proprietary rights dated 27th February 1932 for Rs. 5000 and a surrender deed of cultivating rights in sir fields, effected two days later on 29th February 1932 for Rs. 950, both documents being registered on 4th March 1932. The insolvency Court has annulled this transaction under S. 54, Provincial Insolvency Act. Three questions arise for consideration : (a) whether the insolvency Court having once held that the transaction did not amount to a fraudulent preference was by reason of a remand from the appellate Court entitled to alter its opinion and come to a fresh conclusion that it did; (b) whether the finding that the transaction amounted to a fraudulent preference was correct on the evidence as it stands; and (c) whether the surrender of the cultivating rights in sir was a transaction on which S. 54, Provincial Insolvency Act, could operate.

In order to understand these questions it is necessary to state some facts and the previous history of the litigation. The transferor of the village share is one Banmali Lal, who before these insolvency proceedings commenced, was a cloth merchant at Raipur. He owned a shop in the Sadar Bazar worth Rs. 6000, a residential house worth about Rs. 1000 and the village share with which we are concerned, which we may take it to be worth approximately the price which it has fetched viz., Rs. 6000. His business was not a flourishing one and he ran into debt. The debts proved in his insolvency amount to some Rs. 15,000. On 13th December 1931, he mortgaged his shop with one Balkishan Nathani, the consideration for the mortgage being Rs. 3000 of old debts. The mortgage deed was registered on 10th March 1932. On 27th and 29th February 1932 he executed the two documents with which we are concerned in this appeal and registered them as stated on 4th March 1932. On 16th June 1932 another creditor Bhanu Prasad presented a petition to adjudicate Banmali Lal insolvent. The three transactions which we have mentioned were set out in the petition as the acts of insolvency which justified the petition. An order of adjudication was passed on 11th April 1933 before which date Banmali Lal appears also to have successfully disposed of his stock in trade and moveables. Thus at the date of his adjudication he had only one house in his possession worth about Rs. 1000 and had got rid of his immovable property worth some Rs. 12,000. On 23rd December 1933 Bhanu Prasad applied to have all these three transactions annulled under Ss. 53 and 54, Provincial Insolvency Act.

The Court took up the case of the mortgage of the house separately from that of the sale and surrender of the village share. He passed orders in the case of the village share on 21st February 1935 holding that the transaction fell neither under S. 53 nor S. 54 and so he dismissed the application for annulment. Bhanu Prasad appealed to the District Judge against this order, but before the District Judge had disposed of the appeal on 10th September 1935 the lower Court on 15th July 1935 disposed of the other annulment application in respect of the house property and in that case he held that the transaction fell under S. 54 but not under S. 53 of the Act and so he annulled that transaction. That case also went to the District Judge on appeal and was dismissed on 4th November 1936 and a revision application to the High Court was also dismissed on 12th November 1937. That brought the contention to an end in respect of the house property, the finding being that it was a fraudulent preference which attracted the provisions of S. 54. Meanwhile, on 10th September 1935, the District Judge had remanded the matter of the village share in the following terms, omitting unnecessary words:

> It is argued on behalf of the appellant (Bhanu Prasad) that the debts for the satisfaction of which the two transfers were made were barred by limitation. On the date of those transfers. . . the learned counsel for the respondents . . . . stated that this point was not raised before the lower Court and . . . that he had in his possession documents which clearly showed that the debts were within limitation on the date of the transfers. . . . The question whether the debts were barred by limitation on the date of the transfers is an important question and . . . without a proper decision on it the case cannot be decided satisfactorily . . . on this point. I therefore . . . . remand the case for proper pleadings on this point of limitation. Fresh opportunity should be given to the parties to lead evidence. . . .

After remand, the subordinate Judge framed six fresh issues all of which dealt with the point of limitation and the applicants proceeded to give evidence bearing on that point alone. Then in spite of finding the point of limitation in favour of the transferees the trial Court reconsidered its previous finding that the transfers were not a fraudulent preference, and on this occasion it held that they were a fraudulent preference. Before us learned counsel for the appellant-transferees urged that this volte face on the part of the lower Court was illegal; it was only asked to find on a point of limitation and instead of confining itself to that point it proceeded to reconsider its previous finding on the merits. Objection to that action on the part of the trial Court was also made to the lower appellate Court where the learned District Judge, who was a different officer from the Judge who passed the order of remand, observed that the point was not devoid of force but that as his learned predecessor had set aside the lower Court's order completely it must be presumed that he was acting under S. 151, Civil P. C., and not under O. 41, R. 25 and so he held that the case was open once more before the lower Court which was quite justified in coming to a different conclusion if it thought it proper to do so. That the lower appellate Court was wrong in its view of the matter is the subject of the first of the three questions which we have set out at the commencement of the order as requiring our consideration.

Learned counsel for the appellants contends that from the fact that Mr. Mangalmurti who passed the remand order found it necessary to pass a remand order on the question of limitation should be taken to have confirmed the finding of the lower Court, apart from the question of limitation, and reliance is placed on A I R 1922 P C 51[1] where their Lordships have held that where a remand was ordered on one of the two points raised, any one of which would have been sufficient to dispose of the case, the remand order must be deemed to have confirmed the decision on other point. The facts there however were very different from the facts before us. There the question was whether an application for execution of a decree was within limitation in 1916, and in order to decide that question it was necessary to establish that there had been previous execution proceedings in 1904 and that the judgment-debtor had been served with notice of execution in 1916. The Judge of the lower Court considered the question whether there had been previous execution proceedings in 1904 and came to the conclusion that there had, but his judgment did not reveal whether he had considered the question as to the judgment-debtor being served with notice in 1916. The High Court therefore remanded the case for a finding on this second point. Their Lordships of the Privy Council therefore observed that the High Court must be taken to have agreed with the lower Court as to what took place in 1904, because otherwise it would not have been necessary to remand the case for a finding about the service of notice in 1916. From our study of the case it does not appear to us that their Lordships intended to lay down any principle of universal application in A I R 1922 P C 51.[1] They appear to have been adverting only to the special circumstances in the case before them. It seems to us that every case of a remand must be considered on its own facts. Here Mr. Mangalmurti clearly had not at all considered the correctness of the lower Court's findings; in fact he says :

> The question whether the debts were barred by limitation on the date of the transfers is an important question and will affect the decision on other points. Without a proper decision on it the case cannot be decided satisfactorily.

This shows that he was leaving the question undecided until he had the lower Court's finding on the point of limitation before him. It was therefore the duty of his successor when the case returned from the lower Court to decide the points which were raised in the appeal. Whatever was his view of the correctness or otherwise of the lower Court in reopening the question whether the transfer amounted to a fraudulent preference, he still had to decide that question himself on appeal and he has decided it in favour of Bhanu Prasad. We are not therefore concerned in this Court with the correctness of the original Court's action. In other words even though we proceed on the basis of the original findings of the insolvency Court on the question of undue preference this makes no practical difference as the finding that is binding on us as a finding of fact is the finding of the lower appellate Court. We next take up the second question for determination and this is the real crux of the matter, namely whether the lower appellate Court rightly decided the question of fraudulent preference. This finding would ordinarily be one of fact and outside our province sitting in second appeal, but in the present case the learned District Judge has decided it by reason of his view as to where the onus of proof lies since he considers the evidence to be unsatisfactory on both sides. Whether the burden has been correctly laid or not is a question of law. The learned District Judge has said in para. 6 of his judgment :

> As regards the onus it is on the applicant, but it is not a fixed onus and once it is shown that a creditor has been preferred by the debtor on the eve of his bankruptcy, the onus to prove good faith is shifted on the transferee creditor. In the present case, neither party has led every good evidence but the respondent has shown that barring a house, which also was at the same time mortgaged by the insolvent, all the available property was transferred by him in favour of the appellants. These transfers were effected on the eve of bankruptcy and it was necessary for the appellant to prove the motive of the debtor in making the transfers in their favour. The debtor was examined as N.A.W. 3, but he does not say a word as to why the transfers were effected by him. There is also no appreciable evidence of any pressure having been brought on the insolvent for effecting the transfers. The transfers thus, for all purposes, appear to be a voluntary act of the debtor and it amounts to a fraudulent preference.

The learned Judge is quite correct that the burden is initially on the applicant. That is now settled law, but is he correct in saying that the burden is shifted once it is shown that a creditor has in fact been preferred on the eve of bankruptcy? He has not given any authority for his view but there are quite a number of authorities which support him as well as a number which do not. Of those which support him we would mention (1924) 2 Ch 515[2] at p. 531, A I R 1926 Sind 123,[3] 107 I C 210,[4] A I R 1932 Lah 321,[5] A I R 1935 Cal 190[6] and I L R (1938) 2 Cal 275.[7] On the other side, inter alia, is the dissenting judgment of Pollock, M. R. in (1924) 2 Ch 515[2] which, being the opinion of so eminent a Judge, deserves great respect. In most of the cases to which we have referred there are other cogent circumstances which have combined to satisfy the Court that the transfer then under consideration was fraudulent or was not fraudulent as the case might be. In (1859) 25 Beav 88=53 E R 569[8] Sir J. Romilly M. R. observes, in a case which was a debtor's petition :

> Fraudulent preference is of two sorts: one is, when a man, on the eve of bankruptcy, knowing he is about to become bankrupt, of his own mere motion and will, sends to a creditor, informs him of the fact, and gives him some property, in order that the creditor may obtain something for himself over and above that which he can get by proving under the bankruptcy that is a fraudulent preference. But it must proceed voluntarily from the bankrupt himself, for if the creditor comes and insists on being paid or on having security, the fact of the debtor giving way and acceding to the request does not make it a fraudulent preference...
> The amount of pressure is not a matter of very considerable importance, because, to make the transaction fraudulent, the preference must proceed voluntarily from the bankrupt himself, which it does not if he be induced to do it by the pressure of the creditor whether it be much or little.

In this case I cannot see anything to satisfy me that it was voluntary. The letters show that Fesenmeyer was insisting that Archbutt should pay or secure the amount due to him.

If, in point of fact, he had assigned all his stock-in-trade and everything by which he could carry on business, and which would have rendered it impossible to carry on business except at the mere will and pleasure of the assignee of the property, the case might have been different . . . . .

. . . To render it (the transaction) invalid, there must be a disposition on the part of the insolvent to favour that particular creditor, and this is generally shown by the fact that the first step or proposal towards the disposal of the property in favour of that creditor proceeds from the insolvent debtor. But if the creditor, although he knows that the debtor is insolvent, presses and insists upon having a security for his debt, and the debtor yields to that pressure, and gives the security, although it may be well known to both, at the same time, that the effect will be to give to that particular creditor an advantage over the other creditors of the insolvent, the transaction, in my opinion, is perfectly good and valid.

In (1876) 2 Ch 127[9] a solicitor, shortly before absconding as an insolvent debtor, had given securities to the defendant, who was one of his clerks and a bona fide creditor. The bankrupt left on 28th October 1872 having two days previously signed a declaration admitting his inability to pay his debts. The defendant had been pressing for security. It was held, on a suit by the trustee in bankruptcy to set aside the securities as being a fraudulent preference, that the pressure and promise were sufficient to rebut the presumption of a fraudulent preference arising from the circumstances and would sustain the deeds even if the knowledge of the insolvency were brought home to the defendant. The learned Vice-Chancellor who delivered the judgment in that case says at page 134 :

A debtor must not of his own mere motion, without pressure or application, give a security to a creditor on the eve of bankruptcy, and if he does, that is a fraudulent preference. But if there be any pressure or negotiation for a security on the part of the creditor, then the fact that the creditor knows the debtor to be in embarrassed circumstances is no objection to the validity of the security; and at p. 136 there is the following passage:

If there is a mixed motive, if the debtor is partly influenced by a demand of the creditor, or by negotiations with him, the act is not a purely voluntary act, and is not a fraudulent preference, although the creditor may be a friend whom the debtor wishes to prefer. In the present case, I think that there was a bona fide demand for security, and then a bona fide negotiation as to what the security should be; and though the debtor might know that he was hopelessly insolvent, he did not contemplate immediate bankruptcy, but was trying to stave it off; and then another passage at p. 137 :

. . . . Therefore I consider the law to be settled that, if there be a bona fide negotiation for security and the security be given on the very eve of the bankruptcy, and the person taking the security knows the debtor was hopelessly insolvent, the transaction is valid according to law, and that everything depends upon the bona fides of the transaction.

In (1901) 1 K B 710,[10] a case of a creditor's petition, the petition was presented on 2nd June grounded on an act of bankruptcy committed on the previous 17th May, and on 27th June a receiving order was made against him and adjudication followed. The bankrupt being a solicitor had committed a breach of trust of his client's money and deposited his own securities to make good the loss and it was admitted that throughout May the bankrupt was hopelessly insolvent and that he was aware of his insolvency, also that he had committed similar breaches of trust in some thirty other trust estates and had attempted to make similar restitution in some cases but not in others. Vaughan Williams L. J. in the Court of appeal says :

If a man on the eve of bankruptcy makes a payment to a particular creditor, the presumption immediately arises that he makes that payment with the dominant view of giving a preference to that creditor over his other creditors. There is not need for any evidence that that view was expressed in so many words by the bankrupt: it is a presumption which would arise from the transaction. Now then, suppose that, in addition to that fact of payment on the eve of bankruptcy, there is also proof that the money so paid was paid by the bankrupt in order to make good a breach of trust : in that case it appears to me that the presumption arising from the fact of that payment being on the eve of bankruptcy would cease to operate: it would be negatived. There prima facie it appears to me that, if you have no other considerations at all, the proper inference is that the presumption of an intention to prefer is dislodged, and the presumption is the other way. Of course that presumption would not be conclusive; one must look round and see what other circumstances there are . . . One has to look at the circumstances at the time, and see from them what his dominant view was.

The case in (1924) 2 Ch 515,[2] so far as the opinions of the majority of the Court are concerned, supports the view of the learned District Judge, but Pollock M. R. in a dissenting judgment is of a different opinion. In that case the bankrupt passed post-dated cheques to 108 creditors and on the day before the cheques matured paid off one of the creditors in cash taking back the cheque which had been sent to that creditor. On a creditor's petition being presented the trustee in bankruptcy moved for the cancellation of this transaction as being a fraudulent preference. There was apparently no reason why the bankrupt should have selected this creditor for payment out of 108 creditors to whom he was indebted. Pollock M. R. having stated that the initial onus lay on the trustee to give evidence that the debtor's dominant motive was to prefer the creditor, observes that evidence of kinship would prima facie discharge the onus upon the trustee:

> There are other facts which do likewise; and if the onus is discharged, no doubt the debtor must then displace the prima facie evidence of a dominant intention to prefer given by the trustee. This can be done by proving that the payment was made under pressure, or for one or other of the many reasons indicated by Phillimore J. in (1913) 2 K B 80[11] at p. 85. But the trustee must discharge the onus that lies upon him. Has he done so here? No doubt all the attending circumstances should be taken into account . . . The fact that a number of cheques were sent out by the debtor on 20th July does not appeal to be indicative of anything more than that the debtor expected to have means at his service with which to meet them when they fell due on 31st July. No doubt there is the fact of the payment with its attendant result of preference on 30th July, but there is no more. We are not at liberty . . . to accept that fact as sufficient. I cannot speculate or surmise in order to supply the deficiency. Without evidence, the matter must be left where it is, unexplained, and without any character given to, or purpose proved in relation to, the mere payment . . . .

The other two learned Judges who delivered judgments in that case considered that the onus had shifted to the transferee who had failed to discharge it. After stating the facts, Warrington L. J. at p. 538 says:

> The payment was purely voluntary. No threat of proceedings had been held out by the appellants. No special consequences of an unpleasant nature, such as those the effect of which was considered in (1899) A C 419,[12] from the non-payment of the debt were to be apprehended. It was not long overdue. The debtor had only ten days earlier taken the step of sending to the 108 creditors post-dated cheques all payable on the same day, 31st July—thus putting them all on an equality. Then on 30th July, at a time when he must have already determined to give the notice of suspension actually given on the next day, he selects the particular creditor and pays him in full with money which but for such payment would have been distributed amongst the creditors generally. The conclusion seems to me to be inevitable. The payment being purely voluntary and the circumstances attending it being what I have described, I must and do infer that, for some reason or another of which we are ignorant, or for no definite reason in fact and for no other motive, he selected the particular creditors for preferential treatment, and therefore made the payment with a view to preferring them. I can find no rule of law which prevents me from drawing what seems to me an obvious inference.

It is true there is here nothing of any special nature in the relations between the bankrupt and the particular creditors tending to make probable a desire to prefer them. But the absence of such a circumstance which, if it were present, would make the inference easier, does not prevent its being drawn if the other circumstances lead to it.

This was in substance also the opinion of Sargent L. J. At p. 544 he says:

> No case has been cited to us nor do I think any case can be found where a debtor in imminent expectation of bankruptcy has given a preference in fact to a particular creditor, which is apparently voluntary and is wholly unexplained, and where that preference in fact has been held good. To hold otherwise in this case would, in my judgment, be inconsistent with the whole course of decision in bankruptcy in such cases and would revolutionise the settled law in this respect. . . . . A clearer case of knowledge of immediate impending bankruptcy and of a purely voluntary payment it would be difficult to imagine.

Turning now to cases from India, the view of the Sind Judicial Commissioner's Court, as expressed in A I R 1926 Sind 123[3] and 107 I C 210,[4] appears to be that the onus is in the first instance on the official receiver to prove that the dominant or the substantial or effective, though not necessarily the sole motive, the insolvent had in view in making such payments was to prefer that particular creditor:

> But the onus is shifted on to the bankrupt to prove the contrary when he makes such payments on the eve of his bankruptcy. There is in such a case no need for any evidence that that view was expressed in so many words by the bankrupt. Where the reason of such payment remains unexplained, it is competent for the Court to hold that a prima facie case of fraudulent preference has been established and to act on it.

In 107 I C 210[4] a Bench of the same High Court considered that the onus is shifted if it is proved that the insolvent made the payment or transferred the property in discharge of an old debt and on the eve of bankruptcy. In A I R 1931 ALL 142,[13] the case of a debtor's petition, the Allahabad High Court appears to have held the view that in view of the fact that the initiative came from the insolvent that would have been enough to shift the onus but for the fact that a suit was pending against the insolvent on the part of the transferees and therefore their Lordships considered that there was pressure which saved the transaction from being a fraudulent preference. In A I R 1932 Lah 321[5] Addison J. follows the Sind rulings, to which we have referred above, and comes to the same conclusion that the mortgage being effected on the eve of bankruptcy and in lieu of an old debt it was for the mortgagee to establish that he brought pressure upon his debtor and if he failed to do so the transaction must be taken to be a fraudulent preference. In A I R 1934 Rang 208[14] a Bench considered a number of English cases, including some of those which we have mentioned above, and came to the conclusion that it made a considerable difference as to whether the insolvent was disposing of all his property or only a portion of his property. In A I R 1935 Cal 190[15] the lower Court had found that the receiver had failed to discharge the onus of proving fraudulent preference. The High Court pointed out that the lower Court had overlooked the very important circumstance that payment was made very shortly before the application for insolvency was filed and this would show that undue preference was intended. That was also a debtor's petition. Finally in I L R (1938) 2 Cal 275[7] Mukherjea J. observed :

> If a debtor transfers a valuable property on the eve of insolvency to a creditor of his, the consideration being the past debt due to the creditor, an inference of undue preference can legitimately be drawn. But if the debtor approaches a creditor for a loan and substantial advance is made by the latter who insists as a part of the same bargain, on the payment of the existing debt, the debtor consenting to it cannot be said to have voluntarily given preference to the creditor.

It appears to us in the light of the observations of so many learned Judges who have handled the matter that as regards the shifting of the onus of proof some distinction should be made between debtors' and creditors' petitions. In the same class as debtor's petition we would also place those creditors' petitions which are the result of acts of insolvency which leave no doubt but that the debtor is contemplating insolvency as for instance, where he absconds or gives notice to his creditors that he has suspended or is about to suspend payment. In such cases, we think, that it would take a smaller amount of evidence to shift the onus of proof on to the creditor who seeks to annul the transaction. Where however a creditor files a petition and puts forward as an act of insolvency the very transaction which he subsequently seeks to annul, then we think that something more than the mere making of payment on the eve of insolvency is required. How much more would depend on the circumstances of the individual case. In the present case the evidence shows that with the exception of a small residential house the insolvent transferred all his property on the eve of bankruptcy. The transfers which are before us were in respect of old debts and were made in favour of a relation, although not a close relation.

Then again the mortgage of the house to Balkishan about the same time had already been annulled as a fraudulent preference and it has been laid down in (1913) 2 K B 80[11] that where a trustee in bankruptcy attacks a transaction between a debtor and his creditor as a fraudulent preference, evidence of other acts of preference in favour of other creditors, committed by the debtor shortly before or after the transaction impugned, is admissible to show the debtor's intent. This was followed by Pollock J. in I L R (1937) Nag 78.[16] We consider that these circumstances were quite sufficient to shift the onus of proof on to the transferees. They have endeavoured to show that there was pressure, but evidence of such pressure consists only in the statement of Firturam (N. A. W. 2), a servant of the transferees, that they wanted to file a suit for the amount due to them, but they had not issued any notice to the debtors, they had only mentioned the matter orally. In the circumstances we are accordingly of the opinion that the learned Judge committed no error of law in placing the onus of proof where he did and that his finding cannot be disturbed.

There now remains the last point about whether the surrender deed was a transaction on which S. 54 could operate. For this learned counsel for the appellants relies on A I R 1925 Nag 455[17] and 26 N L R 46.[18] The former of these cases was not a case under the Provincial Insolvency Act at all. The question was whether a surrender deed was an alienation within the meaning of R. 11, Sch. 3, Civil P. C. For the purposes of the Insolvency Act, "transfer of property" has been stated in S. 2 (1) (f) to include a transfer of any interest in property. A surrender is certainly a transfer of an interest in property. 26 N L R 46[18] is a case in which as a result of an order of adjudication the insolvent's property vested in the receiver. The Court held that the cultivating rights in sir could not vest in the receiver because on the loss of the proprietary rights the insolvents became occupancy tenants of their sir land. Such a case is quite different from the case before us where the insolvent has tried to transfer the whole of his village share by the device of doing it in two stages: (a) by selling the proprietary rights and (b) by surrendering the occupancy rights. The whole transaction has to be taken together and amounts to one complete transfer of the whole of the village share. Accordingly, we see no reason to interfere with the findings of the lower appellate Court. The appeal is dismissed with costs. Counsel's fee Rs. 50.

STONE C. J. AND CLARKE J.

Surajmal Govindram Agarwal, Akola and another — Appellants

v.

Baxiram Rodmal Firm, Akola — Respondents.

Misc. Appeal No. 196 of 1938, Decided on 10th September 1940, from order of Second Addl. Dist. Judge, Akola, D/- 30th April 1938.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 144 — Under S. 144 court rate of interest must be taken as fairly compensating litigant — Evidence to determine rate of interest is not necessary unless some special reason is shown—Reason for adducing evidence being to increase interest or to reduce it — No evidence is necessary — Court rate is proper.

Under S. 144 the court rate must always be taken as the rate that fairly compensates litigants. No evidence need be taken for the purpose of determining the rate of interest to be awarded under S. 144 unless some special reason is shown. Where the reason stated, on the one hand to increase the interest and on the other hand to reduce it, is irrelevant the court rate must be deemed to be the proper one : (1871) L R 3 P C 465 and ('35) 22 A I R 1935 P C 12, Rel. on. [P 196 C 2]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 144— A suing B and seeking to attach his property — C standing surety for B to extent of Rs. 54,000—A obtaining decree for Rs. 96,000 and realising Rs. 54,000 from C — After five years, A's decree reduced in appeal to Rs. 33,000 — Disallowance of interest after date of suit by appellate Court held did not affect quantum of amount to which A found entitled — C held entitled to refund of amount paid in excess of Rs. 33,000 and interest at court rate.

A in his suit against B sought to attach B's property before judgment whereupon C stood surety for B to the extent of Rs. 54,000. A obtained a decree for Rs. 96,000 and realised the sum of Rs. 54,000 from C but after five years the decretal amount was reduced to Rs. 33,000 in appeal. The appeal Court granted the decree for the amount as it stood at the date of the suit. In C's claim for restitution :

Held that the fact that the appellate Court disallowed interest to A from the date of the suit did not affect the quantum of the amount to which he was found entitled and therefore C could claim by way of restitution only the amount paid by him in excess of Rs. 33,000 with interest at the court rate from the date of over-payment until the date of payment back. Judgment. — This miscellaneous appeal raises the question as to the proper procedure to be followed where restitution is claimed under S. 144, Civil P. C., in order to ascertain whether interest should be granted and if so at what rate. It is said by the appellants that in this case the learned Judge having indicated that he would take evidence on the question of the loss suffered, he settled the issues so as to include the following question, 3 (a) Whether interest is claimable or not in this claim for restitution. 3 (b) How much interest should be allowed ?

He however proceeded to deal with that issue without giving the patries time to adduce any evidence to show at what rate interest should be allowed. It has been indicated before us on the one hand that if the learned Judge had gone into the evidence he would have found that in point of fact the appellants are entitled to no interest at all except as regards Rs. 2000 because as regards Rs. 20,000 the judgment-debtor had deposited that sum with the surety and accordingly the surety had not been out of pocket. They paid Rs. 22,000 too much to the decree-holder, but they got Rs. 20,000 in hand from the judgment-debtor and consequently, apart from interest on Rs. 2000, no damage was suffered by the surety. On the other hand, it is suggested that if we went into the evidence we should find that this surety had had to borrow money at an extremely high rate of interest as a consequence of having to pay out too much to the decree-holder and that therefore he is entitled to claim by way of damages interest at the rate he had paid.

Had we thought that either of those matters was relevant, we should have considered it necessary to remand this case for the taking of evidence. But we think that the true principle upon which Courts should operate in these restitution matters when considering interest, whether interest should be granted and if so at what rate, is laid down by the Privy Council in an appeal from the Supreme Court of Hongkong reported in (1871) L R 3 P C 465[1] followed by the Privy Council in A I R 1935 P C 12.[2] Before examining that principle it is desirable to state shortly what the facts here are : A sued B and having filed his suit applied to the Court for an attachment before judgment. In order to avoid having his property attached, B offered to find a surety and he found C whom the Court accepted and who stood surety for the decretal amount up to a maximum of Rs. 54,000. In point of fact, the decree that the trial Court passed was for Rs. 96,000 and thereupon the decree-holder operating under S. 145, Civil P. C., proceeded in execution against the surety and recovered from him up to the maximum for which the surety was liable, that is to say Rs. 54,000. As regards the balance he proceeded against the judgment-debtor. The steps he took against the judgment-debtor we need not consider. The judgment-debtor appealed and on appeal, which was heard some five years later, the appellate Court cut down the decree from over Rs. 95,000 to under rupees 35,000, to be accurate Rs. 31,433 together with interest from a certain date at 6 per cent. and made certain adjustments as regards costs.

As a consequence, it is apparent that C had paid too much and it is not disputed before us what the quantum was of the excess. It is Rupees 21,285-12-0. That is the amount that C can recover and to that amount under the powers conferred upon the Court by S. 144 can be added an additional amount by way of interest or an additional amount by way of damages and so forth. What is under discussion here is the amount that should be added by way of interest. In the case from Hongkong the Court in Hongkong when giving restitution was asked also to award interest and the Court refused to do so on the ground that it considered that it had no power. Such a question in view of the terms of S. 144, Civil P. C., could not arise in India. The matter went before the Judicial Committee and the Judicial Committee held as a matter of general principle and justice that a Court had power to grant interest because, to use the language of the Earl of Cairns, their Lordships are of opinion, that one of the first and highest duties of all Courts is to take care that the act of the Court does no injury to any of the suitors, and when the expression "the act of the Court" is used, it does not mean merely the act of the primary Court, or of any intermediate Court of appeal, but the act of the Court as a whole, from the lowest Court which entertains jurisdiction over the matter up to the highest Court which finally disposes of the case. It is the duty of the aggregate of those tribunals, if I may use the expression, to take care that no act of the Court in the course of the whole of the proceedings does an injury to the suitors in the Court.

It is contended, on the part of the respondents here, that the principal sum being restored to the present petitioners, they have no right to recover from them any interest. It is obvious that, if that is so, injury, and very grave injury, will be done to the petitioners. They will by reason of an act of the Court have paid a sum which it is now ascertained was ordered to be paid by mistake and wrongfully. They will recover that sum after the lapse of a considerable time, but they will recover it without the ordinary fruits which are derived from the enjoyment of money. On the other hand, those fruits will have been enjoyed, or may have been enjoyed, by the person who by mistake and by wrong obtained possession of the money under a judgment which has been reversed. So far therefore as principle is concerned, their Lordships have no doubt or hesitation in saying that injustice will be done to the petitioners, and that the perfect judicial determination which it must be the object of all Courts to arrive at, will not have been arrived at unless the persons who have had their money improperly taken from them have the money restored to them, with interest, during the time that the money has been withheld.

In that case the bank that was claiming the interest was complaining that it had lost the use of this money. Their Lordships did not, however, order any enquiry to find out what the damage was. They proceeded entirely on the basis that justice was met by giving the ordinary court rate, for their order at p. 477 was that they directed the court to add to the sums repaid by the respondents to the appellants for principal and interest, the interest due on the said sums at the rate usually allowed by the Supreme Court of Hong Kong, from the (date of the overpayment) to the (date of restitution.)

We think that the court rate must always be taken as the rate that fairly compensates litigants unless there be some special reason shown to the contrary. The only doubt we felt was whether it should not be open to a litigant to adduce evidence to show that some special reason exists in this case especially as the learned Judge had rather indicated that he would be taking evidence in future or to determine issue 3 (b). But as we have already said the two points put before us as a reason on the one hand to increase the interest and on the other hand to reduce it would be quite irrelevant and no other special ground has been indicated, and therefore we think that the court rate is the proper rate.

2. ('35) 22 A I R 1935 P C 12 : 153 I C 654 (P C), Guran Ditta v. T. R. Ditta.

That leads to the other point which has been argued and which we think is entirely without substance. It is said that in the suit in which a decree was eventually given for Rs. 33,000 and odd after the Court of first instance had given a decree for Rs. 96,000 the appellate Court indicated its displeasure at the behaviour of the plaintiff by disallowing interest throughout, and indeed in effect restricted the right of the plaintiff to be paid anything to a date as from the date of the judgment. Therefore, it is said that when in point of fact five years before operating under the decree for Rs. 96,000 the plaintiff got the surety to pay him Rs. 54,000 in truth and in fact he was not entitled to anything if you look at the matter with the eyes of the final appellate Court. Therefore, the surety did not merely pay Rs. 21,285-12-0 too much, he paid Rs. 54,000 too much. Therefore he should now be allowed restitution on the basis of Rs. 54,000 overpaid, interest on Rs. 54,000 overpaid, interest to be calculated at the rate he had to pay and the decree-holder should only be allowed as from the date of the appellate Court's decree the amount of that decree made payable to the plaintiff. Looked at of course in that way the bill become a very high one. But it seems to us to be quite impossible to regard the matter in that way. The appellate Court, it is true, disallowed the plaintiff interest from the date of suit onwards. That meant that the amount it found the plaintiff entitled to was the amount that the plaintiff was entitled to as at the date of suit. He was entitled to that amount at the date of suit and thereafter onwards of course he could not execute any decree until he got a decree. His right was always to that sum. His power to execute that decree is when he got that decree. The fact that he was disallowed any interest after the date of suit does not affect the quantum of the sum to which he was entitled. Accordingly when on 24th February 1928 he recovered Rs. 54,000 from the surety he was entitled to recover Rs. 33,000 and odd from the surety. Taking into account costs and interest, as we have said, that shows that the overpayment was Rs. 21,285-12-0. It follows, in our opinion, that the learned Judge was right in directing restitution of that amount together with court rate of interest as from the date of overpayment until the date of payment back. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Shree Gopal Krishna Sansthan, Barshi-Takli—Opposite Party.

Civil Revn. No. 13 of 1940, Decided on 17th December 1940, for revision of order of Second Sub-Judge, First Class, Akola, D/- 9th October 1939 and 9th November 1940.

Civil P. C. (1908), O. 23, R. 3 — Form of decree—Decree of Small Cause Court — Amendment creating charge — Effect on executability —Compromise covering matters relating to suit and matters not relating to suit — Recital of whole agreement concluding with order relative to part which is subject of suit, or introducing agreement in schedule to decree are only proper and effective methods of carrying out terms of O. 23, R. 3 — Small cause decree not carrying out terms in either of ways suggested, subsequently changed by appending terms of compromise creating charge, as schedule to decree — Change was amendment of decree which affected its capability of execution—Being Small Cause Court decree creating charge on immovable property it was void and inoperative.

Where a compromise has been arrived at between the parties and covers both matters relating to the suit and matters not relating to the suit a perfectly proper and effective method of carrying out the terms of O. 23, R. 3 would be to recite the whole of the agreement and then to conclude with an order relative to that part which was subject of the suit, or in the alternative it could introduce the agreement in a schedule to the decree.

A decree of a Small Cause Court did not carry out the terms of O. 23, R. 3 in either of the ways suggested above. It merely said that a certain sum was payable in seven yearly instalments and it then recited the conditions on which it became exigible and concluded with a direction that the claim would be a charge on a certain immovable property of the judgment-debtor. Later on, a translation of the actual terms of the compromise was appended as a schedule to the decree :

Held that the Court had carried out the requirements of O. 23, R. 3 which it had not carried out before. That was nothing else than an amendment of the decree which amendment made a difference of its capability of execution, so far as the decree of such Court sought to create a charge on immovable property, it must be regarded as void and inoperative: ('19) 6 A I R 1919 P C 79, Rel. on; ('34) 21 A I R 1934 Nag 147, Disting.; ('39) 26 A I R 1939 Nag 118, Rel. on. [P 199 C 1, 2]

V. L. Oke and W. B. Pendharkar— for Applicant.

V. K. Rajwade—for Opposite Party.

Order. — The applicant in the present revision application is the judgment-debtor against whom there is in existence a compromise decree passed in favour of the non-applicants decree-holders. As the decree originally stood, it provided that defendant 1 should pay Rs. 350 to the plaintiffs in seven yearly instalments commencing on 15th

April 1938. The decree was to be exigible to the extent of its full value either on default of the first instalment or on the default of any two subsequent instalments. The decree finished with the sentence : "Plaintiffs' decree claim to have charge on defendant's field S. No. 29, area 5.20 of M. Hingna."

This decree was passed by a Court of Small Causes. When the decree became exigible by reason of default in payment, the decree-holders applied to execute the decree not against survey No. 29 but personally against the judgment-debtor who objected saying that under the terms of the compromise the decree-holders were required to proceed against survey No. 29 and could not proceed against the judgment-debtor personally and as the Small Cause Court was incompetent to pass a decree affecting immovable property the decree was not capable of execution. The lower Court, by its order under revision dated 9th October 1939, held following A I R 1934 Nag 140,[1] that the decree was a personal decree in spite of the fact that it created a charge on survey No. 29 and that the decree-holders were at liberty to execute the decree in any manner that they desired. Although therefore the charge could not be enforced by the Small Cause Court, the decree-holders could proceed in execution against other property of the judgment-debtor. Against this order the judgment-debtor applied in revision, complaining that the decree, as it stood, was not in terms of the compromise and that it could not be executed since it was a Small Cause Court's decree, that Court being precluded from charging immovable property. The application came before Bose J., who, on 30th September 1940, observed that, as it was the contention of the judgment-debtor that the decree was not in accordance with the terms of the compromise, his only remedy was to ask the Court which passed the decree to amend it, and he allowed the judgment-debtor one month within which to apply for amendment, adding that the revision would be proceeded with after the disposal of that application. Accordingly the judgment-debtor presented an application to the lower Court under S. 152, Civil P. C., asking that the decree be amended and drawn up in accordance with the terms of the compromise. On that application the lower Court has passed an order on 9th November 1940 in which the learned Judge refers to an observation of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 47 Cal 485[2] at p. 495 where they say that where a compromise has been arrived at between the parties and covers both matters relating to the suit and matters not relating to the suit a perfectly proper and effective method of carrying out the terms of O. 23, R. 3, Civil P. C., which is the rule requiring a Court to order a compromise to be recorded and to pass a decree in accordance therewith as far as it relates to the suit, would be to recite the whole of the agreement and then to conclude with an order relative to that part which was subject of the suit or in the alternative it could introduce the agreement in a schedule to a decree. After quoting these observations of their Lordships the lower Court says in paragraph 9 :

> I do not propose to amend the decree. I only add a schedule of the terms of the agreement . . . A full translation of the agreement dated 7th July 1938 will appear now as an appendix to the decree. The application in substance is dismissed.

Accordingly now the revision application has come before me to be proceeded with in accordance with the directions of Bose J. in his order dated 30th September 1940.

The applicant, judgment-debtor contends that, although the lower Court says that he does not propose to amend the decree and has also said that the application for amendment is dismissed, it has in effect amended the decree by appending the compromise agreement as a schedule to the decree as was suggested by their Lordships in the ruling mentioned in the previous paragraph and that the decree having been thus amended the decree-holders are precluded by the terms of the compromise from executing this decree which is ultra vires of a Small Cause Court. The lower Court appears to have considered that it made no difference to the decree whether the compromise agreement was appended or not for as the learned Judge says :

> The primary clause of payment of the decretal amount by the defendant is not smothered, mutilated or destroyed by the subsequent clauses of the manner in which the amount was to be realized by the decree-holder, and it was because of this view that the nature of the decree was in no way altered that he purports to dismiss the application for amendment saying that he did not propose to amend the decree. Accordingly, the question now is whether the appending of the compromise agreement to the decree amounts to an amendment and if it does has it made any difference to the ability of the decree-holders to execute the decree? On the first point, the non-applicants urge that the addition of an appendix to the decree is not an amendment thereof and that in the passage which the lower Court has quoted from 47 Cal 485[2] their Lordships were only stating what was the practice in England and that they did not lay down any rule that the Courts in India were to record compromise decrees in this manner. It is true that the passage quoted by the lower Court is prefaced by the words : "Their Lordships are not aware of the exact system by which documents are recorded in the Courts in India." but when they go on to say that a perfectly proper and effectual method of carrying out the terms of O. 23, R. 3 would be to introduce the agreement in a schedule to the decree, that means that it would be a perfectly proper and effectual method in India, and so when a Court in India thereafter does so, it must be held to be carrying out the provisions of O. 23, R. 3. The decree, as it stood at first, did not carry out the terms of O. 23, R. 3 in either of the ways suggested by their Lordships; it neither recited the whole of the agreement and then concluded with an order relative to that part that was subject of the suit nor did it introduce the agreement in a schedule to the decree. It merely said that the sum of Rs. 350 was payable in seven yearly instalments commencing on 15th April 1938 and it then recited the conditions on which it became exigible and concluded with a direction that the claim would be a charge on survey No. 29. Accordingly by now appending a translation of the actual terms of the compromise as a schedule to the decree the lower Court has carried out the requirements of O. 23, R. 3 which it had not carried out before. That is nothing else than an amendment of the decree, so that the applicant is correct when he says that although the learned Judge did not purport to amend the decree he did in fact amend it.

The second question remaining then is whether this amendment makes any difference of its capability of execution. As I have said the lower Court does not think that it does so by reason of the fact that the primary clause of payment has not been altered, but if the compromise agreement is read as a whole, it means that if there is no default the judgment-debtor will pay Rs. 50 every year to the decree-holders for seven years. As soon as there is a default in the payment of the first instalment or in the payment of any two subsequent instalments survey No. 29 is to be attached and sold for the whole amount of the decretal debt. There has admittedly been a default of this nature and therefore the whole amount has become recoverable by attachment and sale of survey No. 29. The non-applicants have referred me to 30 N L R 325[3] in which it was held that where in a suit for money a decree based on a compromise is passed creating a charge on certain property for the satisfaction of the decretal debt, the decree is capable of execution by sale of the charged properties without the institution of a suit to enforce the charge under S. 67, T. P. Act. That however was not a Small Cause Court case. The power of a Small Cause Court to declare a charge on immovable property has been considered by Niyogi J. in A I R 1939 Nag 118[4] and with its reasoning I respectfully concur, as also with his conclusion, that so far as the decree of such Court seeks to create a charge on immovable property, it must be regarded as void and inoperative. The result is that the revision application succeeds and the application for execution of the decree must be rejected. Costs in the execution Court and in this Court on the decree-holders; I allow Rs. 50 as counsel's fee.

Damodhar Narayan Kunbi—Plaintiff — Appellant

Narayan Gangaji Mankar and others— Defendants — Respondents.

Second Appeal No. 311 of 1937, Decided on 11th October 1940, from decree of Dist. Judge, Amraoti, D/- 21st December 1936.

(a) Res judicata—Separate pre-emption suits by A and B consolidated—A made defendant 2 in B's suit—A's claim to pre-emption negatived and B's suit decreed — Appeal by defendants 1 and 3 but not by A—A's suit dismissed— Appeal by A held not rendered incompetent by reason of his failure to appeal from decree in B's suit.

Separate pre-emption suits filed by A and B were by order consolidated. A was impleaded as defendant 2 in B's suit. A's claim for pre-emption in that suit was negatived and B's suit was decreed. Defendants 1 and 3 in B's suit appealed but A did not. A's suit was subsequently dismissed and in the appeal by A it was contended that his appeal was rendered incompetent by reason of his failure to appeal from the decree in B's suit.

Held that the appeal by A against the dismissal of his suit was competent : ('27) 14 A I R 1927 Lah 289 (F B), Rel. on. [P 200 C 1, 2]

(b) Berar Land Revenue Code (1928), Ss. 173 and 182—Joint Hindu family consisting of father and minor sons—Sale by father—Minor son can pre-empt—Addition of son's name by father to sale deed does not make son vendor.

Where a father, manager of a joint Hindu family consisting of himself and his minor sons, sells property, one of the sons has a right to pre-empt. The fact that the father added the minor son's name to the sale deed does not make the minor a vendor: ('25) 12 A I R 1925 P C 18 and ('29) 16 A I R 1929 Oudh 265 (F B), Rel. on; ('25) 12 A I R 1925 Nag 160; ('20) 7 A I R 1920 All 131; ('33) 20 A I R 1933 All 758 and ('35) 22 A I R 1935 Lah 560, Not approved. [P 200 C 2; P 202 C 1]

(c) Hindu law—Joint family—Minor — No guardian of minor member can be appointed under Guardians and Wards Act though one may be appointed under inherent power of High Court—Hindu father cannot be regarded guardian, as parent or delegate from Sovereign, of undivided son's property—Father cannot make his act more binding by purporting to act as son's guardian.

Where the minor is a member of an undivided joint Hindu family (at any rate where the Mitakshara law applies) there cannot be a guardian appointed under the Guardians and Wards Act though there may be one appointed under the inherent power of the High Court. But there is really no place for such a conception of a Hindu father being guardian, as parent or as delegate from the Sovereign, of the undivided son's property. Such a son has no individual property. The father's act binds the son's share in a wide range of cases quite apart from the idea of guardianship. This power is based on the absence of illegality, the presence of necessity, and the right to manage. He cannot make his act more binding by purporting to act as the son's guardian : 25 All 407 (P C), Ref. [P 202 C 1, 2]

Judgment. — It is first necessary to dispose of a preliminary objection. To understand it certain facts must be stated. Two pre-emption suits were filed, one by the present appellant, Damodhar (74A of 1935), one by Vithoba (62A of 1935). In 62A of 1935 Damodhar was defendant 2. He raised the objection that he had a preferential right. His father and brother were co-defendants. The defence of Damodhar was found against and the suit decreed. Defendant 1 and defendant 3 appealed, but defendant 2 did not. Suit No. 74A of 1935 was dismissed. Damodhar appealed. This is the second appeal. It is objected that it is incompetent because Damodhar's failure to appeal from the decree in 62A of 1935 concludes the matter against him. The answer is that the two suits were by order consolidated. Agreeing as we do with the majority in 8 Lah 384,[1] we consider that there is no force in the preliminary objection.

The point of substance is : if a father, manager of a joint Hindu family consisting of himself and minor sons, sells property has one of the sons a right to pre-empt under the provisions of the Berar Land Revenue Code? At the time of the sale all the sons (three) were minors. Pre-emption is dealt with in Chap. 14, Berar Land Revenue Code. Section 173 defines an "occupant in a survey-number" as meaning > a person having the right of an occupant, whether in his sole right or jointly with others in that survey-number, or in any portion of it.

It is said that when the manager of a joint Hindu family sells he represents the family and in truth and in fact the family sells. A I R 1925 Nag 160[2] treated the family as the occupant. In such a case in 42 ALL 264[3] it was stated that each cosharer was "practically" a vendor. Obviously a vendor cannot pre-empt. Therefore it is said a member of the family cannot pre-empt whether the sale is or is not binding on them. On the other hand, in 4 Luck 370[4] a Full Bench decided that, under the laws of Oudh, a member of a family could pre-empt. It was there pointed out that a member could admit the validity of the sale; i. e., its binding nature as against his share or in other words the fact that there was necessity justifying the sale, without turning himself into a vendor. As Misra J., observes in the above case at page 384 :

> It is one thing to say that the sale is binding upon him (a member of a joint Hindu family) and quite (another) to say that he is to be treated as a vendor.

42 ALL 264[3] is a short judgment and the learned Judges seem to have been impressed by the view that the members seeking to pre-empt were "practically parties to the sale." They observe :

> This is not a case in which the property has been sold by the manager against the wishes of the other members.

This seems to be based on the fact that the members sought to set aside the sale as not binding, alternatively, if binding, sought to pre-empt and from that part of the lower Court's decision which dismissed the claim to set the sale aside they did not appeal. The learned Judges also stress the question :

> Whether a man can pre-empt a sale in which a portion of his own property has actually been legally and validly transferred and in which case he is practically a vendor.

This case was followed in 55 ALL 972.[5] There it was pointed out that the manager can and does act in the interest of the entire family, and in such a case the fact that no consent could be given by a minor coparcener is immaterial. Before pre-emption arises it must be assumed that the sale is good, and if good it is binding on the coparcener whose position is that of vendor. 42 ALL 264[3] was followed and 4 Luck 370[4] dissented from in A I R 1935 Lah 560.[6] These last three cases are all short judgments which do not depend for their decisions on the provisions of any particular Act. The last named case does not even glance at the Privy Council decision in 6 Lah 1.[7] That case is generally regarded as the leading case on the question of the rights of a father in a joint Hindu family as regards the family property. The question was whether on a father's insolvency the son's interest vests in the Official Assignee. It was held by the High Court (largely influenced by the doctrine of stare decisis) that it did. The Judicial Committee, however, pointed out what went to the Official Assignee by universal transfer by operation of law were the father's rights and the father's right included his share in the coparcenary property and a limited power to transfer the shares of others. Until a sale took place of the other shareholder's interest such interest was untouched and accordingly adjudication of the father left the son as an "owner" entitled to pre-empt under the provisions of the Punjab Pre-emption Act, 1913. Of course in that case the property not having in fact been sold by the Official Assignee the question whether the coparceners seeking pre-emption were thereby barred did not arise. It is, however, a little difficult to see why, assuming an Official Assignee sold not merely the share of the father, but also an item of family property, the non-insolvent coparceners should thereby be regarded as vendors. The sale is not being made under any authority flowing from them ; it is not being made with their consent ; it may well be made in the teeth of their opposition. Why then are they to be regarded as vendors so as to be shut out from pre-emption ?

However that may be, we are here concerned not with the general but with the statutory position. This minor has the right of an occupant jointly with others. The scheme of the Act provides inter alia that if A, B, C jointly possess the right of an occupant in area (survey-number) X, and A proposes to sell his "interest" he "may" give notice to B and C stating the extent of the interest to be sold and the price. Then B or C may within a given time (two months) deposit the price. Thereupon B or C obtains a right. That right consists in the power to compel a sale of the indicated interest at the price deposited. (Section 176.) Clearly, there may be a conflict of right between B and C. Priority depends on relationship or, that failing, extent of interest. (Section 179.) Apart from S. 176, S. 182 gives a right to pre-empt for a fair consideration. That is the section under which this suit is apparently brought because in the plaint para. 3 (b) it is alleged :

> Plaintiff has not been served with any notice of sale so plaintiff's right of pre-emption is not affected in any way.

Defendant 4 was also claiming pre-emption. The plaintiff claimed priority based on relationship. The plaintiff alleged that defendant 1 was the vendor and that defendants 1, 2 and 3 were joint with plaintiff. The four owned 8 annas share in the survey-number. What was sold was 2 annas share. The learned Judge of the lower appellate Court has dismissed the plaintiff's appeal on the ground that the Hindu father is an agent for his sons, minors though they be, and therefore they are principals and accordingly vendors. He observes :

> It appears to me that if the Oudh ruling were followed, any sale of property by a manager of the joint family could be set aside by the coparceners so long as the coparceners were willing to refund the consideration.

That appears to us hardly to do justice to the Oudh decision and ignores the purpose of pre-emption laws which give to a limited class in certain circumstances this very right, viz., to set aside a sale to a stranger on tendering the price or a reasonable price. It is by no means obvious why a minor coparcener should be placed in a worse position than an adult joint owner. Because A has a right to sell B's property,

(e. g., because of attachment followed by a Court order) it does not follow that B is the vendor. In many cases B is resisting to the utmost of his power. In many cases (of which sale in execution is perhaps the most common) the sale is effected and is binding. In many cases transfer is by vesting order. In these cases of sales in invitum is it correct to say that the person whose property is sold is the vendor? He is certainly not a contracting party. What is the difference between such a case and this? In such a case A (a Court or the like) is given, by statute, power to sell B's property to satisfy C's debt in certain circumstances. In this case the Hindu law gives to A (a father) power to sell the property of B (a son) to satisfy C's debt in certain, and different, circumstances. The only difference is in the circumstances. That difference gives no logical basis for treating B as not a vendor in the first case put and as a vendor in the second. Both sales are against his wishes. Both sales are nevertheless binding. In both cases the binding factor does not come from him but from law statutory or customary as the case may be. In all the circumstances we prefer the Oudh view.

It is urged that even so in this case the plaintiff is a vendor because he is a party and he is a party because, though a minor, his father, purporting to act as guardian, has included his name in the sale deed. There is of course the conception of guardianship in Hindu law: see Mayne on Hindu Law and Usage, para. 231, page 299, (Edn. 10). But this guardianship is a guardianship of the person, or, it may be, where there is separation, of property. But where the minor is a member of an undivided joint Hindu family (at any rate where the Mitakshara law, as here, applies) there cannot be a guardian appointed under the Guardians and Wards Act, 30 I A 165,[8] though there may be one appointed under the inherent power of the High Court. But there is really no place for such a conception of a Hindu father being guardian, as parent or as delegate from the Sovereign, of the undivided son's property. Such a son has no individual property. The father's act binds the son's share in a wide range of cases quite apart from the idea of guardianship. This power is based on the absence of illegality, the presence of necessity, and the right to manage. He cannot make his act more binding by purporting to act as the son's guardian and the inclusion of the son's name in the deed has little more effect than adding weight to evidence to show that the sons in question were then born. We do not think that the fact that the father added the minor son's name to the sale deed makes the minor a vendor. The appeal accordingly succeeds.

Although the suits 74-A of 1935 and 62-A of 1935 were consolidated some question arose about the effect of consolidation. This question we have already examined. As a consequence of the doubt that arose there were two appeals as though the suits had not been consolidated. These two appeals were (1) by Damodhar, appellant to this appeal (Second Appeal No. 311 of 1937), and (2) by Sadashiv and Narayan, appellants in Second Appeal No. 166 of 1937. The Second Appeal No. 166 of 1937, obviously fails if Second Appeal No. 311 of 1937 succeeds and accordingly it is not pressed. As the first has succeeded and as the suits were consolidated there should be one decree. As in the one suit (74-A of 1935) the present successful appellant claimed pre-emption and in the other (62-A of 1935) a stranger to the family, one Vithoba, claimed pre-emption it follows that the claim in each suit has succeeded but the plaintiff in Civil Suit No. 74-A of 1935 being a member of the family has priority over Vithoba, a stranger, based on relationship—the Act as between two persons claiming pre-emption giving priority to the one more nearly related. Thus there will be one composite decree. (See O. 20, R. 14). That decree will declare that Damodhar has the right of pre-emption and that Vithoba has the right of pre-emption and that the right of the first is prior to that of the second and may be exercised and completed within three months failing which that right will be deemed to be lost and Vithoba may then exercise his. By Vithoba we must be taken to mean not only Vithoba personally but those parties claiming through him. As to costs we think, seeing that in substance these disputes have been between a family on the one hand and the stranger on the other, that one suit brought by a member of this undivided family has succeeded and one has failed, that costs throughout in both matters shall fall as incurred save that Damodhar will get the costs of this appeal.

(a) C. P. Municipalities Act (2 of 1922), S. 179 (1) (b-1), Bye-law (11)—Purchase of linseed in municipal market—Refusal to take delivery on ground that linseed was mixed with lot of mud — Offence of breach of bye-law is committed — Bye-law is not unreasonable interference with trade, and comes under head of regulating use of markets mentioned in S. 179 (1) (b-1) — It is not in restraint of trade and is not ultra vires— Even assuming latter part bad that part may be separated from good part instead of declaring whole bye-law void.

Bye-law (11) in no way goes against the general rule of contract or the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act. On the contrary it simply emphasizes them. Nor does it hamper trade. On the contrary it helps trade by introducing certainty into dealings and making people careful and avoiding subsequent futile disputes. [P 204 C 2]

Even assuming last part of the bye-law forbidding rejection of commodities because they were not upto sample is an unreasonable restriction, the bad part of bye-law may be separated from a good part, as it can be done with respect to this bye-law, instead of declaring the whole bye-law void: (1898) 2 Q B 91; (1902) 1 K B 160; (1896) 1 Q B 290; (1830) 1 B & Ad 92 and (1881) 7 Q B D 32, Rel. on; AIR 1933 Nag 68, Disting.; (1880) 5 Q B D 456, Not approved. [P 204 C 2]

W. B. Pendharkar — for Respondent.

Judgment. — This is an appeal by the Provincial Government against the acquittal of one Nemichand Jain of the offence of breach of a bye-law framed by the Municipal Committee, Bina. On 27th April 1940, the accused purchased in auction in the municipal market a bag of linseed from one Suma. Later he refused to take delivery saying, according to the prosecution, that there was a lot of mud mixed with the linseed. Bye-law 11 which he is alleged to have violated has been translated as follows :

Buyers shall satisfy themselves as to the quality of any commodities before these are put to auction. They shall not be allowed to cancel any purchase on the ground that they had not inspected the commodities or commodities were not up to sample.

This bye-law purports to be made under S. 179 (1) (b), Central Provinces Municipalities Act. The respondent's defence was two-fold: First, he did not take delivery of the linseed because the seller had refused to weigh unless the price was first paid: therefore on the facts he has not broken the bye-law. Secondly, the bye-law is void and ultra vires (a) because it is made under S. 179 (1) (b) which gives no authority for the making of such a bye-law, and (b) because in any case it is an unreasonable interference with trade, and does not come under the head of regulating the use of markets mentioned in S. 179 (1) (b-1). The trial Court has disbelieved the defence evidence and upheld the prosecution version about the facts. It also holds that the bye-law was really made under S. 179 (1) (b-1) which was then in force and the mention of S. 179 (1) (b) is a clerical mistake. On the third point however the trial Court held that the bye-law is in restraint of trade, and as the municipal committee was not expressly authorized to pass such a bye-law it is ultra vires. Accordingly the accused was acquitted. Learned counsel for the respondent supports the acquittal on all the ground previously urged. The point about the sub-section of S. 179 need not detain us. The word 'markets' used to appear in sub-s. (b). When sub-s. (b-1) was enacted it was taken out of (b) and put into (b-1). Therefore at all times the municipal committee was entitled to pass bye-laws for regulating markets and a wrong reference to the sub-section is merely a clerical mistake which could never make the bye-law void.

A perusal of the record convinces us that the reason why the linseed was refused was as stated by the prosecution. This is deposed to by the tax moharrir Mohan Prasad, (P. W. 3), Md. Hafiz (P. W. 4), municipal committee member, and Summa the seller (P. W. 6). The evidence in support of the accused's version is that of Ganeshprasad, weighman, (D. W. 1), Budhua (D. W. 2), a coolie, and Kanchhedilal (D. W. 3), another weighman. Their evidence is flimsy, and the facts they state are most improbable. D. W. 1 has a grudge against the municipal committee while D. W. 2 works in accused's shop. The evidence of D. W. 3 is vague. We uphold the finding of the trial Court on this point. We have no doubt that such a bye-law does fall under the heading of regulating the use of markets. The chief feature of the market is the putting up of grain to auction, and rules regulating these auctions thereby regulate the use of the market. Such rules, if wisely framed, afford salutary protection to sellers and purchasers alike and secure stability in trading and avoid needless disputes. No doubt, the bye-laws must be reasonable and not repugnant to the general law. The principles to which they must conform will be seen from the following quotations: Maxwell's Interpretation of Statutes, Edn. 8, p. 260 :

> Rules and by-laws made under statutory powers enforceable by penalties . . . . must, on pain of invalidity, be not unreasonable, nor in excess of the statutory power authorizing them, nor repugnant to that statute or to the general principles of law.

> Courts of justice are slow to condemn municipal by-laws as invalid, on the supposed ground of unreasonableness, and support them if possible by a 'benevolent' interpretation, crediting those who have to administer them with an intention to do so in a reasonable manner, and with being the best Judges whether a particular bye-law is required in their district or not.

Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 8, p. 47:

> A bye-law must not be repugnant to the general law. It is not repugnant merely because it supplements the general law and deals with something which is not dealt with by the general law. But it must not alter, either expressly or by necessary implication the general law by making that lawful which the general law makes unlawful, or that unlawful which the general law makes lawful.

(1898) 2 Q B 91[1]:

> The Court ought to be slow to hold that a bye-law is void for unreasonableness. A bye-law . . . . . ought to be supported unless it is manifestly partial and unequal in its operation between different classes, or unjust, or made in bad faith, or clearly involving an unjustifiable interference with the liberty of those subject to it.

(1902) 1 K B 160[2] at p. 166 :

> A bye-law is not repugnant to the general law merely because it creates a new offence, and says that something shall be unlawful which the law does not say is unlawful . . . . . (It) is repugnant if it adds something inconsistent with the provisions of a statute creating the same offence; but if it adds something not inconsistent, that is not sufficient to make the bye-law bad as repugnant.

Now let us apply these principles to the facts of the present case. For the respondent reliance is placed on A I R 1933 Nag 68.[3] There the facts were different. It was held that a bye-law prohibiting traders from demanding or accepting customary deductions on account of charity, gratuity or services of private persons, was in excess of the power conferred on the municipality. We have some doubt about the correctness of that decision, but it might be supported on the ground that the custom of the market, unless obviously unreasonable, should not be interfered with. However that may be, each bye-law must be judged on its own merits or demerits. It is admitted that this was not a sale by sample. The bag of linseed was there exposed in the market and could have been examined. Kunjilal (P. W. 5), another bidder, says that Nemichand and he both had examined the linseed before bidding. Even if Nemichand did not, he had the opportunity of doing so. The first rule applicable to purchase of a specific article is that of "caveat emptor". According to S. 16(2), Sale of Goods Act, there is an implied condition that the goods shall be of merchantable quality but with the important proviso that if the buyer has examined the goods there shall be no implied condition as regards defects which such examination ought to have revealed. It would be just the same if he had an opportunity of examining and did not take advantage of it. Thus, the bye-law under examination in no way goes against the general rule of contract or the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act. On the contrary, it simply emphasizes them. Nor can we concede that such a provision hampers trade. On the contrary, it should help trade by introducing certainty into dealings and making people careful and avoiding subsequent futile disputes. One argument advanced without much conviction was that at least the last part of the bye-law forbidding the rejection of commodities because they were not up to sample is an unreasonable restriction, and it is urged that if one part of the bye-law is void the whole of it becomes ultra vires. We do not at all concede that even the second part is unreasonable. But assuming that it is, the reference quoted by learned counsel himself shows that there is strong weight of authority in favour of separating a bad part of a bye-law from a good part where that can be done instead of declaring it all void. The passage occurs in Craies' Statute Law, Edn. 4th, p. 280, and we rely on the dictum of Lindley L. J., in (1896) 1 Q B 290[4] at p. 292 :

> There is plenty of authority for saying that if a bye-law can be divided, one part may be rejected as bad while the rest may be held to be good.

That later judgment of the appellate Court is of greater authority than the previous judgment of Cockburn, C. J. in (1880) 5 Q B D 456[5] at p. 463 in which he said that a bye-law being entire, if it be unreasonable in any part shall be void for the whole. That dictum which is relied on by the respondent does not seem to have been followed elsewhere. On the contrary the opinions in (1830) 1 B & Ad 92[6] and in (1881) 7 Q B D 32[7] are that a bye-law if severable can be good in part and bad in part. We conclude therefore that there was no good reason at all for declaring this bye-law to be ultra vires or void. We allow the appeal and convict the accused of a breach of this bye-law, No. 11. The learned Advocate-General assures us that this appeal is brought merely to vindicate the bye-law and he is not interested in pressing for a substantial penalty. We treat the offence as a technical one and fine the accused Re. 1 only.

VIVIAN BOSE J.

K. C. Majumdar — Defendant — Applicant

v.

Surajsingh Ramnareshsingh Rajput — Plaintiff — Opposite Party.

Civil Revn. No. 617 of 1939, Decided on 13th September 1940, from order of A. S. J. II, Sihora, D/- 13th September 1939.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 11, R. 1, O. 3, R. 1 and Appendix C, Form No. 3—Words 'any other law' in O. 3, R. 1—Meaning—O. 3, R. 1 governs O. 11, R. 1—Party ordered to answer interrogatories — No special direction to answer personally — Party can answer through recognized agent—Agent can swear affidavit.

The words 'any other law' in O. 3, R. 1 refer to law other than the Code and therefore O. 3, R. 1 governs O. 11, R. 1. Consequently a party to a suit who is ordered to answer interrogatories is not bound to answer them personally in the absence of a special direction to that effect. In such a case the party's recognized agent who knows the facts can answer the interrogatories and the affidavit can be sworn to by him: ('39) 26 AIR 1939 Nag 186 (F B), Rel. on. [P 206 C 1, 2]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 3, R. 1 — Application for stay of proceedings — Party can apply through pleader unless otherwise directed.

A party can apply for the stay of proceedings through his pleader unless the Court directs otherwise and requires the party to make the application in person : ('38) 25 A I R 1938 Nag 272, Rel. on. [P 206 C 2]

(c) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 3, R. 1 and S. 115 (c) —Code empowering party to act through recognized agent — Court not requiring party to do same in person—Court cannot arbitrarily reject that act and mulct party in costs — High Court can interfere under S. 115 (c).

When the Code expressly gives a party a right to perform a certain act through a recognized agent and the Court has not directed him to perform it in person, the Court cannot arbitrarily reject that act and mulct the party in costs because he has chosen to do that which the Code expressly allows him to do. That is a material irregularity on a question of procedure and justifies interference in revision under S. 115 (c). [P 207 C 1]

J. Sen — for Applicant.

T. B. Pendharkar — for Opposite Party.

Order. — The question here is whether, when a party to a suit is ordered to answer interrogatories, he is bound in the absence of a special direction to that effect to answer personally, or whether he can answer through some recognized agent who knows the facts; that is to say, must an affidavit be sworn to by the party himself or can this be done by a recognized agent? The plaintiff administered a set of interrogatories and the defendant was required to file a reply to them by 31st August 1939. The reply was filed but the affidavit was made by an agent of the defendant and not by the defendant himself. The lower Court thereupon stated that the defendant was at fault and saddled him with Rs. 20 adjournment costs and the defendant was told to file his reply to the interrogatories in proper form within ten days. On the next hearing, 12th September 1939, the defendant's pleader put in an application for stay because the defendant desired to contest the correctness of the previous order in the High Court. This application was not signed by the defendant either and it was rejected on that ground. On the following day, 13th September 1939, the defendant's pleader asked for further time to enable his client to comply with the Court's order about swearing the affidavit personally. Time was granted, but on condition that Rs. 25 was paid as adjournment costs. The revision is against these two orders, that is to say, against the first order of 31st August 1939 in which the reply to the interrogatories was rejected because the affidavit was not sworn to by the defendant personally and in which the defendant was required to pay Rs. 20 as adjournment costs, and against the order of 13th September 1939 where the defendant was required to pay further adjournment costs of Rs. 25.

The learned counsel for the plaintiff-non-applicant relies on O. 11, R. 1, Civil P. C., read with Form No. 3 to Appendix C. Order 11, R. 1, states that in any suit the plaintiff or defendant may by leave of the Court deliver interrogatories in writing for the examination "of the opposite parties or any one or more of such parties." The form in Appendix C indicates that the answer contemplated by the form should be given by the party himself. As against this however there is a more general rule, O. 3, R. 1, which states that :

> Any appearance, application or act in or to any Court, required or authorized by law to be made or done by a party in such Court, may except where otherwise expressly provided by any law for the time being in force, be made or done by the party in person, or by his recognized agent, or by a pleader appearing, applying or acting on his behalf.

Then there is a proviso which states that the Court can, if it so desires, direct that such appearance or act shall be made by the party in person. The question is whether this rule, which is a general one, governs O. 11, R. 1, or not. I have not been referred to any authority on the point and it does not seem as if there are any Indian cases bearing on the subject. Mulla in his Civil Procedure Code, Edn. 10 at p. 615, refers to some English cases under O. 11, R. 8, which state that a party to a suit is not excused from answering interrogatories on the ground that they relate to matters which are not within his own knowledge but are within the knowledge of his agents or servants if such knowledge has been acquired by them in the ordinary course of their employment. But this does not touch the matter in question here because the question here is not whether the defendant can refuse to answer the interrogatories at all (because they have been answered) but whether he must answer personally instead of through a recognized agent. On the whole, it seems to me that O. 3, R. 1, governs O. 11, R. 1. The former order is a general one and has general application. Therefore unless there is something specific to show that its provisions are not intended to apply to some act or appearance in some particular case, it ought in my opinion to be applied.

It is contended however that O. 3, R. 1, expressly states that it is to apply "except where otherwise expressly provided by any law for the time being in force" and it is argued that O. 11, R. 1, read with Form No. 3 to Appendix C is such other law. A similar expression was considered by a Full Bench of this Court in I L R (1939) Nag 250[1] at p. 257. The words under consideration there are to be found in S. 89, Civil P. C., and are almost identical with the words in O. 3, R. 1. It was held by the Full Bench that the words "any other law" in S. 89 do not mean other parts of the Code but refer to laws other than the Code, and it is pointed out that when the intention is to exclude other parts of the Code the language used is "except as herinafter provided" or something of that kind. As these or similar words are not used in O. 3, R. 1, I am of opinion that the words used refer to laws other than the Code. In the circumstances the lower Court was, in my opinion, wrong in rejecting the answers to the interrogatories forthwith on 31st August 1939 and in requiring the defendant to pay Rs. 20 adjournment costs. The Court had power to order the defendant to answer the interrogatories in person. Had the learned Judge done so in the first instance, then of course this order would have been perfectly correct; but it appears that no such order was passed when the interrogatories were ordered to be answered. Therefore the defendant was at liberty to act either through himself or through a recognized agent as provided by O. 3, R. 1. He chose to act through a recognized agent. He therefore did what the law allowed him to do and if he did that, the learned Judge could not saddle him with costs. All he could do was to state that in the circumstances he required the defendant to answer the interrogatories personally, and if thereafter the defendant disobeyed them he could either strike out the defence or give him another chance on terms that he pay costs. It must not however be interpreted as in any way encouraging the practice of answering through agents. As a general rule, it is salutory and wholesome that the defendant himself should be made to swear to what he says. But there will always be exceptions, and in any case as the Code allows an alternative a party cannot be penalised for following it, unless he has been expressly ordered to do the contrary.

Turning next to the order of 12th September 1939, the application there was rejected because it was not signed by the applicant. But there again the defendant, who was the applicant, had every right to apply through his pleader unless the Court directed otherwise. It had not directed otherwise up to that point and therefore all that the Court ought to have done was to require the defendant to make the application in person. This matter has been expressly decided in I L R (1939) Nag 157.[2] As regards the adjournment costs of Rs. 25 ordered on 13th September 1939, the lower Court had jurisdiction to pass such an order. The interrogatories ought to have been answered in person within the ten days allowed but they were not answered. Of course, the defendant has given a reasonable explanation as to why this was not done and it appears that it was not due to any contumaciousness on his part, but at the same time the order, whether right or wrong, was within the competence of the Court to make. The only question is whether, if the learned Judge had realised that the Code allows a defendant to answer through a recognized agent unless otherwise ordered, he would have required the answers to the interrogatories to be made in person. If he had not required that, then these adjournment costs would have been unnecessary. As I am interfering with the first order I think that in the interests of justice I ought to interfere with this order also.

The question then remains whether I have jurisdiction to interfere in revision with orders of this kind. In my opinion the matter falls within S. 115 (c), Civil P. C. When the Code expressly gives a party a right to perform a certain act through a recognized agent and the Court has not directed him to perform it in person, the Court cannot arbitrarily reject that act and mulct the defendant in costs because he has chosen to do that which the Code expressly allows him to do. That, in my opinion, is a material irregularity on a question of procedure and justifies interference in revision. It appears that the defendant has now complied with the Court's order and has answered the interrogatories in person. Therefore all that it is necessary for me to do is to set aside the two orders of 31st August 1939 and 13th September 1939 in so far as they relate to the payment of adjournment costs of Rs. 20 and Rs. 25 respectively. The application is allowed. Costs will be paid by the non-applicant. Counsel's fee Rs. 15.

Firm Khudai Nazar Khan, brother Khudai Dad Khan — Plaintiffs — Non-applicants.

Civil Revn. No. 127 of 1940, Decided on 13th December 1940, against decree of Addl. Judge, Small Causes, Nagpur, D/- 18th December 1939.

(a) Negotiable Instruments Act (1881), S. 118 — S. 118 contemplates not only "negotiation" but also "transfers."

Section 118 contemplates not only 'negotiation' which is a special form of transfer, but also 'transfers.' [P 208 C 1]

*(b) Negotiable Instruments Act (1881), S. 78 — S. 78 does not deal with right of suit — Real owner can sue provided he is in position to obtain good discharge for defendant.

Section 78 does not deal with a right of suit. The real owner is entitled to sue provided he is in a position to obtain a good discharge for the defendant. The fact that a person not the holder cannot claim the privileges of a holder does not disentitle him from suing: ('32) 19 A I R 1932 Pat 346 and ('32) 19 A I R 1932 Lah 620, Rel. on; ('31) 18 A I R 1931 Cal 387, Dissent.; Case law discussed. [P 208 C 2]

A. Shrinivas Rao — for Applicants.

M. Samiullah Khan — for Non-applicants.

Order.—There are two brothers Khudai Dad Khan and Khudai Nazar Khan. They form a partnership firm. This fact is denied but the lower Court has found in favour of the partnership (it runs under the name and style of "Khudai Nazar Khan brother Khudai Dad Khan,") and as the firm was registered on 5th December 1934, I do not think there can be any doubt on that point. In any case, I am not going to interfere on the facts. These brothers have sued as a firm on the basis of two promissory notes dated 29th March 1926 and 19th April 1936. The difficulty in their way is that the notes are in favour of Khudai Dad Khan and not in favour of the firm, and that Khudai Dad Khan had not signed the plaint. It is true he has been mentioned as a proprietor, and it is true that Khudai Nazar Khan has signed on behalf of the firm, but the objection is taken that the firm has no right of suit, the note not being in its favour, and that Nazar Khan has no authority to represent his brother Dad Khan personally. Therefore it is argued, the suit does not lie.

There is some difference of opinion on this point. Of the cases cited 55 Cal 551[1] is not quite in point, because the partner in whose name the note was issued actually signed the plaint and what was held was that though he signed on behalf of a firm in which he was a partner, that merely meant that he was signing on behalf of a number of plaintiffs including himself, and as he had a right of suit any way, the fact that he added others as plaintiffs, could not non-suit him. But wider issues were also raised and one of the learned Judges was of opinion that the Law Merchant of England could not be applied to negotiable instruments in the mofussil where the Negotiable Instruments Act is in force. And as to that Act he considered that S. 78 did not prohibit a person other than the 'holder' from suing, especially when he is in a position to obtain a good discharge from the 'holder.' A later decision, 58 Cal 752,[2] dissented from this and held that the real owner cannot sue even though the holder is joined as a defendant and is willing to give a good discharge.

The Patna view is that the beneficiary can sue provided he is in a position to give a good discharge through the holder ; 11 Pat 616.[3] The Patna Full Bench decided in 16 Pat 74,[4] that an assignee under a registered instrument can sue. The case is not in point here but it shows that S. 78 is not as drastic as 58 Cal 752[2] would make it. Section 118, Negotiable Instruments Act, contemplates not only "negotiation," which is a special form of transfer, but also "transfers." We also know that if the 'holder' dies his legal representative can sue even though his name does not appear in the instrument. Therefore, it is not quite accurate to say that no one but the 'holder' can ever sue. A I R 1939 Pat 347[5] follows 58 Cal 752,[2] but does not refer to the earlier decision of that Court, moreover, it was a single Judge decision, whereas 11 Pat 616[3] was decided by two Judges and the Full Bench by five. But so far as the facts are concerned, it was held that the benamidar whose name appears on the instrument has a right of suit, a conclusion with which I fully agree. That was also the conclusion reached in 14 Lah 19.[6] It was held that the benamidar, who was the "holder" had a right of suit. 15 N L J 45[7] decided the same thing. The Allahabad High Court takes the broader of the two views in 53 ALL 5[8] and holds that the true owner can sue if he can obtain a good discharge for the defendant and thus prevents him from being sued successfully again. In Madras the real owner was not allowed to sue : A I R 1940 Mad 90.[9]

I consider this point in 27 N L R 327,[10] and my view there, as here, is that it is not correct to say that no person who is not named in the note can ever sue. I agreed however that the doctrine of benami cannot be applied to negotiable instruments, but at the same time expressed no opinion about the situation which would arise if the real owner was in a position to give a good discharge—a situation which did not arise in that case. I left that question open. But the question does arise here, and I am of opinion that the broader view taken in Patna and Lahore is the right one. Although the doctrine of benami does not apply as such to negotiable instruments, the decisions of the Privy Council upholding benami transactions cannot be altogether ignored. I see no reason why a narrow view of the law which would defeat a just claim should be taken. I do not think S. 78 deals with a right of suit, for as I have already pointed out there are cases in which a person who is not the 'holder' can sue. Once these two principles are accepted, then I see no reason why the real owner should not be entitled to sue provided he is in a position to obtain a good discharge for the defendant. The Court must of course always be careful to see that the position of the defendant is fully safeguarded, but if that is done, I see no reason why there should be any further difficulty if the 'holder' and the real owner are agreed between themselves. Of course, a person not the holder cannot claim the privileges of a 'holder' as I have pointed out at p. 330 of 27 N L R 327,[10] but that does not in my opinion, disentitle him from suing. In this case Khudai Dad Khan has entered the box and is evidently agreeable to the decree being passed in favour of the partnership, but I think he should formally give the defendant a proper discharge before the decree is upheld.

I therefore dismiss the application provided the plaintiff, that is to say the firm which has sued, obtains within one month from today a proper discharge from Khudai Dad Khan, exonerating the defendant from all liability to him personally under the note. If this is not done within the time allowed, the appeal will be allowed and the plaintiff's claim will then be dismissed with costs. The instrument of discharge will be filed in this Court. I do not allow the plaintiff his costs of this revision because the difficulty experienced here, and it is a real one, has been due to his own carelessness.

STONE C. J. AND VIVIAN BOSE J.

Ganpat Gangaji Patil—Defendant 2—Appellant

v.

Namdeo Bhagwanji Patil, Plaintiff and others, Defendants — Respondents.

First Appeal No. 119 of 1936, Decided on 23rd January 1940, from decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Yeotmal, D/- 28th February 1936.

(a) Deed — Construction — Partition deed — Deed held to be instrument of partition and hence registrable.

The deed which came into existence as a result of partition between the parties ran as follows: "You and I are real brothers and were all joint up to this day. But today you and I have separated. And the undermentioned moveable and immovable property is allotted to your share." It then set out the property allotted to the share of the brother in whose favour the document was executed and continued; "the aforesaid moveable and immovable property has been allotted to your share and is delivered into your share. Therefore, neither I nor my heirs have left any right and interest therein." Then followed certain items of property which were kept joint and the document stated in respect of them, "this property is joint. However, we will have the same partitioned on the decision of the appeal. . . . . On getting the possession through Court, we will get it partitioned half and half. I have written and signed this receipt list at Sakhara with my free will and pleasure and while in full possession of senses." Then the name and address of the scribe was set out, and the signature of the executant followed by the signatures of three attesting witnesses:

Held that the use of the present tense and the form of the document, particularly the concluding portion which spoke of the document having been executed "with my free will and pleasure and while in full possession of senses" and also the fact that as many as three attesting witnesses were called, suggested that the document was "meant to embody the expression of will necessary to effect the change in the legal relation contemplated and therefore the document required registration: ('38) 25 A I R 1938 Nag 434; ('32) 19 A I R 1932 P C 55 and ('23) 10 A I R 1923 P C 50, Rel. on. [P 211 C 2]

(b) Hindu law—Partition—Partition by panchas—Agreement of parties and not decision of panchas effects partition — Panchas only help parties in arriving at common result — Oral agreement arrived at reduced to writing—Document and not oral agreement effects partition.

In the case of a partition by panchas the thing which legally concludes the matter is not their decision but the agreement of the parties, and the only part which the panchas play is in helping the parties to arrive at a common result. That, from a legal point of view, is on the same footing as an agreement reached orally. If, however, the parties desire that the agreement though reached orally should not be the final and operative agreement but that it should be reduced to the form of a document, then the final and operative matter which effects the change in the legal relationship is the writing and not the previous oral agreement. [P 212 C 1]

(c) Deed — Construction — Partition — Document carefully and solemnly drawn up with counterpart signed by parties reciting properties received—Document held partition deed.

The material part of a careful and elaborate document which was solemnly drawn up with a counterpart signed by the other side and which purported to be a partition deed ran as follows: "Thus, in the presence of all the panchas I have read this receipt of the moveable and immovable property and in respect of the aforesaid one-half share: and after fully taking into consideration all the aforesaid moveable and immovable property we both brothers have taken our respective receipts in the presence of the panchas":

Held that the counterparts together were intended by the parties to embody and legally effect the actual partition between them. [P 212 C 1]

(d) Hindu law—Partition — Nature explained — Intention as well as its declaration to other cosharers is necessary to effect severance of joint status — Declaration can be effected without any formality—But if reduced to writing it falls under S. 17 (1) (b), Registration Act, and is struck at by S. 49 of that Act.

Partition, unlike a sale or transfer which consists in its essence of a single act, is a continuing state of fact. No question of transfer of title arises. Each parcener already has complete title to and dominion over every parcel of the joint estate. Partition is consequently only a change in the mode of enjoyment of the joint property coupled with an alteration in status, the joint title being divided into a number of separate ones. Although no particular formality is required there must be not only a mental decision on the part of a member to effect the change but also an outward expression of it which is communicated to the cosharers, or at any rate to some of them. The intention and the declaration are both necessary ingredients in the matter of effecting severance. It is true that this declaration does not have to be reduced to the form of a document and can be effected "without any formality" but if it is reduced to writing it falls within the purview of S. 17 (1) (b), Registration

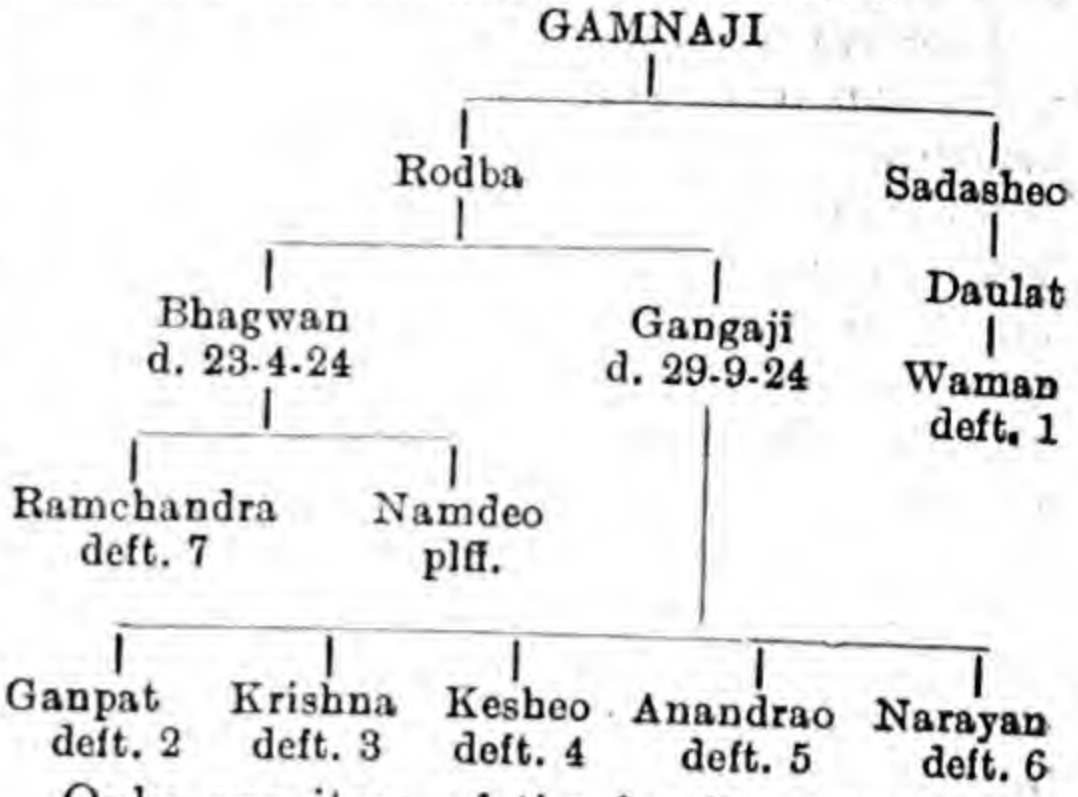
Act, and is struck at by S. 49 of the Act. It is consequently inadmissible in evidence not only as regards that aspect of partition which relates to a division of property by metes and bounds but also as to that which relates to a severance of title: 15 C W N 375 and ('29) 16 AIR 1929 P C 269, Rel. on. [P 213 C 1, 2; P 214 C 1]

(e) Hindu law—Partition—Unregistered partition deed — Common desire of parties to act on unregistered deed and their action in doing so springs from original intention to separate and amounts to confirmation of original agreement — Such confirmation itself constitutes fresh and subsequent agreement which in itself is enough to effect complete partition — Such agreement can be proved by unregistered deed — Purposes for which unregistered deed is admissible, stated.

The common desire of the parties to act upon an unregistered partition deed and their action in doing so, springs from a continuation of the original intention to separate and amounts to a confirmation of the original agreement. Such confirmation in itself constitutes a fresh and subsequent agreement which is enough in itself to effect complete partition; and that agreement is provable in any of the usual ways. The subsequent agreement being a collateral transaction within the meaning of S. 49, Registration Act, an unregistered document can be used as material in proof of it. Of course, it cannot prove such agreement in itself because no such agreement can be deemed to have been in existence at the date of its execution but it can be used to corroborate other evidence or facts and can be used in conjunction with other evidence to show that such subsequent agreement was likely and to elucidate the intention of the parties in effecting such subsequent agreement. It can also be used to show the character of the possession and the nature of the title, provided there is other evidence to establish separate possession: ('27) 14 AIR 1927 Nag 113, Appr.; ('22) 9 AIR 1922 All 493 and 15 C W N 375, Ref. [P 214 C 1, 2]

(f) Hindu law—Partition — Suit for — Defendant admitting to have held property exclusively and separately — Aforesaid fact need not be proved — Character of possession alone should be considered.

Where the defendant in a partition suit admits that the property was held exclusively and separately that fact need not be proved and all that the Court is concerned to see is the character of the possession. [P 215 C 1]



(g) Hindu law—Partition—Separation of title and division of joint property except one item established—Suit for partition of aforesaid item alone is competent.

Where it is established that a partition embraced not only a separation of title but also a division of the joint estate barring a certain item of property a suit for the partition of that item alone is competent. [P 215 C 2]

Judgment.—Plaintiff-respondent 1 sued in the lower Court for partition. The relationship between the parties will be seen from the following genealogical tree.

Only one item of the family property is in dispute in the case, namely an 8 annas share of M. Mangi. According to the plaintiff this 8 annas is owned by the sons of Bhagwan and Gangaji, each set of sons being interested to the extent of 4 annas. The other 8 annas share is owned by defendant 1. His branch separated long ago and got this 8 annas. Defendant 1 is consequently not directly interested in this suit. But it was necessary to join him because some of the home farm appertaining to the 8 annas in suit lies in his patti and consequently there can be no proper division of the farm of that patti without his presence. According to the plaintiff there was a partition on 2nd April 1924 (Ex. 7 D-1) between Bhagwan and Gangaji but the 8 annas share now in suit was not divided by metes and bounds because litigation was pending in respect of it, but each took a separate though undivided half in it. On 14th June 1925 there was a second partition, after the death of Bhagwan and Gangaji, between the sons of Gangaji. In it Gangaji's undivided 4 annas share was assigned to defendant 2 Ganpat. On 22nd May 1928 a third partition (Ex. P-33) was effected between the sons of Bhagwan. In it 4 annas out of the 8 annas in suit was assigned to the plaintiff's share. The plaintiff now wants this 4 annas to be ascertained and divided off from the rest by metes and bounds. The difficulty in his way is that the deeds, Ex. 7-D-1 and Ex. P-33, relating to the first and third partitions, are unregistered and the question is whether the plaintiff can prove them.

His learned counsel argued that it did not much matter whether this could be done or not because if this property was not then divided, then he has a right to claim division now, and as there is no quarrel between his brother defendant 7, and himself, except on a minor point which does not concern us here, he is still entitled to 4 annas, or at any rate, at the worst, he should be given 2 annas and his brother 2 annas. The defendant's reply to this is that a partition cannot be partial, and that if the plaintiff wants to have the family estate divided it must all be brought into the hotchpot and consequently this suit, which is for the division of only one item of property, does not lie. Dealing first with the question of non-registration, the plaintiff's contention is that the deeds referred to are not instruments of partition: they merely recite a past event. Therefore, they do not require registration. This question was dealt with by a Division Bench of this Court, to which one of us (Bose J.) was a party, in 1938 N L J 82,[1] and the law, founded on two decisions of the Privy Council, was expressed as follows:

> It can be accepted at once that mere lists of property do not form an instrument of partition and so would not require registration, but what we have to determine here is whether these documents are mere lists or in themselves purport to 'create, declare, assign, limit, or extinguish ..... any right, title or interest' in the property which is admittedly over Rs. 100 in value. The question is whether these lists merely contain the recital of past events or in themselves embody the expression of will necessary to effect the change in the legal relation contemplated.

The two Privy Council decisions on which this is based are 11 Pat 272[2] at p. 279 and 50 Cal 338[3] at page 345. We have therefore to scrutinize these documents. Exhibit 7-D-1 calls itself a receipt. It recites:

> You and I are real brothers and were all joint up to this day. But today you and I have separated. And the undermentioned moveable and immovable property is allotted to your share.

It then sets out the property allotted to the share of the brother in whose favour the document is executed and continues:

> The aforesaid moveable and immovable property has been allotted to your share and is delivered into your share. Therefore neither I nor my heirs have left any right and interest therein.

Then follow certain items of property which are kept joint and the document states in respect of them:

> This property is joint. However we will have the same partitioned on the decision of the appeal . . . On getting the possession through Court, we will get it partitioned half and half. I have written and signed this receipt list at Sakhara with my free will and pleasure and while in full possession of senses.

The document is then dated, the name and address of the scribe is set out, and the signature of the executant. This is followed by the signatures of three attesting witnesses. We have no doubt that this document was "meant to embody the expression of will necessary to effect the change in the legal relation comtemplated." The use of the present tense suggests that, also its form, particularly the concluding portion which speaks of the document having been executed "with my free will and pleasure and while in full possession of senses." Also the fact that as many as three attesting witnesses were called. It is not usual to take all these pains except in documents intended to effect a change in legal relations. The idea was plainly that the whole thing should be reduced to writing and that the change should be effected by a written instrument so that there could be no doubt or uncertainty about the fact and details of the partition. That being so, the document required registration. This is also the position in respect of Ex. P-33. It has a doubtful clause in the beginning which is couched in the past tense, namely:

> Panchas have delivered the below mentioned moveable and immovable property into the possession of the said Namdeo ..... I admit the same.

But reading the document as a whole, we have no doubt that the intention was to make this the final and operative thing. It has to be remembered that finality is reached orally in nearly every transaction which is reduced to writing and that but for an intention to reduce the matter to writing the oral agreement would in itself constitute a valid and binding contract. But if the intention is that the writing is to be the operative contract, then the former verbal agreement falls to the ground. It has also to be understood that the word "panchas" can be used in a double sense. It can be used to signify arbitrators. That is to say, it can relate to a position in which there has been a reference to arbitrators with an award. In that event the change in the legal relationship would be effected by the award and not by the subsequent writing by the parties. But more generally the panchas are disinterested friends who are called in to give advice and help. They suggest a particular form of division. Each side makes modifications and gradually the parties work down to an agreement, and finally these friends say "there now, you take that and you that." In one sense of course it can be said that the division is effected by these panchas, and that is what the layman, speaking loosely, usually says. But when the position is carefully analysed the thing which legally concludes the matter is not their decision but the agreement of the parties, and the only part which the panchas play is in helping the parties to arrive at a common result. That, from a legal point of view, is on the same footing as an agreement reached orally. If, however, the parties desire that the agreement though reached orally should not be the final and operative agreement but that it should be reduced to the form of a document, then the final and operative matter which effects the change in the legal relationship is the writing and not the previous oral agreement. That we think is the position here.

The form of Ex. P-33 weighs with us as did the form of Ex. 7-D1, especially the concluding portion, which is much as before. Then there is a sentence in the middle which is couched in the present, and not the past tense: "one anna three pie share out of which one anna (shown) is separated of Mouze Wasari." Then again towards the end there is the following passage :

> Thus in the presence of all the panchas I have read this receipt of the moveable and immovable property in respect of the aforesaid one-half share: and after fully taking into consideration all the aforesaid moveable and immovable property we both brothers have taken our respective receipts in the presence of the panchas.

Then again we find the name of the scribe set out and the signature of the executant. We can find no meaning in this careful and elaborate document which was so solemnly drawn up with a counterpart signed by the other side if the two together were not intended by the parties to embody and legally effect the actual partition between them. We, therefore, agree with the lower Court in thinking that these documents required registration and that not having been registered they were struck out by S. 49, Registration Act.

The next question is whether they can be used in the evidence at all, and if so how. That depends upon the nature of partition under the Hindu law. It was argued that when analysed, the matter is found to consist of two separate elements which are distinct from one another and which can come into existence independently. The one is notional and relates to title, the other physical and relates to the occupation and possession of property. It was pointed out that a division in title can be effected without any division of property, and 12 N L R 113[4] at p. 120 was relied on.

It was then argued that instruments of partition which deal only with the first element, namely, a severance of joint status and title, can always be looked at whether registered or not, and it was said that though instruments of the second kind, which deal with a division of property, require registration, they can always be used to prove a severance of title. It was argued that no law requires that the severance in status should be effected by a registered instrument, or even by writing. It was pointed out that it is enough for one coparcener to declare unequivocally his determination to separate and to indicate that that determination is a fixed one. This, it was said, can be done by unilateral action and does not require the consent or assent of any other person. It was contended that the severance in title can be effected by a mere determination to sever and that no overt act or outward declaration of this intention is necessary. An extreme case was put. It was contended that man could suddenly awake in the middle of the night and say to himself 'I am separate," and that that would be enough. He need not disclose this to any one and could, if he so chose, keep his secret locked in his heart for as long as he liked. Then years later he could reveal what he had done, and if believed, all the consequences which flow from a severance in status would take effect from that date. That is how the argument was put in its most extreme form. An illustration easier to follow is that the man could reduce his intention to writing, sign and date it, and then without telling anybody a word about what he had done lock the statement up in his drawer and keep it there safe from prying eyes. It was argued that this would have the same effect.

We do not think that the matter can be put in that extreme form. It is true that the texts quoted by the Privy Council in 12 N L R 113[4] at p. 121 say that "partition is a particular condition of the mind" and that it can be effected by "mere intention," but they also indicate that that intention must be accompanied by a declaration "I am separate from thee." This shows, we think, that the person separating has to tell at least those from whom he intends to separate about his intention. Their Lordships express the position thus at page 122. "Once the decision has been unequivocally expressed and clearly intimated to his co-sharers, etc." Therefore it is clear that there must be not only a mental decision to effect the change but also an outward expression of it which is communicated to the co-sharers, or at any rate to some of them. The texts which their Lordships quote state that > . . . a partition is effected by the mere declaration 'I am separate from thee', for partition is a particular condition of the mind and the declaration is indicative of the same.

And again: "From this it is known that without any formality partition can be effected by mere intention." It seems to us therefore that the intention and the declaration are both necessary ingredients in the matter of effecting severance. It is true that this declaration does not have to be reduced to the form of a document. It can be effected "without any formality." But if it is reduced to writing, then it seems to us that it is an instrument of the kind contemplated by S. 17 (1) (b), Registration Act. It either "creates" or purports to create "a right, title or interest in immovable property," or at any rate it "declares" or "purports to declare" that such exists. Such a document says that whereas the right, title and interest before execution was joint now it is several. It says that after execution the property to which it relates has ceased to be joint family property, that is to say, it either creates a separate title and separate interests which are different and distinct from a joint title and joint interests, or it declares that they now exist, whereas they did not exist before. We think that such a document falls within the purview of S. 17 (1) (b) and that it is struck at by S. 49. It would consequently be inadmissible in evidence not only as regards that aspect of partition which relates to a division of property by metes and bounds but also as to that which relates to a severance of title. In this we agree with 15 C W N 375[5] at p. 378 and we think that this conclusion is a necessary corollary to the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 51 ALL 771.[6]

The next question is whether and how far the deed can come in under the proviso to S. 49 which allows documents which would otherwise be excluded, to be used as evidence "of any collateral transaction not required to be effected by a registered instrument." In 43 Mad 244[7] at p. 249 their Lordships of the Privy Council allowed an unregistered deed of gift, which required registration, to be used not to prove a gift, (because no legal title passed) but to prove that the donee thereafter held in her own right. We think the same rule applies here. It may be that these unregistered deeds did not in themselves effect any legal severance of title, but if the parties thought they did and acted on that belief, and in fact held their shares in severalty from that time, then we think that those facts can be proved and that the documents can be used to show the nature and character of the possession after their execution. But once that is done, once it is shown that the parties actually severed their interests and acted on these documents, then the partitions with which they severally deal are fully and completely established. The distinction is a subtle one but is real. Partition, unlike a sale or transfer which consists in its essence of a single act, is a continuing state of fact. It does not require any formality, and therefore if parties actually divide their estate and agree to hold in severalty there is an end of the matter. They are bound by their agreement. The documents we are dealing with would not bring about any separation of title or division of property because they are unregistered but the subsequent actings of the parties in pursuance of an intention to divide would.

An illustration will show what we mean. One member of a coparcenary writes a letter to his fellow coparceners telling them of his intention to separate and sends it by messenger. On the way the letter is lost or destroyed or burnt, and never arrives. There would be no partition, notional or otherwise, because, as we have shown, the declaration of an intention to separate has to be communicated to at least one other coparcener. But if thereafter the writer of the letter were to go to the other coparceners and tell them about the letter, if they were then to divide up the property between them and agree to hold it separately, and actually do so, then there would be a complete partition. It would be effected not by the lost or destroyed letter, which in the result proved ineffective, but by the subsequent agreement and actings; and these facts could be proved in the ordinary way. If no direct proof of agreement were available, it could be inferred if the necessary material were there, and the fact that the letter we are speaking of had been written and sent would be relevant and material. In itself the letter would be useless to effect the partition, but it would be material to show that the course of events which followed upon its execution had reference to a subsequent agreement to divide and to hold in severalty.

The matter can be put in another way: If these documents which we have been considering had been registered they would in themselves have brought about a separation of title and a division of property. Thereafter, the parties to the agreement could have insisted on having its terms carried out. A could say that property X fell to his share and that it must be given to him. But being unregistered they are ineffective to bring about a partition, and therefore if the parties did nothing else, if they did not confirm that agreement, or act upon it and carry out its terms, then A would not be able to demand property X. All he could do would be to ask for a fresh division and in it property X might or might not fall to his share. But if the parties confirm the unregistered agreement, or act upon it and carry out its terms, and do so with the intention of separating, then partition would be complete, and A would be able to claim property X, not under the unregistered document but in virtue of the subsequent agreement confirming the original intention.

No question of transfer of title arises in partition. Each parcener already has complete title to and dominion over every parcel of the joint estate. Partition is consequently only a change in the mode of enjoyment of the joint property coupled with an alteration in status, the joint title being divided into a number of separate ones. No particular formality is required, and therefore although a document by which the parties had intended to have this division effected may, in the result, prove ineffective for that purpose, nevertheless their common desire to act upon it, and their action in doing so, would spring from a continuation of the original intention, and that at any particular moment of time would amount to a confirmation of the original agreement; and if for any reason the original agreement were to fall to the ground, or be unprovable, such confirmation would in itself constitute a fresh and subsequent agreement which would be enough in itself to effect complete partition; and that agreement would be provable in any of the usual ways. We think that that is the true position and we think that that was the decision in A I R 1927 Nag 113.[8]

The rulings cited before us, namely 45 ALL 21,[9] 15 C W N 375[5] and AIR 1927 Nag 113,[8] do not consider the position of the unregistered document in relation to this subsequent agreement. All they decide is that oral evidence is admissible of the fact of partition. In our opinion the subsequent agreement of which we have spoken is "a collateral transaction not required to be effected by a registered instrument" within the meaning of S. 49, Registration Act. Therefore, the unregistered document can be used as material in proof of it. Of course it cannot prove such agreement in itself because no such agreement can be deemed to have been in existence at the date of its execution. But it could be used to corroborate other evidence or facts. It could be used in conjunction with other evidence to show that such subsequent agreement was likely and to elucidate the intention of the parties in effecting such subsequent agreement. It could be used to show the character of the possession and the nature of the title, provided there is other evidence to establish separate possession. Coming now to the facts of this case. The first partition is said to have been made on 2nd April 1924. We will ignore the unregistered deed, Ex. 7 D-1, for the present and examine the other evidence. First of all there is Ex. 7 D-3, a letter dated 5th June 1924, written by defendant 2, Ganpat, to a couple of the panchas who are said to have effected or brought about the partition. It says:

In my absence at Sakhara you divided our estate into two shares. But I do not know anything at all. Similarly as there is ill-will between Gangaji Patil and myself I have no means to know how the shares were made. Hence both of you should come and explain as soon as possible the partition lists made in respect of the immovable property. As the property is ancestral, rights thereto vest in me as well. Hence, please explain to me as soon as possible the particulars of the shares with the details of the properties with acres and all other things falling thereto.

8. ('27) 14 AIR 1927 Nag 113: 99 I C 448, Jiji Bai v. Ratan Singh.
9. ('22) 9 A I R 1922 All 493: 70 I C 953: 45 All 21: 20 A L J 777, Jai Ram Das v. Raj Narain.

This is clear proof of the fact that either Ganpat's father Gangaji had made a declaration of his intention to separate or that Bhagwan had done so, and that this declaration had been communicated to Ganpat. It is also proof of the fact that either Gangaji or Bhagwan, or both, had persisted in this intention, had got panchas to divide the property, and that a division was made. The unregistered instrument of partition, Ex. 7 D-1, can be used to corroborate this evidence. Reading the two together there can be no doubt that the first element of partition, namely the separation of title in the year 1924, is completely established.

As regards the second element, the division of property, Ex. 7 D-1 is powerless to effect that, and Ex. 7-D-3 shows, for what it is worth, that Ganpat was not a party to the division. Therefore, he is not bound by it, for of course a division of the estate cannot be made unless all the coparceners consent or the Courts direct it. But it shows that he was aware that a certain division of property had been suggested and that all he asked was to be told its terms in order that he might decide whether to accept them or not. But, if we find that subsequently the parties continued in separate possession in accordance with the terms of the unregistered deed it will be legitimate to infer that Ganpat on learning of the terms did not object and so confirmed and ratified the arrangement, that is to say that he was also a consenting party. We turn next to the pleadings. The plaintiff had set up this partition of 1924 (including a division of the estate by metes and bounds) in his plaint. In his rejoinder defendant 2, Ganpat denied the partition but admitted that the property has been divided and that it was in the separate and exclusive possession of Gangaji's sons. This is his statement:

> It is already denied that there was a partition in 1924 between Bhagwan and Gangaji as alleged. It is admitted there was an arrangement between the sons of Gangaji to enjoy the property that was in the management of their father, separately and exclusively for the sake of convenience. But there was no partition.

He also said that the partition, if any, was in any event unfair. But that is another matter. We need not travel beyond the pleas of defendant 2 because he is the only appellant. As he admits that the property was held exclusively and separately that fact need not be proved, and all we are now concerned to see is the character of the possession. But if proof were needed, it is to be found in the deposition of defendant 2 himself as 2 D. W. 4. He was forced to admit the truth of these facts. There is also the evidence of P. Ws. 5, 6 and 7 and Ex. P-16 the order of the Commissioner, dated 21st March 1929 directing mutation in the Record of Rights enquiry. After the admission in Ex. 7-D-3 about the severance of the joint status, it would be difficult to resist the conclusion that the subsequent division of the estate was not in pursuance of such an intention but Ex. 7-D-1 places the matter beyond doubt. This unregistered document can be used for this limited and collateral purpose. We hold, therefore, that there was a partition in 1924 which included a division of the estate by metes and bounds.

As regards Ganpat's contention that this was in any event unfair, until he chooses to sue to have it set aside it must stand. But, in any case, there is no proof of unfairness, so, that can be set on one side. The subsequent partitions of 1925 and 1928 are not of much moment. The one of 1925 was between Gangaji's sons and the one of 1928 between the plaintiff and his brother, defendant 7. So far as they are concerned (that is to say the plaintiff and his brother) this partition between them is admitted except on a small detail which does not affect us. As regards the one between Gangaji's sons it does not matter to the plaintiff whether they are divided or not so long as the main division in 1924 is upheld. It is the case of all the parties that the property in suit was never divided. The plaintiff says, because litigation was then pending in respect of it, defendant 2 says, because there was never a partition. It is clear then that the plaintiff is entitled to claim a division of this property in any event. The only relevance of the partition of 1924 is that if it never took place then the plaintiff would be obliged to bring into hotchpot all the property in his possession and would be obliged to ask for a complete partition. He could not demand a partial partition. But in view of our findings that the partition of 1924 is established and that it embraced not only a separation of title but also a division of the joint estate barring the property now in suit, the plaintiff's right of suit is clear.

Respondent 8, Abdul Razak Ahmad died during the pendency of the appeal. His legal representatives were not brought on record and the appellant gave him up. The appeal therefore abated as against him. As regards defendant 1, his learned counsel stated that nothing was claimed for or against him and that he had no interest in the suit beyond the one stated in the plaint. He did not oppose the plaintiff's claim and said that he had nothing to urge either for or against the appeal. The decision of the lower Court is upheld and the appeal is dismissed with costs which will be separately apportioned. The plaintiff (respondent 1) will be paid his full costs separately. Defendant 1, Waman, (respondent 2) will get only nominal costs which we assess at Rs. 30. Defendant 7, Ramchandra, (respondent 7), will also get nominal costs. The remaining respondents who are the appellant's brothers will get no costs.

Judgment. — This raises a question of limitation. Admittedly, the matter is out of time unless S. 4, Limitation Act, can be prayed in aid. The matter in question is a Letters Patent Appeal. The time for appealing is fixed by rules of Court. In I L R (1939) Nag 124[1] it was indicated that A I R 1921 Lah 237[2] and A I R 1934 Pat 353[3] might be in the way of applying S. 4. Section 4 only relates to cases where a time has been prescribed. Prescribed means, prima facie, prescribed by the Act in question. Section 29, however, brings in any time prescribed by "any special or local law." The above cases decide that "law" as used in S. 29 does not include a rule of Court but is restricted apparently to Acts of a Legislature. The General Clauses Act by an amendment in 1937 included the following:

'Indian law' shall include any law, ordinance, order, by-law, rule or regulation passed or made at any time by any competent Legislature, authority, or person in British India (S. 3 (27a)).

See also S. 4A (1). Here the expression used is not "Indian law" but "law" and it could be argued that as the General Clauses Act finds it necessary to provide that "Indian law" includes a rule made by the appropriate authority in India it would not include a rule but for the provision. We, however, hesitate to decide the matter on this ground. The term "law" is not the same as the term "Act" and even the term "Act" includes rules of Court in some cases, e. g., Scotland where "Act of Sederunt" means a rule of Court relating to procedure. One can properly speak of customary law and the word, according to its derivation, means, merely, that which is laid down and fixed. It does not depend on the nature of the body that lays it down. If that body has the power to lay down a binding rule the rule becomes a law which has to be obeyed. Different considerations, of course, apply if the rule is ultra vires as in 8 Rang 380.[4] The Judicial Committee in 57 ALL 242[5] laid down the broad proposition that outside the limited discretion conferred by the Limitation Act in certain cases the Court has no discretion to relieve a suitor from its provisions.

That leads to the next point. Granted that "law" can be given the extended meaning above referred to, it is said that S. 4 can only be prayed in aid here if the Court was closed and the Court was not closed within the meaning of S. 4. Section 10, General Clauses Act, admittedly does not assist the appellant. It is urged that S. 4, Limitation Act, is not concerned with an office but with a Court. We agree with the view expressed in A I R 1939 Pat 667[6] at p. 677 that "office" and "Court" are two separate things. It is said that a Court is closed when the Judge of that Court is not sitting or when notification is made that the Court is closed. It is argued that it is neither here nor there that the business in hand, which consists in filing an appeal, can, in fact, be done as usual. Owing to the ruling in I L R (1939) Nag 124,[1] which gave a warning that S. 4 might not be available in cases of Letters Patent Appeals owing to the two rulings first cited, Letters Patent Appeals are now dealt with differently from all other appeals. In the case of Letters Patent Appeals it was notified that they would be accepted during the vacation. It will be remembered that during the vacation the High Court is not absolutely closed. Two or three Judges remain but it is closed for certain business including ordinary appeals. For this type of business the Court is closed within the meaning of S. 4. For other business, including a very limited class of civil business, the Court is open. Whether open or closed depends on whether the business in question can be done. Here this particular kind of business can be done and the rule permitting it was made because of the danger expressed in I L R (1939) Nag 124[1] where a warning was given.

In 46 Mad 938[7] following two Full Bench decisions, 5 Mad 189[8] and 38 Mad 295,[9] it was decided that where there is a rule which states that the Court will be open on certain days for certain business the Court (despite the long vacation) cannot be treated as closed so far as such business is concerned. In 51 Bom 848[10] the same view was taken on the broad ground that S 4 is a legislative recognition of the maxim actus curiæ neminem gravabit. That is to say if a litigant is prevented from doing a thing, which he has to do in a given time, by the act of the Court itself justice demands that he shall be allowed to do it immediately the obstacle is removed. If therefore you find that the act in question can be done despite the vacation the Court is not closed for that purpose and the purpose of S. 4 is not attracted. In the same sense is A I R 1933 Lah 239[11] and A I R 1924 Bom 144.[12] Here notification was made on 18th March 1940 about the disposal of work during the summer vacation of 1940. This notification states, inter alia, as follows :

> The High Court of Judicature at Nagpur will remain closed on the civil side from Monday the 15th April to Sunday the 23rd June 1940, both days inclusive.

Certain criminal work is then provided for. Then, in para. 6 the following is notified :

> No new institutions on the civil side will be received during the vacation except urgent applications for interlocutory orders, which will be dealt with by the vacation Judges, and appeals under the Letters Patent to this Court.

Then, in para. 8, the following is notified:

> The office will remain open to the public on working days throughout the above period and will transact business as usual.

It is obvious from a perusal of the above that the office is open as usual and that the Court is closed except for certain business which includes the business in question. It cannot therefore be said to be closed for this purpose. It follows that the appeal is barred by time. The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Civil Revn. Appln. No. 393 of 1940, Decided on 18th December 1940, for revision of order of Addl. Dist. Judge, Nagpur, D/- 25th April 1940.

(a) Court-fees Act (1870), S. 12—Decision as to court-fee is not final under S. 12 unless both parties are heard.

A decision as to court fee payable is not final within the meaning of S. 12 unless it is reached after both sides have had a chance to be heard. Consequently, where the Court after hearing the appellant decides ex parte that the memo is properly stamped but subsequently after hearing both the parties comes to the conclusion that the memo is insufficiently stamped, the later decision must be taken to be final between the parties within the meaning of S. 12 : 20 All 11 (FB) and ('33) 20 AIR 1933 Pat 234, Rel. on; ('37) 24 A I R 1937 Pat 514, Disting. [P 219 C 2]

(b) Court-fee—Partition suit — Appeal—Appellant must pay court-fee paid by plaintiff in lower Court.

In the case of an appeal against a decree in a partition suit the appellant must pay the same court-fee which the plaintiff paid in the lower Court : ('30) 17 A I R 1930 Rang 164 and ('29) 16 A I R 1929 Sind 161, Rel. on; ('22) 9 A I R 1922 Mad 211, Approved; 27 All 151, Expl. [P 220 C 1]

A. R. Kulkarni — for Applicants.

K. A. Potey and R. R. Dandige — for Non-Applicants.

Order.— Applicant 1, Gangu is the sister of non-applicants 1 and 2, Salu and Kamalji. Applicant 2 is the husband of Gangu, while non-applicant 3 Govinda is a transferee from Salu and Kamalji. The three non-applicants brought this suit against the two applicants and others for partition and separate possession of two-thirds share of a house. Their contentions, as far as they are material to this revision application, were that the three sisters had obtained title under a gift deed from Mt. Sakhu, that after disputes had arisen between Salu and Kamalji on the one side and Gangu and her husband on the other, proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., were instituted, as a result of which Gangu and her husband were placed in possession of the house. Salu and Kamalji therefore with the help of plaintiff 3 Govinda, to whom they had transferred half their share in the house, brought this action to obtain possession of their share from the defendants. The applicants' case in the lower Court was that the gift deed was void, that even if it was not void the plaintiffs could not obtain separate possession of their share as long as the donor Sakhu was alive because it was so recited in the gift deed, and that the plaintiffs' claim was barred by limitation. The trial Court held that the gift deed was valid, and that the clause in it which barred the partition of the house during the lifetime of Sakhu, was void, that the suit was not barred by limitation, and hence the Court passed a decree for partition of the house and at the same time orderd the applicants to pay Rs. 50 as compensatory costs under S. 35A, Civil P. C., to the plaintiffs. Against this decree the applicants appealed to the District Judge and challenged the above findings and the order to pay costs under S. 35A. The Deputy Clerk of Court drew the attention of the learned Judge to the necessity for considering the adequacy of the court-fees which the appellants had paid : Rs. 15 for a declaration that the plaintiffs were not entitled to claim partition, Rs. 15 for a declaration that the sale deed executed by plaintiffs 1 and 2 in favour of Govinda, plaintiff 3, was void and Rs. 3-12-0 for a relief against the order to pay Rs. 50 costs under S. 35A, Civil P. C., total Rs 33-12-0. The Additional District Judge, before whom the appeal came, heard the appellant's counsel on the question of court-fee, and on 8th January 1940 passed the following order in the order sheet :

> The memo of appeal is properly stamped. The appeal is admitted. Intimation be sent to the lower Court. I have heard the appellant's counsel. Notices to issue to the respondents.

When the respondents appeared on 26th February 1940 they took an objection to the sufficiency of the court-fee, which the appellants had paid, and the question was set down for argument on 5th March 1940 on which date the appellants applied to amend their memorandum of appeal by striking out grounds 1, 8 and 9. Grounds 8 and 9 cover the limitation point, while ground 1 challenges the interpretation of the gift deed by the trial Court. By striking out these grounds, the appellants made it clear that they were giving up their opposition to the title of plaintiffs 1 and 2 under the gift deed and that they only desired to oppose the finding of the lower Court as to the plaintiffs' right to separate possession. The right of the plaintiffs to joint possession was recognized by this application for amendment. The applicants' contention now being that, in so far as the gift deed precluded partition of the property during the lifetime of the donor, it could not be partitioned. They also desired to contest the validity of the transfer by plaintiffs 1 and 2 to plaintiff 3 and the order to pay Rs. 50 compensatory costs. If this amendment were allowed they claimed that the court-fee which they had paid would be sufficient. The Additional District Judge has held that the memorandum of appeal is insufficiently stamped, ad valorem court-fee being necessary, and that the amendment, which the appellants desired to make, would not affect the court-fee payable by them. He therefore gave them time to pay the deficiency, amounting to Rs. 141. Before the time expired the appellants presented this application for revision to the High Court and obtained an order staying the operation of the lower appellate Court's order which required them to pay deficient court-fee by a certain date. The applicants before me have taken up two positions :

(a) That the learned Additional District Judge, having on 8th January 1940 held that the memo of appeal was properly stamped, could not reconsider that order and hold that it was insufficiently stamped.

(b) That by reason of the applicant's admitting the title of the plaintiffs to the house by their amendment application there was in point of fact no deficiency in the court-fee which they had paid.

These then are the points which I am required to consider.

(a)—On this question the applicants rely on S. 12, Court-fees Act, which provides :

(i) Every question relating to valuation for the purpose of determining the amount of any fee chargeable under this chapter on a plaint or memorandum of appeal shall be decided by the Court in which such plaint or memorandum, as the case may be, is filed, and such decision shall be final as between the parties to the suit.

The point was considered in 20 ALL 11[1] by a Full Bench which observed at p. 17:

When the Legislature intends to confer the status of finality upon an ex parte decision, it does so in plain and explicit terms, as in S. 5, Court-fees Act. In the absence of clear and unequivocal language to the contrary, I must hold that a decision to be 'final as between the parties' must be a judicial decision upon a hearing in which the general judicial maxim of 'Audi alteram partem' has been observed. If then a plaint or memorandum of appeal has been so filed it surely would be open to the defendant at the hearing to contend that the fees paid were insufficient, and that for that reason the plaint on the files of the Court was not a valid plaint. On deciding such a plea—as is the case here—the Court would in my opinion come to the 'decision,' which, under the wording of S. 12, Court-fees Act, would be final as between the parties.

In 12 Pat 694,[2] which has been referred to by the lower appellate Court, an ex parte decision was given by the Stamp Reporter which he subsequently corrected, as was done by the lower appellate Court in this case. Mr. Kulkarni on behalf of the applicants would distinguish that case on the ground that it was a decision of the Stamp Reporter and not of a Judge. Nevertheless the reasoning of the learned Judge applies just as much to a case in which the decision is reached by a Judge as it does in the case of a decision reached by a Stamp Reporter. In that case it was suggested by the Government pleader that the question of the sufficiency of the stamp on the memorandum of appeal must always be regarded as open until the appeal is finally heard and disposed of, in view of the the provisions of the first part of S. 12, Court-fees Act, which directs that every question relating to valuation for the purpose of determining the amount of any fee chargeable on a memorandum of appeal shall be decided by the Court in which such memorandum is filed; and it is suggested that at the final hearing of the appeal it is open to the respondent to object that the memorandum of appeal has not been properly stamped. This view is certainly correct as applying to Courts subordinate to the High Court.

In the other case, to which the lower appellate Court has referred, it has given a wrong reference having cited A I R 1937 Pat 234, the correct page is 514—and the ruling is officially reported in 16 Pat 491.[3] As far as that case is concerned, I agree with Mr. Kulkarni that it is distinguishable because it only refers to the practice of the Patna High Court. 20 ALL 11[1] and 12 Pat 694[2] are however good authority for the view that the decision is not final within the meaning of S. 12, Court-fees Act, unless it is reached after both sides have had a chance to be heard.

(b)—On this question also I am of opinion that the lower Court has come to a correct decision. It is said by Mr. Kulkarni that the applicants were fully within their rights in giving up part of their case for which he relied on the language of O. 2, R. 2, Civil P. C., and in 5 N L R 88[4] at p. 91. He also argues, relying on 15 C P L R 120,[5] that the valuation for the computation of court-fees of a suit for partition depends upon whether the relief sought is merely a change in the mode of enjoyment of the property, or the enforcement of a disputed right. In the case before me he says that after giving up the part of his case which challenged the validity of the deed of gift he was only seeking a change in the mode of enjoyment of the admittedly joint property. He also relied on 27 ALL 151[6] for his contention that when a plaintiff in the initial stage of the litigation abandons a portion of his claim he is not compellable to pay court-fees in respect of the portion abandoned under penalty of having the whole of his suit dismissed. Mutatis mutandis he says that this applies equally well to an appellant as to a plaintiff. As far as the Allahabad case is concerned, it is worth mention that the learned Judges before making the pronouncement prefaced it by saying that it was not without a good deal of hesitation that they had come to this decision and they concluded it by saying that the matter is, we admit, one which is capable of argument on both sides, and it is with some hesitation that we have come to this decision.

So the decision cannot be said to be a very strong one in favour of the applicants. In 45 Mad 246,[7] it was held that the test of a valuation of an appeal is the value of the relief which is sought to be got rid of. A I R 1929 Sind 161[8] and A I R 1930 Rang 164[9] are sufficient authority for holding that in a case, such as this, the appellant must pay the same court-fee which the plaintiff paid in the lower Court. The lower appellate Court is therefore correct in requiring the applicants to pay Rs. 141 more. The application accordingly fails and is dismissed with costs. Counsel's fee Rs. 15. The applicants had about a week remaining within which to pay the deficient court-fee at the time when they presented this application for revision. I therefore allow them one more week within which to pay the deficient court-fee in the lower appellate Court, if they wish to have a decision on the merits of their case. The lower appellate Court will have power to enlarge this time if in its view such a course seemed just and equitable.

Misc. Appeal No. 256 of 1939, Decided on 5th March 1941, from order of Dist. Judge, Chhindwara, D/- 8th September 1939.

Court-fees Act (1870), Ss. 4, 6 and 28 — S. 6 does not bar application of S. 149, Civil P. C.

Section 6 does not bar the application of S. 149, Civil P. C. Any conflict that is likely to arise between Ss. 4 and 6, Court-fees Act, and S. 149, Civil P. C., is resolved by S. 28, Court-fees Act. A memorandum of appeal which is insufficiently stamped can only be received by mistake or inadvertence or when it is accompanied by an application praying for extension of time under S. 149, Civil P. [P 221 C 1, 2]

M. Hidayatullah — for Appellants.

W. B. Pendharkar — for Respondents.

Order. — The question that arises upon this reference may be formulated as follows: Whether S. 6, Court-fees Act, bars the application of S. 149, Civil P. C.? Section 6, Court-fees Act, provides that no document of any of the kinds specified as chargeable in Sch. 1 or 2 to that Act "shall be filed, exhibited or recorded in any Court of justice or shall be received or furnished by any public officer" unless in respect of such document there be paid the prescribed fees. The contention raised on behalf of the appellant is that as the aforesaid section prohibits the reception of a memorandum of appeal inadequately stamped, the duty of the receiving officer and of the Court is merely to return the memorandum of appeal and that the appellate Court has no jurisdiction to reject it which it could have only when it had authority to receive it. The contention is manifestly repugnant to the plain terms of S. 149, Civil P. C., which authorises the Court to extend, in its discretion, time for payment of the deficient court-fees and, were it to prevail, would render that section otiose. The contention apparently exposes a conflict between S 6, Court-fees Act, and S. 149, Civil Procedure Code.

In 38 Bom 41[1] it was held that S. 149, Civil P. C., was independent of S. 6, Court-fees Act, which was explained as prohibiting only the reception of insufficiently stamped documents as if they were sufficiently stamped. That view did not commend itself to Sulaiman, Ag. C. J., in 50 ALL 980[2] in which the insufficiently stamped memorandum of appeal was returned to the appellant under S. 6, Court-fees Act, for the reason that the failure to pay requisite court-fees was intentional. The same view had been taken in 3

Pat L J 74,[3] 1 Lah 234[4] and 27 M L J 677.[5] In 59 Cal 388[6] the view of the Allahabad, Patna, Lahore and Madras High Courts was followed in preference to that of the Bombay High Court, but it was pointed out that the rejection of the appeal meant only refusal to entertain or receive it and that it did not preclude presentation of the appeal on sufficient stamp. In 61 Cal 663[7] reference was made to S. 4, Court-fees Act, (which is the same as S. 6 but made applicable only to the High Courts and Presidency Small Cause Courts) as being imperative in its terms to prohibit reception of documents inadequately stamped, but it was observed that, notwithstanding that section, the Court had a discretionary power under S. 149, Civil P. C., to admit the documents and grant extension of time to enable the appellant to make good the deficiency in cases of bona fide mistake. The same view was taken in A I R 1929 Nag 294.[8] In 26 N L R 183[9] Macnair, A. J. C., declined to follow 38 Bom 41[1] and on examination of the provisions of Ss. 4 and 6, Court-fees Act, and S. 149, Civil P. C., attempted reconciliation of the conflict by holding that while the Judge was not bound to permit the appellant to pay court-fees on a subsequent date, it was open to him to admit the insufficiently stamped appeals in exercise of his discretion in proper cases and grant time for making good the deficiency.

Any conflict that is likely to arise between Ss. 4 and 6, Court-fees Act, and S. 149, Civil P. C., is resolved by S. 28, Court-fees Act, which declares a document not properly stamped as being invalid unless and until it is properly stamped but confers authority on the presiding Judge to order, in a fit case, that such document be stamped as he may direct. A memorandum of appeal which is insufficiently stamped can only be received by mistake or inadvertence or when it is accompanied by an application praying for extension of time under S. 149, Civil P. C. When it is once received and comes before the Court, it falls to be dealt with under S. 149, Civil P. C., read with S. 28, Court-fees Act. This furnishes a conclusive answer to the contention that S. 6, Court-fees Act, bars the application of S. 149, Civil P. C. The Court acting under that section may reject the memorandum as inadmissible in cases in which it sees no ground for extension of time to make good the deficiency or merely return it as was done in 50 ALL 980.[2] Whether it is "rejected" or "returned" it does not preclude the appellant from presenting a fresh memorandum of appeal on sufficient court-fees. Our answer to the question is in the negative. This case will now go back to the referring Judge for decision on the merits.

(a) Co-sharers — Surrender to single co-sharer amounts to transfer.

A single co-sharer is not entitled to take a surrender and if he does so the transaction is a transfer : S. A. No. 410 of 1935 and ('26) 13 A I R 1926 Nag 345, Rel. on. [P 222 C 1]

(b) C. P. Tenancy Act (1 of 1920), S. 13 — Lambardar omitting to apply under S. 13 — He can sue his co-sharer for possession of holding surrendered by tenant to him.

A lambardar who omits to apply under S. 13 for possession of an occupancy holding surrendered by the tenant to his co-sharer can sue his co-sharer in the civil Court for joint possession of the holding, inasmuch as when a lambardar sues his co-sharer in the civil Court for joint possession of the holding he does so as a co-sharer, which he can do in spite of the fact that he could as lambardar sue to set aside the transfer under S. 13 and claim to be put into exclusive possession of the whole holding on behalf of the proprietary body : ('26) 13 A I R 1926 Nag 345, Foll. ; S. Order. — The question referred to us for decision has been framed by Niyogi J. as follows :

Can a lambardar who omitted to apply under S. 13, Central Provinces Tenancy Act, for possession of an occupancy holding surrendered by the tenant to his co-sharer, sue his co-sharer in the civil Court for joint possession of the holding ?

The occupancy field in question was No. 25 of mouza Zullar in which the plaintiff and defendant are both 2 anna co-sharers of mahal No. 2. Plaintiff is also Sadar Lambardar of the whole mahal. The tenant of survey No. 25 surrendered it in favour of the defendant on 20th March 1934 by a registered deed. The plaint states that the defendant had no right to accept the surrender and take possession of the suit property, but assuming that he could take a valid surrender, defendant has taken it on behalf of the plaintiff co-sharer and defendant's possession is on behalf of the plaintiff. The relief asked for is that the suit property be partitioned and half be given into plaintiff's possession, or plaintiff be put in joint possession of the suit property, or plaintiff be compensated in money value to the extent of his share. On a preliminary objection the issue was framed whether the civil Court's jurisdiction was barred by the Tenancy Act. The trial Court dismissed the suit holding that as the surrender to a co-sharer was a transfer, the remedy of the lambardar was to apply under S. 13, Central Provinces Tenancy Act, and the civil Court had no jurisdiction. This dismissal of the claim was upheld by the lower appellate Court.

In making the reference, Niyogi J., refers to 22 N L R 86[1] in which a lambardar was allowed to treat a transfer as a surrender and on that footing to claim joint possession in the civil Court. He questions the correctness of that decision. The first argument pressed on us by learned counsel for the appellant is that a surrender to a co-sharer is not necessarily a transfer: the plaintiff was entitled to treat it as a surrender to himself also on the ground that he impliedly consented to it. There is nothing however about implied consent in the plaint or pleadings. A single co-sharer is not entitled to take a surrender, and it has been consistently held that if he does so the transaction is a transfer. The latest case on the point, which will shortly be published in the Indian Law Reports Series is Second Appeal No. 410 of 1935[2] in which the learned Judges remark :

> There is a long line of cases which decide that one co-sharer cannot, for his own benefit, take a surrender .... If a co-sharer purport, without this authority, to take a surrender he has been treated as a transferee and the matter has been dealt with as falling under S. 12 and not under section 89.

Later on in the case, 22 N L R 86[1] is discussed and generally approved. The Judges agree with the view that in that case the consideration was not illegal within the meaning of S. 23, Contract Act, and the transaction was not one void ab initio. It was also noted that in that case the lambardar did not attack the transaction by proceeding under S. 13 but he asked a civil Court to put him in possession and was met by a defence based on those equities which the civil Court is bound to give effect to. The plaint in the present case is not drafted so clearly as it might be, but it seems clear that the relief asked for is based on the position that plaintiff is a co-sharer. The plaint does mention that he is a lambardar also and that the defendant had no right to accept the surrender; but the transfer is in fact accepted and plaintiff claims joint possession or separate possession after partition. Plaintiff's learned counsel indicates that he is willing to pay his share in the cost of acquisition. Now as the suit is not one to set aside a transfer under S. 13, Tenancy Act, the jurisdiction of the civil Court is not excluded under S. 105 (c) of that Act.

It is however argued for the other side that the plaintiff could have got the same relief if he had chosen to contest the transfer under S. 13, and as he has slept over his remedy for about 2½ years it should now be refused to him. No doubt the lambardar could have obtained possession under S. 13, Tenancy Act, on behalf of all the co-sharers including himself. That procedure was followed in S. A. No. 410 of 1935[2] and was approved in A I R 1940 Nag 370.[3] But why should he, more than any other co-sharer, be compelled to have recourse to that remedy? That remedy he has as a representative. Any other co-sharer, not the lambardar, has in the civil Court his private remedy of joint possession on paying his quota. Why should the lambardar not have that private remedy also in his capacity as share-holder? We do not think that the fact of there being only two co-sharers would make any difference. In 22 N L R 86[1] the plaintiff in appeal was given possession only of his one anna share and not the shares of the remaining co-sharers. If in the present case the lambardar had sued as such he would necessarily have asked for possession of the whole field (on behalf of the proprietary body) instead of joint possession with the other share holders. We therefore see no reason to dissent from 22 N L R 86,[1] and our answer to the question put to us is in the affirmative because we hold that when a lambardar sues his co-sharer in the civil Court for joint possession of the holding he is so suing as a co-sharer, which he may do in spite of the fact that he could as lambardar sue to set aside the transfer under S. 13, Tenancy Act, and claim to be put into exclusive possession of the whole holding on behalf of the proprietary body.

Civil Revn. No. 858 of 1939, Decided on 12th November 1940, for revision of order of Dist. Judge, Nagpur, D/- 5th November 1939.

Civil P. C. (1908), S. 2 (2) and O. 6, R. 5 — Suit for damages — Plaintiff ordered to furnish certain particulars — Plaintiff even after several opportunities failing to furnish particulars — Court thereupon passing order discharging defendant — Order held amounted to decree and was appealable.

In a suit for damages the plaintiff was ordered by the trial Court to furnish certain particulars. The plaintiff was given two opportunities to do so but he was unable to give the required particulars. Thereupon the trial Court passed an order whereby the defendants were discharged :

Held that the order of dismissal amounted to a decree within the meaning of S. 2 (2) and hence an appeal lay from it : ('32) 19 A I R 1932 Mad 316, Dissent; ('30) 17 A I R 1930 Mad 473, Disting.; ('24) 11 A I R 1924 All 17, Expl. [P 224 C 2]

Order. — The question here is whether the appellate Court had jurisdiction to entertain the appeal in respect of which this revision has been filed. The contention is that no appeal lay from the order of the first Court complained of before the appellate Court and that consequently the order of the appellate Court reversing the first Court's order was made without jurisdiction. The facts are as follows. The plaintiff instituted a suit for damages against five persons and was ordered by the trial Court to furnish certain particulars. The plaintiff was given two opportunities to do so but was not able to satisfy the first Court. Accordingly that Court passed the order which has given rise to the trouble in this case. The order is a curious one and, so far as it is relevant, is in these terms :

> The plaint does not mention anything as to when the amounts were alleged to have been embezzled. Under the circumstances it is not possible to proceed with the case. It is fair that the defendants, especially defendant 4, should know about the period in which the amounts were said to have been embezzled. As the plaintiff insists on not giving the period in which the sums are alleged to have been embezzled, the defendants have no case to meet. The defendants are therefore discharged .... The plaintiff shall bear his own costs and pay the costs of the defendants in the suit.

It is contended on behalf of defendant 4, who is the applicant before me, that this is an order dismissing the suit under O. 6, R. 5, Civil P. C., and that no appeal lies from such an order. Reliance is placed upon A I R 1932 Mad 316.[1] The learned counsel also relies on three other cases, (1893) 1 Q B 185,[2] 53 Mad 645[3] and 45 ALL 624.[4] So far as the last two cases are concerned, I do not think they touch the point at issue here. In 53 Mad 645[3] the defendant was ordered by the Court to furnish further and better particulars of a matter pleaded in his written statement and on his failure to comply with the order, the Court struck out his defence. The appellate Court held that the Court had jurisdiction to do that. The matter was entertained as an appeal and no question appears to have been raised as to whether an appeal lay or did not lie. In any case the order of the first Court was upheld and so the question in the result became immaterial. As regards 45 ALL 624,[4] I am not able to follow what is meant. The passage relied upon is to be found at page 627 and is in these terms :

> If the order is disobeyed, and the plaintiff is in default, he should have his action stayed; and if the defendant is in default, his defence should be struck out.

I am not clear what the learned Judges mean by saying that action should be stayed. The complaint in the case was about the action of the defendants and was that they had not furnished proper particulars.

The remarks quoted therefore were merely incidental and were not necessary for the decision of that case and as I say I am not able to understand exactly what was meant by saying that if the plaintiff is in default, he should have his action stayed. So far as the English case is concerned, the position there was that the plaintiff was ordered to furnish certain particulars. He omitted to do so and was given a further opportunity. When he still omitted to do so, an order was passed saying that unless the particulars were furnished within a week, his action would be dismissed with costs. The particulars were not furnished and so the action was dismissed with costs. The question before the appellate Court was whether the Court had jurisdiction to do this. The learned appellate Judges decided that the order of the Court could be upheld in one of two ways. The first is that a plaint or a statement of claim, as it is called in England, not disclosing proper particulars in effect discloses no cause of action against the defendants, and therefore the suit can be dismissed on the ground that it discloses no cause of action. The other ground on which the order could be supported was that under the rules of the Supreme Court a Court is given power when ordering further particulars to be furnished to impose conditions.

In the English case the condition imposed was that if the particulars were not furnished within ten days the action would be dismissed. No such condition is to be found in the orders of the Court in the present case. Consequently I am unable to construe the various orders which were made as imposing a term under O. 6, R. 5, to the effect that the suit would be dismissed if the particulars were not furnished. But even if that be the construction, the result is, according to A I R 1932 Mad 316,[1] that the suit is dismissed. If it is dismissed, then clearly in my opinion the dismissal amounts to a decree within the meaning of S. 2 (2), Civil P. C. There can be no doubt that that order conclusively determines the rights of the parties in the suit. No fresh suit can be brought on the same cause of action and the matter is consequently final so far as the Court making the order is concerned. That being so, an appeal will clearly lie. With the utmost respect I am unable to agree with the learned Madras Judges and respectfully dissent from their view. In my opinion, if the order bears the construction which, according to the Madras learned Judges, it should bear, then clearly an appeal lies.

The other way of dealing with this matter, and in my opinion the proper way, is to strike out that portion of the pleading which is defective. In this case it would appear to amount to a striking out the whole of the plaint so far as the material allegations are concerned. If that is done then clearly the plaint will disclose no cause of action and the dismissal of the suit will consequently be on that account, and that is what the appellate Court considers to have been the case here. But whatever it is, it is clear that the order of the first Court cannot be left in the inconclusive state which it would appear to bear on the face of it. The defendants cannot be discharged in this manner. Either the plaint will have to be rejected or the suit will have to be dismissed, and the order must be taken to mean one of these two things. Whichever of the two is taken, an appeal would in my opinion lie. Consequently, the appellate Court had jurisdiction to entertain the appeal. That being so, the order on the merits cannot be contested here in revision. The application is dismissed with costs. Counsel's fee Rs. 40.

In re Himloo Jaddu Gond—Accused.

Criminal Revn. No. 139 of 1941, Decided on 18th April 1941, by Sess. Judge, Hoshangabad, for revision of order of Magistrate, First Class, Betul.

Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 209 (1) — Whether committal should be made — Test indicated — Whether offence falls under S. 302 or S. 304, Penal Code — Question as a rule being difficult for Magistrate to decide should be left to Sessions Court — Whether committal would result in conviction under S. 302 held doubtful — Sentence imposed by Magistrate not inadequate —High Court held could not interfere in revision with Magistrate's order convicting accused under S. 304.

The test to be applied in deciding whether a committal ought or ought not to be made on the facts is that assuming the whole of the evidence against the accused to be true, is there a case which a Judge at a trial could leave to a jury: ('35) 22 A I R 1935 Nag 202 and 9 C W N 829, Rel. on. [P 225 C 2]

But a Magistrate ought not to take upon himself the responsibility of trying a case which taking a reasonable view of the effect of the depositions must be regarded as involving the trial of the accused for a grave offence or one in which complicated or difficult questions of law or fact arise. The question whether an offence falls under S. 302 or

S. 304, Penal Code, being as a rule a difficult question which a Magistrate is as a rule not qualified by training or experience to decide, should be left to the Sessions Court : ('32) 19 A I R 1932 Rang 193, Rel. on. [P 225 C 2]

In a quarrel between H and his step-father G, G first kicked H whereupon H picked up an iron rod and struck G 4 or 5 times. G died of his injuries. None of the 5 external injuries was serious and death was due to the fracture of three ribs which had penetrated his spleen. The spleen was not enlarged or in any way abnormal. The doctor who performed the post mortem examination was of opinion that the fracture of the ribs could not be caused by a blow from the iron rod but was due to indirect violence and might have been caused by a blow of the knee on the chest of the deceased. The Magistrate convicted H under S. 304 and sentenced him to three years' rigorous imprisonment :

Held that in the particular case it was doubtful if a committal to the Court of Session would result in a conviction under S. 302 nor was the sentence imposed, considering the youth of the accused so inadequate as to justify interference by the High Court in revision with the Magistrate's order convicting the accused under S. 304. [P 225 C 2]

W. C. Dutt—for the Crown.

Order. — The accused Himlu was prosecuted before Mr. Dwivedi, Magistrate, first class, and charged under S. 302, Penal Code. The learned Magistrate after hearing the evidence for the prosecution came to the conclusion that the offence committed was an offence under S. 304 and not under S. 302, Penal Code, and he framed a charge under S. 304 and eventually convicted Himlu under that section and sentenced him to three years' rigorous imprisonment. The learned Sessions Judge has reported the case under S. 438, Criminal P. C., and has recommended that the proceedings should be quashed and that the learned Magistrate should be directed to commit the accused for trial at Sessions. The evidence shows that there was a quarrel between Himlu and his step-father Garsu in which Garsu first kicked Himlu. Then Himlu picked up an iron rod and struck Garsu 4 or 5 times. Garsu died of his injuries. None of the 5 external injuries was serious and death was due to the fracture of three ribs which had penetrated his spleen. The spleen was not enlarged or in any way abnormal. The doctor who performed the post mortem examination was of opinion that the fracture of the ribs could not be caused by a blow from the iron rod but was due to indirect violence and might have been caused by a blow of the knee on the chest of the deceased.

The learned Magistrate held that the accused must be presumed to have known that he was likely to cause the death of his victim, but held that exception No. 4 to S. 300, Penal Code, applied and that the culpable homicide was not murder because it was committed without premeditation in a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel. The learned Magistrate, however, omitted to consider whether the accused had taken undue advantage or acted in a cruel or unusual manner. The question is whether in the words of S. 209 (1), Criminal P. C., there were not sufficient grounds for committing the accused person for trial. In 31 N L R 360[1] at page 362, Grille J. cited with approval the dictum of Harington J. in 9 C W N 829[2] :

The test which should be applied to decide whether a committal ought or ought not to be made on the facts is this—assuming that the whole of the evidence telling against the accused is true, is there a case which a judge at a trial could leave to a jury? If the evidence is such that a judge would have been bound to rule that there was no evidence on which a jury could convict, then a committal ought not to be made. If there is any evidence which calls for an answer, however great the preponderance in favour of the prisoner may be, then the committal is proper.

If the present case had been tried before a jury, I think the question whether the offence fell under S. 302, Penal Code, or S. 304, Penal Code, would certainly have been left to the jury. I agree with the remarks of Page C. J. in 10 Rang 495[3] at p. 497:

A Magistrate ought not to take upon himself the responsibility of trying a case which taking a reasonable view of the effect of the depositions must be regarded as involving the trial of the accused for a grave offence or one in which complicated or difficult questions of law or fact arise.

The question whether an offence falls under S. 302 or S. 304, Penal Code, is as a rule a difficult question which a Magistrate is as a rule not qualified by training or experience to decide, and it should therefore be left to the Sessions Court. In this particular case I doubt if a committal to the Court of Session would result in a conviction under S. 302 Penal Code, nor do I think that the sentence imposed, considering the youth of the accused, was so inadequate that I ought to interfere in revision. The reference is therefore not accepted.

Judgment. — This order governs Miscellaneous Appeals Nos. 294 of 1938, 293 of 1938, 292 of 1938 and Civil Revisions Nos. 864 of 1938, 50 of 1939, 580 of 1939 and 688 of 1939. These miscellaneous appeals and civil revisions all raise the same point which is one arising out of a notification purporting to be made under the powers conferred by the Debt Conciliation Act, whereby the Government purported to increase in certain districts the limit provided in S. 4 of the Act. A proviso to sub-s. (1) of that section prevents certain debtors, even debtors within the meaning of S. 2 (f), from making an application to the Debt Conciliation Board. In the original Act the proviso reads as follows :

Provided that no application shall be made if the debtor's debts exceed twenty-five thousand rupees or such larger amount as may be prescribed for each area.

Later, by Act 17 of 1937, the words "twenty-five thousand" were altered to "fifty thousand." In March 1938, that is to say, about a year after the change from twenty-five thousand to fifty thousand there was a notification in the Government Gazette to the effect that debtors within certain areas could put in applications if their debts did not exceed ten lakhs. As a consequence an entirely new class of debtors was introduced in certain districts into the scheme of this Act which hitherto had been regarded as an Act having for its purpose the conciliation of agriculturists' debts in cases where the debtor was not very heavily indebted. That notification is dated 4th March 1938. Thereupon, the two applications that we have now to consider were made. The two debtors in question are debtors whose debts exceed Rs. 50,000 but do not exceed ten lakhs. On 10th June 1938 Government issued another notification reducing the ambit again to Rs. 50,000, and on 7th July 1938 the Revenue Secretary to Government circulated to the appropriate Commissioners as follows :

Please request all Chairmen of Debt Conciliation Boards to reject all applications for conciliation of debts above Rs. 50,000 in which conciliation has not taken place.

Following upon that the Chairman of the Debt Conciliation Board at Jubbulpore, which is the Board in question here, passed an order as follows on one of the applications :

The applicants-debtors file an application, praying for time on the ground that a deputation has gone to the Provincial Government for revoking the order of the Provincial Government to cancel all applications of debts above Rs. 50,000. The creditors appearing are shown the application as well as the orders of Government conveyed by Revenue Department Memo. No. 3180-2915-XII dated 7th July 1938. The creditors are told that an adjournment can be granted provided that they are willing and not objecting to the application. The creditors raise an objection and urge that the application must be rejected in view of the clear orders conveyed in the memo against which no orders in supersession have yet been received.

As the creditors are not prepared to grant an adjournment, however, short it may be, we cannot act against the orders of the Government only on the mere application of the applicants-debtors disclosing an intention of representation.

We, therefore, in accordance with the aforesaid memorandum, (viz., No. 3180-2915-XII, dated 7th July from the Revenue Department) reject this application in which no conciliation has taken place.

For statistical purposes the rejection should be deemed under S. 7, Debt Conciliation Act.

In the other case the Board passed the following order :

. . . . . We cannot but act in accordance with the instructions conveyed in the memorandum concerned. The applicants' remedy lies before authority issuing it and not before the Board. Accordingly acting in accordance with the said memorandum, viz., Revenue Department Memorandum No. 3180-2915-XII, dated 7th July 1938 we reject this application in which the debts amount to more than Rs. 50,000 and no conciliation has taken place.

For statistical purposes the application should be shown rejected under S. 7, Debt Conciliation Act.

As a consequence of those two orders, the board treated the applications of the two debtors in question as disposed of, did not accordingly thereafter take any steps for conciliation, with the result that when in the year 1939 these Boards were in effect wound up the board treated these applications as finished with and therefore did not consider it necessary further to examine into them before finally ceasing the function. It is necessary to say a word about the termination of the Board's activities. In 1939 there was passed for the Central Provinces and Berar the Relief of Indebtedness Act of 1939. That Act gives very powerful rights to debtors and takes the place of the old conciliation proceedings and by S. 26 provides that all proceedings for the settlement of debts not exceeding Rs. 25,000 pending before (a Debt Conciliation Board) shall be transferred to (a Debt Relief Court).

It will be seen that there is a difference between the pecuniary limit of Rs. 25,000 there fixed and the Rs. 50,000 fixed in the proviso to S. 4 (1), as amended by Act, 17 of 1937, of the Debt Conciliation Act. That gap was provided for administratively by Government keeping on the Boards until they had finally disposed of all the Rupees 25,000 and over cases with the result that when the time came when they had disposed of all those they had in some districts a great number of Rs. 25,000 and under cases still pending. All those cases were transferred to the Debt Relief Courts and the Boards were dissolved with the result that at the present moment and for nearly a year now there is and has been no Board functioning. This is a matter which one has to bear in mind when considering what to do in this very unusual case. The problem is created by the fact that the Board received these applications, entertained them to the extent at any rate of taking them on their file. What further steps were taken we do not know. Whether it ever got as far as issuing form No. 3 or form No. 4, schedule to the Rules we do not know. What is at any rate clear is that a certificate was issued in form No. 2. That certificate says as follows : "This is to certify that an application has been made to this Board for the settlement of" then details are set out. That is signed by the Chairman, and the result of that certificate is to attract the provisions of S. 21 of the Act which says as follows :

When an application has been made to a Board under S. 4, any suit or other proceedings then pending before a civil Court in respect of any debt for the settlement of which application has been made shall be suspended until the Board has disposed of the application.

These various miscellaneous appeals and civil revisions are concerned either with proceedings in a civil Court before decree or with proceedings in a civil Court after decree against one or other of these two debtors brought by various creditors. These proceedings were, as a consequence of the issue of various certificates to the various Courts, stayed, and it is the argument of the appellant that they remain stayed because the Board has never disposed of the application. In point of fact, as we have seen above, the Board has purported to dispose of the application. It has rejected the application, and it has power to dismiss an application under S. 7 (1) which provides as follows:

On receipt of an application under S. 4, the Board shall pass an order fixing a date and place for hearing the application :

Provided that the Board may at any time dismiss the application if, for reasons to be stated in writing, it does not consider it desirable to attempt to effect a settlement between the debtor and his creditors.

It is said that here the Board was not purporting, when it rejected this application, to say "we dismiss this application because we have no jurisdiction." It had in fact, according to the argument, already accepted jurisdiction. That acceptance of jurisdiction had not been objected to and not having been objected to it became impossible either for the creditor later on to object or for this Court to consider the question: see section 7A. It is argued that what the Board did was to reject the application for a reason that is wholly irrational and entirely unsuited to the activities of a quasi-judicial tribunal which has to bring its mind to bear on the case before it and cannot act on the directions or orders of another. That is how, as we understand it, the argument is put. The Board having given reasons which are unreasonable, and which cannot support the order of rejection it is as though that order had never been made. If the order has, in the eye of the law, never been made the application has never been rejected. If the application has never been rejected it is still persisting. If it is still persisting the matter has not been disposed of under S. 21. If the matter has not been disposed of under S. 21, the certificate still has the effect of suspending proceedings in a civil Court and if the proceedings are still suspended in a civil Court these unfortunate creditors cannot now, and cannot hereafter either, litigate their suits on their debts or execute the decrees that they have obtained. That position must remain for ever unless it be possible to resuscitate these Boards and persuade the Board to dismiss the application again for a reason to be stated in writing but this time for a reason that is reasonable, or to conciliate. In resolving this problem which is by no means obvious it is necessary to mention several provisions of the Debt Conciliation Act. First of all, it will be noted that S. 4 proviso says "or such larger amount as may be prescribed for each area." If we turn to S. 2 (f) we shall find a lower limit fixed as follows :

> Whose debts exceed Rupees 150; or such lower amount, not being less than fifty rupees, as the Local Government may, by notification, prescribe for a particular area.

By S. 2 (g) we find that "prescribed" means "prescribed by rules made under this Act." There are a number of other provisions relating to prescribing in this Act, for example S. 5: "verified in the manner prescribed by the Civil Procedure Code, 1908." But we think that it is beyond any doubt that where we find, as in S. 4 proviso, the word "prescribed" used simpliciter in a context which makes it perfectly easy to do the prescribing by rules, "prescribed" must have its defined meaning of "prescribed by rules." This is made clearer by the fact that in S. 2 (f) "prescribed" means and was stated to mean by notification and in S. 5 "prescribed" means in the manner prescribed by the Civil Procedure Code. If we turn to S. 26 we find:

> (1) All rules for which provision is made in this Act shall be made by the Local Government and shall be consistent with this Act.
> (2) All rules shall be subject to the condition of previous publication.

In point of fact, as we have seen, there was no rule changing the limit from Rupees 50,000 to Rs. 10,00,000. What there was, was a notification. The difference is not trifling. Its substance consists in the fact that a rule is not a rule until there has been prior publication which opens to the public the opportunity to object, whereas a notification can be without any prior publication and no one has a chance to object before the notification becomes operative: see S. 22, C. P. General Clauses Act. Our conclusion on this branch of the case is that here there has been no lawful increase of the upper limit from Rs. 50,000. Therefore, the applications that were made in this case were applications forbidden by the proviso to S. 4; therefore had the Board, when it received the Revenue Secretary's letter said, "We find that these applications are misconceived ; the upper limit has never been extended and we have no jurisdiction as required by law. They are applications that should never have been made and although we have accepted them, we now, on our own motion, operating under the powers conferred by S. 19 of the Act review our order accepting these applications and dismiss them," that would have been an order that would have carried out the law in every particular and would have had the effect of disposing of these applications and terminating the effect of the certificates.

The Board could have said all those things had it known the true facts of the case. But instead of giving those good reasons, it accepted the orders of Government, and because of the orders of Government and for those reasons, so far as we can see, alone dismissed the applications. It has of course been urged that if you look at the whole of the order it is apparent that the creditors here were not going to conciliate. They had discovered a fundamental defect. They had got Government to take action and they were in such a strong position that it would have been quite idle to have gone on with these proceedings. Again, had the Board given that as its reason for dismissing the applications, nobody could have argued, we conceive, at any rate with any hope of success, that the Board had done anything irregular or ultra vires or improper. It is further argued on behalf of the appellants that S. 7 (1) proviso would not really allow the Board even to do that. It does not empower the Board to dismiss the applications for any such reasons as above indicated because, it is said, once the Board has admitted the applications as being within its jurisdiction that concludes the Board and it has then got to go on and "at any time" must therefore mean any time before it has accepted the application. We do not think that that is the proper construction to be put on this proviso especially bearing in mind the provisions of S. 19. It is also said that it is no ground to act under S. 7 that there is no prospect of an amicable settlement. The proper section to operate under is S. 14 which says:

If no amicable settlement is arrived at under sub-s. (1) of S. 12, the Board shall dismiss the application.

The result would be the same but it is said that the Board here has not purported to do that: it has purported to act under S. 7. It has done what it had done not because there was no hope of a settlement but because it was told to do so, and that is a mere nullity with the effect noted above. At one time there were a number of decisions come to by this High Court relating to the power of the civil Courts to interfere with the operations of this special body, and the general position taken up was that the Courts had power to regard as of no effect certificates made or orders passed by a Board if passed in the absence of jurisdiction and that a Board, for example, that issued a certificate on the application of an ironmonger effected nothing by the issue of such a certificate because an ironmonger is not a debtor within the meaning of the Act, and not being a debtor could not make an application under S. 4. That group of cases will be found in I L R (1938) Nag 489,[1] I L R (1937) Nag 530,[2] 19 N L J 16,[3] 20 N L J 203[4] and 21 N L J 17.[5] As a consequence an amending Act, 15 of 1936, was passed which incorporated S. 7A, and that section has been the subject of much debate before us now. It provides as follows :

(1) If, on receipt of an application under S. 4, the Board admits the application as being within its jurisdiction or, under sub-s. (1) of S. 7, dismisses it on the ground of want of jurisdiction, a debtor or his creditor may, within thirty days from the date of admission or of the order of dismissal, as the case may be, make an objection in writing to the Board against such admission or dismissal.

(2) On receipt of an objection under sub-s. (1), the board shall make such order thereon as it thinks fit and it shall be final.

(3) If no objection is made under sub-s. (1), or if an objection is made and decided under sub-s. (2), the jurisdiction of the board shall not be questioned in any civil Court.

It is said that it has no effect unless the board is operating on an application made under S. 4. Accordingly, if the application is made not under the powers conferred by S. 4 but in flat violation of the provisions of that section, it is not an application under S. 4, and if it is not an application under S. 4 then whether the board admits it or not a civil Court can still challenge the jurisdiction of the board to entertain it. We find it very difficult to give that construction to this section without making nonsense of S. 7A and reducing it to nothing at all so far as the civil Courts are concerned because of course if the application is in accordance with the provisions of S. 4 the board would have jurisdiction. It is said however in answer to that that the words, "as being within its jurisdiction" mean as being within its territorial jurisdiction and so you have got the position that granted the application is in accordance with S. 4 so that one can correctly speak of it as being an application under S. 4 then if the board admits the application as being within its territorial jurisdiction there is nothing for the civil Court to do by way of challenging that jurisdiction : the civil Court must assume that the board has jurisdiction; or, if the board has rejected it, that the civil Court must assume that the board had no jurisdiction and proceed accordingly. Bearing in mind the cases which we know led up to this modification we are not prepared to found this judgment on that construction although there is something to be said for a construction that gives value to the words "under S. 4," which one finds running right through this Act, and gives value to the words "as being within its jurisdiction."

But here we think that the matter can be properly and fairly disposed of on other grounds. One must bear in mind the fact that this Court has no power to issue a writ of mandamus (and, even if it had, that there is now no board to whom this Court can address an order). One must also remember that the board has in fact disposed of these applications by rejecting them and has therefore not recalled its certificate which certificate will, so far as we can see, live for ever unless, as is argued, it is deemed to have come to an end when the board came to an end or unless it came to an end when the board in fact disposed of the applications whether rightly or wrongly. Viewing the matter as a whole, we consider that we are justified in treating the board as having disposed of the applications in accordance with law if in all the circumstances the position is such that the board could and should have rejected these applications at the time when in fact it rejected them. We think that the true position can be stated as follows: Where the Court has the powers which the High Court has in England and which certain High Courts, but not this, have in India of issuing the various prerogative writs or analogous proceedings then the position cannot be better stated than by Farwell L. J., in (1910) 2 K B 165[6] at page 179:

> If the tribunal has exercised the discretion entrusted to it bona fide, not influenced by extraneous or irrelevant considerations, and not arbitrarily or illegally, the Courts cannot interfere; they are not a Court of appeal from the tribunal, but they have power to prevent the intentional usurpation or mistaken assumption of a jurisdiction beyond that given to the tribunal by law, and also the refusal of their true jurisdiction by the adoption of extraneous considerations in arriving at their conclusion or deciding a point other than that brought before them, in which cases the Courts have regarded them as declining jurisdiction. Such tribunal is not an autocrat free to act as it pleases, but is an inferior tribunal subject to the jurisdiction which the Court of King's Bench for centuries, and the High Court since the Judicature Acts, has exercised over such tribunals.

Where the power exists what happens is that the High Court sets the tribunal right and the matter proceeds along right lines to some proper conclusion. But if we said that this order of dismissal is wrong because it was made on extraneous considerations such as a memorandum issued from the Secretariat we should not be setting anything right at all. We cannot follow it up by directing the Board to dispose of these applications according to law. We have not that power if there were a Board, and there is not a Board. What we should be doing would be perpetuating an injustice by giving legal efficacy for ever to certificates which prevent litigants from suing according to ordinary law and pursuing their ordinary remedies in a civil Court. That is a thing which one would naturally hesitate to do.

There is a long line of cases which lay down two broad propositions. The one is that Acts which oust the jurisdiction of the Court or interfere with the common law rights of a subject are to be very strictly construed. See for example A I R 1930 Nag 205[7] and 9 Lah 504.[8] The other general line is that if a body is constituted by statute to exercise certain functions then a civil Court cannot either interfere with those functions or treat an act done by the body as a nullity unless the civil Court has got some special supervising power, for example by appeal, or unless the body has acted, while doing this act, outside its powers. If that be the case, then it is as though the act had been done by a mere man-in-the-street. He has got no power to do it, he has got no power to issue the certificate or give the decision or the order or the injunction or whatever it may be, and the law says: "You had no power to do this"; therefore we treat it as not done. See for example, the various cases where taxes were imposed and they were imposed in a way which was beyond the power of the body imposing them. They are imposed, they are collected, and then a civil Court has to consider a claim to get the money back and the question arises: Can a civil Court interfere seeing that a statutory body has imposed the tax and collected the tax? Despite the fact that the statute says that the civil Court in this case and that cannot interfere, in case after case the civil Court has discovered that it can interfere because the body doing all these things did them in a way which was outside its powers. See for example 26 N L R 217,[9] 18 N L R 121,[10] 8 N L R 107[11] and 30 N L R

121.[12] For example, if an Act gives to a public officer the power to determine certain questions and says to the Courts that the decisions of that officer shall be final still the Courts can question his decision if the criticism amounts to this, that the officer acted outside the powers conferred upon him by the statute because then the position is not that of the authorized officer deciding the point; it is as though a man-in-the-street had decided the point. Neither the man-in-the-street nor the officer had power to decide what the officer purported to decide and the Courts can challenge the one as well as the other. See for example, A I R 1930 Nag 205[7] and A I R 1931 Nag 48[13] a decision under the Co-operative Societies Act, 35 Cal 859[14] a case of assessment of municipal taxes which turns on the fact that the act done by the special body was outside its powers and so enabled the Court to challenge it although there were provisions in the Act excluding the Court's powers. Then there are such cases as the Coffee Housekeeper's case, 51 Mad 876.[15] There the person was accused of keeping a coffee-house without a license. He took up the position that he had in effect a license. His license, it was true, had been cancelled but it had been unlawfully cancelled and the question was: could the civil Court inquire into the lawfulness or unlawfulness of the cancellation of his license by a person who under an Act was empowered to cancel licenses? Again the Court said: "Did this person so authorized act within his powers? If he did, we cannot inquire into the matter. If he did not, we can." The learned Judges there came to the conclusion that the authorized person had acted beyond the scope of his power. He had not properly cancelled the license, therefore, the license was uncancelled, therefore, the man could not be convicted of carrying on a coffee-house without a license. That case distinguishes A I R 1925 Mad 476[16] where the question was: should a person be convicted of driving without a license? The accused said that he had really got a license. Of course he had applied for one and it had improperly been refused. There it was observed:

> I do not think that his order can be regarded as an absolute nullity as is argued and the case considered as one in which no order has been passed. It may be that the accused can claim damages against the President if he is able to establish that the President exercised his powers under S. 212 not bona fide but with malice on account of personal ill-feeling against him. That question will have to be considered when a proper case is brought; but in this prosecution the accused, in order to escape punishment, must show that he had a license given by the President of the District Board or he comes under cl. 11 of S. 212.

In I L R (1938) Mad 1040[17] the question was with regard to customs dues. Various authorities are given power to assess and settle customs dues and they had assessed and settled them here. The question then came, on a suit to recover them back, whether the civil Court could question the finality of those orders made. It was held that the civil Court could because, once again, it was a case where the authorities had exceeded their jurisdiction. But at page 1046 there is the following observation:

> . . . . adjudications by Customs Officers dealing with an offence committed under S. 182 have prima facie to be regarded as adjudications by a special tribunal and as such are not examinable by a civil Court except where they have acted without jurisdiction or in contravention of fundamental principles of judicial procedure.

Here it is said that this tribunal operated in contravention of fundamental principles of judicial procedure, that the Board never brought its mind to bear; it decided nothing, it merely followed orders and therefore, it made no decision but irrationally and wrongfully rejected an application and that part of its work was a mere nullity with the consequences already detailed. If this was a matter falling within a High Court's power to issue a prerogative writ it may well be that the proper course would be for us to refer the matter back with directions to this Board to dispose of these applications in accordance with law and in so doing it would be perfectly proper for us to point out what our conception of the law is. If we did that, that is to say, if we pointed out to the Board that this was a case in which no proper application had ever been made and that the applicants in question were not within the scope of the Debt Conciliation Act we have very little doubt that the result would be that the Board would dismiss the applications under its power of review given by S. 19 whereupon the certificates would terminate. That being the proper result, it also happens to be the result arrived at if we do not interfere at all but say, "Although the reasons given by the Board do not commend themselves to us, still the Board has jurisdiction to dismiss these applications and to dismiss them at any time." It has in point of fact dismissed those applications and that act is something more than a nullity because it has had the result of preventing the Board going on with this conciliation right up to the time of its dispersal and this Board has been dissolved by Government in the belief that the Board had disposed of all its pending cases which pending cases would have included these two.

It may be observed that on the other side a very considerable number of cases including in particular 48 Cal 138[18] and A I R 1926 Cal 1101[19] have been referred to in order to point out the distinction between an erroneous decision and a decision that is a nullity. It has been urged that although we may think very little of the reasons given by the Board in dismissing these applications still it had power to dismiss them and it has in fact dismissed them and that is not for this civil Court to say that not only in our opinion was the dismissal wrong but that it was absolutely null and void. If a body has jurisdiction to decide a case it has jurisdiction to decide it wrongly as well as rightly. The difficulty that we feel about that kind of argument, for which very many more cases have been cited before us, is that we apprehend that what the Board did here does not amount to a decision at all. It did not purport to act otherwise than under directions and we gravely doubt whether that is deciding a matter, it may possibly be that it has disposed of a matter. It has been pointed out that S. 22 does not demand that the Board shall decide anything. It only demands that the Board shall dispose of a thing. If the Chairman tore up a lot of applications and threw them in the fire he would be disposing of them and it would not be a mere nullity though it were an act of irrational temper; the result would be that the Board would not go on to conciliate and if the Board did not proceed as a result of the irrational act the civil Courts would still be stayed unless such irrational act were treated as terminating the effectiveness of the certificate.

Looking at the matter broadly, therefore, and bearing in mind the fact that the Board does not exist now and that the applications should, in point of law, have been dismissed at the time they were—though we think better reasons should have been given — and bearing in mind that to keep these certificates on foot perpetually would be to work a gross injustice and cause very severe loss to the creditors, we are of the opinion, though for other reasons, that the learned Judge was right in refusing to stay proceedings any further in each of these matters. The miscellaneous appeals and the civil revisions are accordingly dismissed with costs.

Municipal Committee, Akola — Defendant — Respondent.

Second Appeal No. 571 of 1939, Decided on 11th November 1940, from decree of Third Addl. Dist. Judge, Akola, D/- 6th November 1939.

(a) C. P. Municipalities Act (2 of 1922), Ss. 175 and 176—Rule-making power of Provincial Government is subject to limitations in Ss. 175 and 176 which do not confer on it any power to impose pecuniary burden for public purpose.

In framing the rules the Local Government cannot overlook the limitations contained in S. 175 (1) of the Act that they should be consistent with the Act. If the rules framed under the statute are in excess of or in contravention and inconsistent with the provisions of the statute, they must be regarded as ultra vires and ineffective. Neither S. 175 (1) nor S. 176 (1) confer on the Local Government expressly or by implication the power to impose pecuniary burden for any public purpose: ('34) 21 A I R 1934 Cal 537, Rel. on. [P 236 C 1]

(b) C. P. Municipalities Act (2 of 1922 as applied to Berar)—Rules 19, 20 and 21 made by Local Government for collection of cycle tax—Rules being in excess of Government's power and in contravention of Act are ultra vires and of no effect.

The sole object of compelling the payment of 0-4-0 for the metal disc for cycle registration is to prevent evasion by facilitating its detection. The saving of harassment to the cycle owner is subsidiary and consequential to the main object. It cannot be gainsaid that preventing evasion of the tax is a public purpose and the sum of 0-4-0 which is compulsorily recovered is so recovered for public purpose. The device, while it facilitates detection and checks evasion saves the Municipal Committee from the necessity of maintaining an expensive inspecting staff. The levy of 0-4-0 is therefore a tax. Hence, Rr. 20 and 21 of the rules framed by the Local Government are ultra vires and inoperative. So also R. 19, which is a direct contravention of S. 72 of the Act is equally ultra vires and of no effect: (1938) 4 All E L R 200; ('34) 21 A I R 1934 Cal 537 and (1922) 91 L J K B 897, Ref.

Judgment. — This is a plaintiff's appeal from the judgment of the third Additional District Judge, Akola, in Civil Appeal No. 1-A of 1939 delivered on 6th December 1939. The Municipal Committee, Akola, imposed a tax on bicycles in use within the limits of the Akola Municipality. The tax proper is fixed at Re. 1 per bicycle and the Committee recovers a sum of four annas in addition to it, expressly on account of the cost of a metal disc containing the registration number of the cycle which is to be affixed to the cycle at a prominent place in accordance with the rules framed by the Local Government under Ss. 71 and 76, Municipalities Act, 1922, as applied to Berar. The appellant owns three bicycles and he had to pay Rs. 3 as tax and annas 12 as cost of the three metal discs. The appellant's contention was that Rules 19 to 29 of the rules made by the Local Government were ultra vires being in excess of its powers and in contravention of the Municipalities Act. On this contention he claimed from the Municipal Committee a refund of 12 annas which have been recovered from him on account of the metal discs supplied to him. He also prayed for a decree of injunction permanently restraining the Municipal Committee from recovering four annas per bicycle as either cost of the metal disc or as fee for registration of the bicycle. The claim succeeded in the Court of first instance but failed in the lower appellate Court. The only point for determination which arises in this appeal is whether Rr. 19 to 29 of the rules made by the Local Government in exercise of the powers conferred upon them by Ss. 71 and 76, Municipalities Act, 1922, (C. P. Act, 2 of 1922) as applied to Berar and published under Notification No. 2047-5-M-VIII dated 21st March 1936, are ultra vires and of no effect. The rules purport to be rules for the assessment and the collection of the bicycle tax and they are as follows:

19. Every person owning, possessing or using a bicycle which is liable to be taxed shall be bound to inform the Secretary regarding the number and description of the bicycle kept and used by him within a week from the date he comes into possession.

20. On receipt of such information and the amount of tax and the cost of the metal disc referred to in Rule 21 the Committee shall register the bicycle.

21. The Committee shall keep a register of all bicycles numbered serially for each ward for each financial year and shall issue a metal disc bearing the registration number on payment of annas 4 per disc.

22. Every owner shall affix the disk to his bicycle in such a manner that it is easily visible to inspecting officers of the Committee, and shall maintain it in good condition.

Note: — In the event of the metal disc being, accidentally lost, destroyed, defaced or obliterated, the owner shall obtain a duplicate on payment of annas 4.

Note 2.—The person in whose name a bicycle is registered shall be deemed to be the owner of it for purposes of these rules.

23. Every bicycle shall be registered annually in the first fortnight of April.

24. If a bicycle is used and kept unregistered such possessor, user or owner shall be liable to pay double the tax specified in R. 1 (2) of the imposition rules for that year as a penalty for evading assessment.

25. The payment of penalty shall not bar a prosecution.

26. Notice of transfer of ownership of a bicycle during the currency of registration shall be given in writing to the Secretary by the transferee within one week from the date of transfer. On receipt of such notice the Secretary shall make the necessary alteration in the register, and if necessary, issue a fresh registration number.

27. No refund of registration fee shall be granted for any cause whatever.

28. The registration shall ordinarily be done in the first fortnight of April but no registration done on any subsequent date shall have effect beyond 31st March next following.

29. A breach of Rr. 2, 19, 22 or 26 shall be punishable with a fine which may extend to Rs. 50.

The appellant's contention is that the levy of four annas is in the nature of a tax. The appellant does not question the necessity of the rule to equip the cycle with a disc for the purpose of prevention and detection of the evasion in payment of the tax. His argument is that such an impost which is substantially a tax can be levied only in accordance with the procedure laid down in S. 67, Municipalities Act, and not by rules made by the Local Government under Ss. 71, 76 or 175 or 176 as the Provincial Government has no power to tax independently of the provisions of the Municipalities Act. The relevant sections are as follows:

71. The Local Government may make rules under this Act regulating the assessment of taxes and for preventing evasion of assessment.

76. The Local Government may make rules under this Act regulating the collection of taxes, and such rules may provide for the prevention of evasion of payment, for the payment of lump sums in composition, and for the fixing of fees payable for notices of demand.

175 (1). All rules for which provision is made in this Act shall be made by the Local Government and shall be consistent with this Act.

176 (1). In addition to any power specially conferred by this Act, the Local Government may make rules generally for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this Act.

The appellant does not deny the power of the Local Government to make any rules for assessment or collection of the bicycle tax intended to prevent evasion of the tax, but he contends that notwithstanding such power it is incompetent to recover any amounts even though they may be necessary for meeting the expenses of any device to prevent evasion of the tax and that under whatever name money is recovered it becomes in substance a tax. In order to determine whether to recover annas four amounts to a tax one must look to the definition of the word tax. Tax as ordinarily understood is a pecuniary burden imposed upon the subjects for the support of the Government. Aiyangar in his law of Municipal Corporations in British India at p. 269, Edn. 2, describes the nature of tax as follows :

Taxes are defined as being the enforced personal contribution of persons and property levied by the authority of the State for the support of the Government and for all public needs. Taxes are burdens or charges imposed by the Legislature, or under its authority, upon persons and property to raise money for public as distinct from private purposes or to accomplish some end or object public in its nature. A public use or purpose is of the essence of a tax.

Then he cites the following passage from an American case :

Taxes proper or general taxes proceed upon the theory that the existence of Government is a necessity; that it cannot continue without means to pay its expenses; that for those means it has the right to compel all citizens and property owners within its limits to contribute; and that for such contribution it renders no return of special benefit to any property, but only secures to the citizen that general benefit which results from protection to his person and property and the promotion of those various schemes which have for their object the welfare of all.

The Municipalities Act contains the definition of "tax" : see S. 3 (n). It says ""tax" includes any toll, rate, due, fee or other impost specified in S. 66." In AIR 1939 Nag 171[1] at p. 172 Grille J., interpreted that definition as comprising only those imposts by whatever name they may be called, specified in S. 66 and that the word "tax" would not include any toll, rate, due or fee of any kind whatever in addition to whatever kind of impost is mentioned in S. 66. This levy of four annas would be a tax if (1) it is recovered for the support of the Municipal Committee or for any public purpose, and (2) if it is of a nature which would bring it under S. 66, Municipalities Act. The relevant rules will have to be examined in the light of these two tests. They are as follows :

Rule 20. On receipt of such information and the amount of tax and the cost of the metal disc referred to in R. 21 the Committee shall register the bicycle.

Rule 21. The Committee shall keep a register of all bicycles numbered serially for each ward for each financial year and shall issue a metal disc bearing the registration number on payment of annas four per disc.

Rule 22. Every owner shall affix the disc to his bicycle in such a manner that it is easily visible to inspecting officers of the Committee and shall maintain it in good condition.

Note.—In the event of the metal disc being accidentally lost, destroyed, defaced or obliterated, the owner shall obtain a duplicate on payment of annas four.

Rule 27. No refund of registration fee shall be granted for any cause whatever.

On the true construction of these rules, it would appear that the metal disc which is to be affixed to the bicycle is intended to show that the bicycle tax has been paid and that the bicycle is registered. That is obviously meant to facilitate detection of non-payment of tax. The bicycle is such a species of vehicle that it is extremely difficult to prevent evasion of payment of the tax on it. It would, therefore, be not unreasonable to insist upon its bearing some symbol to indicate the payment of tax assessed on it. The question is: which party should bear the cost? This question is approached from two different view points. On behalf of the taxpayer, it is contended that the affixing of the disc is mainly, if not wholly, for the benefit of the Municipal Committee. Its object is to prevent evasion of the payment of the cycle-tax by facilitating detection of non-payment of the tax. Whether it is meant for one or the other purpose, it is a municipal and therefore a public purpose. On the other hand, the contention on behalf of the Municipal Committee is that the device is intended to save the taxpayer from the harassment which is apt to be caused by constant inspections.

1. ('39) 26 AIR 1939 Nag 171 : 181 I C 520 : 40 Cr L J 556, Amrutlal v. Municipal Committee, Amraoti.

Both points of view are plausible but it has to be seen which of the two purposes attributed to the disc is the primary and substantial, and which is subsidiary and consequential. If obviation of harassment to the taxpayer were the principal object, the affixing of the disc to the bicycle could well be left to the option of the taxpayer. He who does not mind being exposed to constant inspections may choose to use his bicycle devoid of the disc or he may always carry with him his registration number or the receipt evidencing the payment of the tax. Others may be disposed to pay 0-4-0 and get the disc from the Municipal Committee to rid themselves of the attentions of the inspectorial staff. Why have the rules not followed this obvious course? It is because the taxpayers would not care to pay 0-4-0 and get the disc from the Municipal Committee and the Municipal Committee would have to employ a special staff for detection of the evasion of the tax. In order to avoid this contingency, it was necessary to make the payment of 0-4-0 compulsory. In fact this payment coupled with the disc issued on such payment in no way prevents evasion, for the reason that a man who pays the tax of Re. 1 also pays 0-4-0 for the disc and registration of the cycle (see R. 20). The dishonest man who does not pay the tax escapes also the payment of the extra 0-4-0. It is, therefore, clear that the disc serves as evidence of payment not to prevent evasion. Its indirect effect may be to expose those who evade payment of the tax by making detection easy. The affixing of the disc on the bicycle narrows the field of inspection and facilitates detection of delinquents. The conclusion is, therefore, irresistible that the sole object of compelling the payment of 0-4-0 is to prevent evasion by facilitating its detection. The saving of harassment to the cycle owner is subsidiary and consequential to the main object. It cannot be gainsaid that preventing evasion of the tax is a public purpose. We thus arrive at the position that the sum of 0-4-0 which is compulsorily recovered is so recovered for a public purpose. The device, while it facilitates detection and checks evasion, saves the Municipal Committee from the necessity of maintaining an expensive inspecting staff. The levy of 0-4-0 is therefore a tax.

The appellant relies on 48 Cal 161,[2] 35 Bom 412,[3] A I R 1934 Cal 537,[4] A I R 1925 Nag 393[5] and A I R 1930 Nag 73.[6] Out of them the two cases which are helpful are (1938) 4 ALL E L R 200[7] and A I R 1934 Cal 537.[4] In the English case, under the provisions of a local Act the defendants were granted licenses for the erection of advertisements on houses, and in respect of each license the corporation asked for a fee. It was contended that they were entitled to do so because the Act provided that the licences might be granted under and subject to such terms and conditions as the corporation might deem proper. It was held that, upon the true construction of the Act, the terms and conditions could not include the payment of a fee in respect of the granting of the licence. That case follows the ruling in (1922) 91 L J K B 897.[8] In that case it was laid down that when statutory authority has been given to the Executive Government to make regulations controlling acts to be done by His Majesty's subjects, a minister cannot, without the express authority of Parliament demand money for exercising his power of control in a particular way, such money to be applied to some public purpose, to be determined by the Government. The charge amounted to levying of money for the use of the Crown without the authority of Parliament. The observations of Lord Buckmaster at p. 900 are significant. They are :

> The powers so given are no doubt extensive and very drastic, but they do not include the power of levying upon any man payment of money which the Food Controller must receive as part of a national fund and can only apply under proper sanction for national purposes.

Lord Wrenbury makes it clear that the power to make regulations could not authorise the Executive to demand and receive money as the price of exercising its power of control in a particular way, such money to be applied to some public purpose to be determined by the Executive. The Noble Lord interpreted such a demand as the assertion of a right in the executive to impose taxation. In framing the rules the local Government cannot overlook the limitation contained in S. 175 (1), Municipalities Act, that they should be consistent with the Act. If the rules framed under the statute are in excess of or in contravention and inconsistent with the provisions of the statute, they must be regarded as ultra vires and ineffective: see A I R 1934 Cal 537.[4] That proposition is so clear that no authority is in fact necessary to confirm it. It appears to me that neither S. 175 (1) nor S. 176 (1) confer on the local Government expressly or by implication the power to impose pecuniary burdens for any public purpose. My attention is invited to the rules for the grant of copies of municipal records, maps etc., made under S. 176 (1), Municipalities Act, (p. 310, C. P. Municipal Manual, 1935) and it is contended that the power to levy fees or charges for work done or something supplied must be deemed to be implicit in the power of framing rules under S. 176, if not under S. 175, C. P. Municipalities Act. I cannot accede to the contention for the obvious reason that the recovery of copying fees is not for a public purpose and there is no compulsion as in the case of the person paying the cycle-tax. There is no obligation imposed by the rules on any person to apply for copies as there is in the case of a cycle owner who pays the tax. Nor is the supplying of copies for a public purpose as is the supplying of metal disc (which is to facilitate detection and to prevent evasion of the tax). The copying fees therefore do not bear any valid analogy. On the other hand, the provisions of the Motor Vehicles Act (Act 4 of 1939) supplies an analogy which lends assurance to the view I have taken. Section 21 of that Act gives power to the Provincial Government to make rules for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of that Act and states that such rules may provide for :

(c) the issue of duplicate licenses to replace licenses (licenses to drive a motor vehicle)..... or the fees to be charged therefor.

It is in pursuance of this special power that Central Provinces and Berar Motor Vehicles Rules 1940 provide for a fee of Rs. 5 for a duplicate license (R. 11-D). There is no such authority conferred by R. 76, Municipalities Act. On the other hand, the specific grant of power of fixing the fees payable for notices of demand in the same section tends to negative the power to levy any fees necessary for any step in the prevention of evasion of payment of any tax. Moreover, R. 27 of the rules under consideration refers to the levy of 4 annas as a registration fee. Section 66, C. P. Municipalities Act, includes fees on the registration of cattle (cl. 9). In view of the definition contained in S. 3 (n) of that Act, the registration fee is a tax. It is clear that the Act regards registration fees as a tax. If so, would it make any difference if the fee is for the registration of a bicycle instead of cattle? In my opinion there is no difference in principle. The registration fee levied in either case goes with the municipal fund (S. 61, C. P. Municipalities Act). It is true that in the present instance the taxpayer gets something in return viz., the metal disc, but that would not make the levy any the less a tax. In case of conservancy tax or market dues, the Municipal Committee also renders appropriate services in return; nevertheless they fall within the ambit of the definition of the tax : S. 3 (n). In conclusion, I agree with the appellant that the charge of 4 annas levied along with the recovery of the cycle tax and in addition to it is a tax and that Rr. 20 and 21 of the rules framed by the Local Government is ultra vires and inoperative. This does not however preclude any taxpayer from paying it in return for the disc if he is willing to do so. It only means that the Municipal Committee cannot compel the taxpayer to make the payment as a condition precedent to the registration of the cycle in respect of which the tax of Re. 1 had been paid. The Municipal Committee is bound to register the cycle on payment of the tax of Re. 1. On the view I have taken above, the other rules in so far as they have bearing on the rule enforcing payment of 4 annas in addition to the tax of Re. 1 will be deemed to be ultra vires and of no effect. As to R. 19, I agree with the appellant that it is a direct contravention of S. 72, C. P. Municipalities Act. It must therefore be pronounced to be equally ultra vires and of no effect. The result is that the appeal succeeds and the decree of the original Court is restored with costs in all the Courts.

 Court-fees Act (1870), Sch. 1, Arts. 4 and 5 —Application for review to pay lower court-fee must be made simply within 90 days mentioned in Act and time of vacation or time for obtaining copy of judgment cannot be excluded in computing this period though in proper case Court has discretion to extend time — Provisions of Limitation Act do not affect this result.

There is a distinction between the limitation allowed for the filing of an application for review of judgment for the purposes of the Limitation Act and of the time within which the application must be presented to obtain a lower court-fee prescribed by the Court-fees Act. [P 237 C 2]

The two Acts are not in pari materia; and in computing the period of 90 days from the date of the decree, within which an application for review of judgment may be presented on payment of half the fee leviable on plaint or memorandum of appeal the time during which the Court is closed for vacation or time for obtaining copy cannot be excluded though where the delay is not caused due to applicant's laches the Court has power to give certificate directing a refund. Order. — This is a reference made by the Taxing Judge and raises the following questions :

(1) Has Miscellaneous Civil Case No. 69 of 1940 been correctly decided by the Taxing Judge who has excluded copying time from the 90 days prescribed by Art. 4 to Sch. 1, Court-fees Act?

(2) Has not 31 N L R 260[1] been correctly decided in that it does not exclude the period of the vacation or any part thereof from the 90 days allowed by Art. 4 to Sch. 1, Court-fees Act?

The point is whether when considering the obligation of an applicant for a review to pay court-fees, an obligation that depends to some extent on the time at which the application is made, one calculates that time according to rules applicable to times laid down in the Limitation Act or whether one takes the 90 days mentioned in the Court-fees Act as simply 90 days. The Court-fees Act provides, inter alia, as follows (Sch. 1, Article 4) :

Application for review of judgment, if presented on or after the ninetieth day from the date of the decree.	The fee leviable on the plaint or memorandum of appeal.

Article 5 is as follows :

Application for review of judgment, if presented before the ninetieth day from the date of the decree.	One-half of the fee leviable on the plaint or memorandum of appeal.

Section 14, Court-fees Act, provides :

Where an application for a review of judgment is presented on or after the ninetieth day from the date of the decree, the Court unless the delay was caused by the applicant's laches, may, in its discretion, grant him a certificate authorizing him to receive back from the Collector so much of the fee paid on the application as exceeds the fee which would have been payable had it been presented before such day.

The present question is : Are Sundays, holidays or other days during which the Court is closed, or time for copying excluded in computing the 90 days as they would be if we were considering not a time prescribed by the Court-fees Act in which a particular reduced fee may be received but were calculating the time in which the application for review might be made. Were one calculating the time in which an application for review of judgment could be made one would consider Ss. 4 and 12, Limitation Act, and then one would be enabled to extend the time in a variety of ways by applying the various provisions of the Limitation Act. In 9 Mad 134[2] it was decided that in computing the period of eighty-nine days from the date of decree, within which an application for review of judgment may be presented on payment of half the fee leviable on the plaint or memorandum of appeal the time during which the Court is closed for vacation cannot be excluded.

It was pointed out there that the Court-fees Act and the Limitation Act are not in pari materia. The learned Judge at p. 135 observes :

It is true that the old Code generally dealt indiscriminately with matters of stamp, matters of limitation and matters of procedure, but the inconvenience of this soon became apparent and they have long since been separated and are governed by distinct Acts, each of which contains its own rules and principles. In this very point of delay, for example, the Limitation Act has its S. 5 containing a proviso that an application for review may be admitted freely after the period of limitation if the applicant can show sufficient cause for the delay. The Court-fees Act, on the other hand, has its S. 14, the provisions of which are not quite similar though evidently aimed at the same class of cases and it seems to me that in regard to stamp questions that alone can be looked to.

9 Mad 134[2] was followed in 7 C P L R 111.[3] It was again followed in 31 N L R 260[1] where the question of the applicability of S. 10, General Clauses Act, was also considered together with two other cases, 9 C L R 479[4] and 15 C L J 505.[5] We would prefer to exclude S. 10, General Clauses Act, on the ground that in terms that section applies only to Acts made after the commencement of the General Clauses Act, that is to say, 1897, and by S. 10 (2) "to all Acts of the Governor-General in Council and Regulations made on or after the fourteenth day of January 1887." We do not understand that as making it apply to Acts passed before 14th January 1887. The Court-fees Act was passed in 1870. In our opinion, therefore, the answers to the questions put are as follows : (1) No. (2) Yes. It should be observed that there is a power to give a certificate directing a refund in a proper case, that is to say, where the delay is not caused by the applicant's laches. The power even so is discretionary. It might well be granted, in our opinion, if the applicant was out of time because of difficulties created owing to the Courts being closed. Any application for a refund should be made to the proper Court. This Court is concerned with the answer to the two questions. There is an inconvenience here owing to the war. The learned Judge whose judgment is under review is Pollock J. He, at the present moment, is not in India but is expected back shortly. We do not think it desirable to delay matters until his return in order to give the applicant time within which to pay the increased court-fee. We order therefore that if he pay the increased court-fee within one week it should be accepted.

Order. — This revision application raises an interesting point of law which appears to be res integra in this country. The question is whether, where a debtor has died before he has been adjudged insolvent and an order of adjudication is subsequently passed against him, his legal representatives can enter into a composition with his creditors in accordance with S. 38, Provincial Insolvency Act. Section 17 of the Act provides:

> If a debtor by or against whom an insolvency petition has been presented dies, the proceedings in the matter shall, unless the Court otherwise orders, be continued so far as may be necessary for the realization and distribution of the property of the debtor.

It is contended on behalf of the applicant, who objects to the scheme which the Courts below have approved of, that a composition with creditors is not necessary for the realization and distribution of the property of the debtor and that s. 17 therefore does not apply to any such scheme. It is also contended that under S. 38 only the debtor can submit a proposal for a composition with his creditors and that the legal representatives of the debtor are not included. In 51 Mad 344[1] it was held that under S. 17, Provincial Insolvency Act, an application by a debtor for adjudication made while he was alive could be continued after his death, when he could be adjudged insolvent. Although that is not the point in the case before me, there is some reasoning of the learned Judges who decided that case which is of assistance in determining the question which I have to decide. The learned Judges have pointed out the change which has taken place in the wording of S. 17, whereby the words "as if he were alive" have been omitted and the words "so far as may be necessary for the realization and distribution of the property of the debtor" included in S. 17, and they point out that the petition having been presented, the words "proceedings in the matter" include subsequent steps in connexion with it, and they say at page 346:

> We think that the alteration of the language in S. 17 is only intended to show clearly the nature of the proceedings, that is, that the proceedings are only for the realization and distribution of the property.

In 51 Mad 495[2] the same question arose for decision before another Bench of the Madras High Court, which explained the necessity for the change in the wording of S. 17. It was pointed out that > in order to obviate any difficulty that might arise in continuing the proceedings by reason of these provisions (Ss. 37 and 43) the words above mentioned were enacted. All that is necessary after the insolvent's death is to see that the assets of the insolvent are realized and distributed among the creditors.

There is, therefore, no material alteration in the wording of S. 17 as far as this case is concerned. The corresponding section of the English Bankruptcy Act is framed in the same language that was used in S. 17, Provincial Insolvency Act, before the change above referred to, that is to say, the provision there is that the proceedings are to continue as though the debtor was alive. In (1886) 54 L T (NS) 682[3] it was held that if on the death of a bankrupt two days after filing his petition the debtor's representatives make arrangements with the creditors, the Court will use the discretion given to it by S. 108; that means that the Court can entertain and sanction a composition with the creditors come to by the representatives of the deceased bankrupt; and as I have already held that the wording of S. 17, Provincial Insolvency Act, makes no material difference, it follows that under the Provincial Insolvency Act also the representatives of a deceased insolvent can make a composition with the creditors.

On behalf of the applicant Mr. Mudholkar has referred to me a decision in A I R 1933 Lah 997,[4] where it was held that on the death of an insolvent there is an automatic discharge of the insolvent. From this he seeks to argue that there can be no scope for a composition with the creditors. That case was, however, one in which the property had been already distributed prior to the death of the insolvent, and the Court consequently held that the proceedings must automatically be held to have terminated. That follows from S. 17 itself, which allows the proceedings to continue only as far as may be necessary for the realization and distribution of the property of the debtor. The property of the debtor having been once distributed, there is no scope for the continuation of the proceedings after the death of the insolvent. Another Judge of the Lahore High Court in A I R 1935 Lah 935[5] on the question of discharge took a different view from the learned Judge in A I R 1933 Lah 997[4] and held that the minor sons of the debtor who had been declared insolvent after his death could ask the Court for a discharge, that is to say that there was no automatic discharge of the insolvent by reason of his death. On behalf of the non-applicants I have been invited to accept the reasoning in this case as analogous for the purpose of holding that the representatives of the deceased insolvent could make a composition with the creditors. I do not think it is necessary to consider the question whether a discharge is automatic or not, since it appears to me that S. 17 contains all the necessary provisions for supporting the order of the lower Courts in this case. Composition with creditors is one of the proceedings for the realization and distribution of the property of the debtor, and if the proposed composition is not a fair one to all concerned, the Court has ample power to refuse sanction to such composition. If it is a fair one, as it has been held to be by one of the two Courts in the case before me, it is in my view certainly necessary or at least desirable for the realization and distribution of the property of the debtor. There is, therefore, no reason to interfere with the order of the lower Court remanding the case. The application is dismissed. As, however, the point is not without difficulty and is as I have said, res integra, I make no order for costs.

VIVIAN BOSE J.

Khairullah Khan and Agajan Khan firm—Decree-holder—Applicant

v.

Mirajankhan Khudaidadkhan — Judgment-creditor—Non-applicant.

Civil Revn. No. 833 of 1939, Decided on 25th October 1940, from order of Court of 3rd Sub-Judge, 2nd Class, Nagpur, D/- 8th November 1939.

*Civil P. C (1908 as amended in 1937), Ss. 60 and 73—S. 60 does not affect S. 73—S. 60 proviso protects certain judgment-debtors and does not give one decree-holder priority over other—A obtaining decree against B in 1936 and attaching Rs. 60 out of his salary of Rs. 130 — C obtaining decree against B in 1938 and applying under S. 73—C held entitled to rateable distribution out of Rs. 60.

Section 60 as amended in 1937 does not affect the provisions of S. 73. The proviso to S. 60 is designed to protect certain judgment-debtors and not to give one decree-holder priority over another. Moreover, in cases falling under S. 60 (1) (c) the provisions of the Proviso can be waived by the judgment-debtor. Consequently, where A obtains a decree against B in 1936 and attaches Rs. 60 out of his salary of Rs. 130 and C also obtains a decree against B in 1938 and applies under S. 73, C is entitled to reteable distribution out of Rs. 60. It cannot be said that because under S. 60 as amended in 1937, Rupees 115 out of Rs. 130 would be exempt from attachment, C can claim rateable distribution of Rs. 15 only out of Rs. 60 attached by A, because it does not matter how the assets reach the Court's hands. Once they get there, they must be rateably distributed : ('19) 6 A I R 1919 Mad 647; ('21) 8 A I R 1921 Cal 749 and ('38) 25 A I R 1938 Sind 144, Rel. on; 36 Bom 156, Not approved; 40 Cal 619, Disting. [P 240 C 2; P 241 C 1]

M. Samiullakhan—for Applicant.

R. F. Rustomjee — for Non-applicant.

Order. — The question here is about the power of the Court to order rateable distribution. The applicant firm obtained two simple money decrees against one Deoranjan, a Government servant, in 1936. His salary was Rs. 130 a month. Under proviso 1 (i) to S. 60, Civil P. C., one-half of this salary was exempt from attachment and it appears that Rs. 60 a month was actually attached each month. The non-applicant obtained his decree against the same judgment-debtor in 1938 and asked for rateable distribution in the Rs. 60 which the applicant was receiving. In between these two dates, the Code of Civil Procedure (second amendment) Act of 1937 was passed. That Act states that the first Rs. 100 of the salary of any public officer plus one-half the remainder shall be exempt from attachment. This means that under this Act only Rs. 15 of the judgment-debtor's salary could be attached. It is admitted that this Act does not affect the applicant's rights under his decree and that he can continue to attach at the rate of Rs. 60 a month until satisfaction. But it is argued that the Act does fasten on the non-applicant's decree and that therefore he cannot attach more than Rupees 15 a month and consequently cannot ask for rateable distribution in any sum exceeding Rs. 15. The argument for the non-applicant is that S. 73, Civil P. C., has nothing to do with S. 60. Section 60 is concerned with attachment and sale. The non-applicant says that he does not want to attach anything and so is not concerned with S. 60. What he asks is that the assets which the Court finds in its hands through the execution of another decree be rateably distributed. The Rs. 60 are in the Court's hands. They are assets received in execution of a decree and the non-applicant holds a decree against the same judgment-debtor. Therefore, every ingredient of S. 73 is satisfied. Consequently, the non-applicant contends that effect must be given to its terms.

There is not much authority on this point. The only case directly in point is A I R 1938 Sind 144[1] where a single Judge held in circumstances similar to the present that S. 60 does not control S. 73. This principle finds support in A I R 1921 Cal 749,[2] 40 Cal 619[3] and 41 Mad 616.[4] They also point out that the new Code enlarges the scope of S. 295 of the old Code (present S. 73) and that now it does not matter how the assets reach the Court's hands. Once they get there they must be rateably distributed. The only decision to the contrary is 36 Bom 156.[5] It is not precisely in point in that it does not refer to a matter falling under S. 60 but the ratio decidendi applies, and if that decision is followed then the applicant's contention must prevail. The point is a difficult one and the reasons for and against appear to be almost equally balanced. On the whole I prefer the view taken in 41 Mad 616[4] to the one taken in the Bombay case. I think the change which S. 73 effects is significant in that, to quote Seshagiri Ayyar J., > the intention of the Legislature is to afford every creditor equal opportunities of obtaining a rateable advantage in the available assets of the judgment-debtor. Therefore, unless there is something clear in the language of the provisions of the Code to exempt a payment from being applied to the benefit of all the creditors, Courts should incline to the view that monies in the hands of the Court should be shared by all decree-holders rateably.

The proviso to S. 60 is after all designed to protect certain judgment-debtors and not to give one decree-holder priority over another. It has been held in cases falling under S. 60 (1) (c) that the provisions of the proviso can be waived by the judgment-debtor. In the circumstances, seeing that rateable distribution does not in any way affect the judgment-debtor, I prefer the Sind, Calcutta and Madras views. 40 Cal 619[3] appears at first sight to be against this view but I think that case is distinguishable. It was distinguished in the later Calcutta case cited above. The sale proceeds of an execution were deposited in Court there and the usual application was made for rateable distribution. Later the sale was set aside and the learned Judges held that after the setting aside of the sale the proceeds were no longer available for distribution. I think it is possible to regard the deposit in such a case as conditional, the condition being confirmation of the sale. If the sale is not confirmed, the money has to be returned under the Code and S. 73 does not in my opinion control those provisions any more than S. 60 controls S. 73 in the view I take. The lower Court has I think decided the case aright. The application is dismissed with costs. Counsel's fee Rs. 15.

V. B. Kolte and another—Opposite Party.

Misc. Criminal Case No. 55 of 1940, Decided on 2nd June 1941, Reference made by Magistrate, First Class, Nagpur, D/- 24th August 1940.

Contempt—Contempt of Court—Interference with administration of justice — Court should not be too sensitive where no harm is caused or intended to be caused — Non-party to proceedings sending notice to one of parties demanding damages and apology for reference made about him in written statement held did not commit contempt.

Interference with the administration of justice is one of the well-recognized heads of contempt. What has to be seen is whether the person sought to be proceeded for contempt did interfere or did intend to interfere with the administration of justice. Courts, no doubt, have to be jealous to guard against any interference with their functions, but, on the other hand, they should not be too sensitive where no harm has been caused or was intended to be caused. [P 241 C 2; P 242 C 1; P 243 C 1]

Where a person who was non-party to certain criminal proceedings sent a notice to the accused demanding damages and apology for the latter having made references about him in the written statement :

J. Sen, R. K. Rao, M. Adhikari and N. T. Mangalmurti — for Non-Applicant 2.

Order. — These proceedings have been submitted by Mr. B. P. Pathak, Magistrate, first class, Nagpur, for action to be taken under the Contempt of Courts Act against the non-applicants, Mr. V. B. Kolte, Assistant Professor, King Edward College, Amraoti, and his counsel, Dr. P. S. Deshmukh, Advocate, Amraoti. A case under S. 7, Copyright Act, was pending in that Magistrate's Court. The complainant was one B. S. Pandit, and the accused was N. K. Behere who moved the Magistrate to take the present proceedings. In the course of his written statement he had stated that this non-applicant (Professor Kolte) and one other gentleman had an interest in the book in question, and in that connexion he made certain allegations about the nature of the interest, which were considered by them to be insulting and defamatory. Accordingly Dr. Deshmukh acting on behalf of his client sent to Mr. Behere a notice, which it is said amounts to contempt of Court. In that notice after reproducing the offending part of the statement it is set out that the statement is thoroughly irrelevant for the purpose of a decision of the case, was made deliberately and maliciously with the intention of harming and knowing that it would harm the reputation of Professor Kolte, etc. Behere was therefore called on by it to make amends within four days by paying a sum of Rs. 2500 damages and publishing a public and unconditional apology in three newspapers. The notice concludes : "If you fail my client would be forced to take such civil and criminal action as he may be advised."

On being asked to show cause, the non-applicants contend that their action did not amount to contempt of Court as they were justified in protecting Mr. Kolte's interests and they had no intention of obstructing the pending proceedings. Dr. Deshmukh in his written statement has also tendered an unconditional apology in the event of the Court finding that in fact he has been guilty of contempt. The learned Magistrate in his order of reference relies on two cases, A I R 1940 Nag 110=I L R (1940) Nag 69[1] and 57 ALL 573.[2] It is not possible to give a comprehensive definition of what amounts to contempt of Court, but as the learned Judges state in 57 ALL 573[2] interference with the administration of justice is one of the well-recognized heads of

7 N L R 190,[1] 25 N L R 52,[3] 39 Cal 704[5] and 1940 N L J 96[9] relate to the setting aside of documents and not to the setting aside of a decree or award. They can therefore be easily distinguished. 16 N L R 84,[2] 38 Mad 922[4] and I L R (1939) Nag 373[8] relate to decrees. A I R 1930 Nag 73[6] is a case where an adoption was sought to be set aside. The only case of all those mentioned above, in which an award was sought to be set aside, and in which it was held that ad valorem court-fee was necessary is A I R 1932 Oudh 224.[7] Accordingly if the learned Additional District Judge is correct in saying that under Rule 33 of the Co-operative Societies Rules the award of the Registrar is a decree, then he is right to hold on the authority in 16 N L R 84[2] and 38 Mad 922[4] that ad valorem court-fee is necessary, but Rule 33 does not say that an award by the Registrar is a decree. What the rule says is that > any award, decision or order mentioned in R. 32 shall, on application to such Court (civil Court), be enforced in the same manner as a decree of such Court.

The rule therefore recognises that the award, decision or order is not a decree. That being so, those cases, which hold that a suit for a declaration that a decree is not binding must be stamped ad valorem are also distinguishable. Therefore the only case of those mentioned above which has to be considered by reason of its reference to the setting aside of an award is A I R 1932 Oudh 224.[7] To that may be added A I R 1924 Mad 489[10] and A I R 1927 Cal 45.[11] All these are cases under the Land Acquisition Act in which the land acquisition officer awarded compensation and on an appeal against the amount of compensation awarded it was held that the decision of the lower Court was a decree and therefore ad valorem court-fee was payable; but under the Land Acquisition Act, S. 26 (2) every award under Part 3 of the Act, under which the award which was being contested in that case had been made, is deemed to be a decree. There is a vast difference between an award being deemed to be a decree and an award being executable as a decree. Therefore those cases also are no authority for any case other than under the Land Acquisition Act. Accordingly there being apparently no direct authority, I must examine the question with reference to the actual provisions of the Court-fees Act and the general principles of law. As to the general principles to be observed they have been mentioned by Kinkhede A. J. C. in A I R 1930 Nag 73[6] at p. 76 where he has observed that > it is a rule of construction peculiar to fiscal enactments that they must be very strictly construed so as not to impose an unnecessarily heavy burden on the subject. Such an act being a taxing statute must use very clear and unambiguous language, quoting certain observations of learned Judges in (1869) L R 4 H L 100[12] at p. 122 and (1902) 1 K B 388.[13] The learned Additional Judicial Commissioner has also referred to another principle in the interpretation of statutes, namely that a Court cannot alter the law or read into the statute words which it thinks should have been there. In I L R (1939) Nag 373[8] at p. 375 this Court interpreted apparently with approval the view of the Full Bench of the Madras High Court which in 38 Mad 922[4] amounted to this that > it does not matter how you frame your prayer. What matters is what must be done in order, if that prayer be granted, to make the granting of it effective.

In the case before me, no doubt the plaintiffs have asked for a declaration, but reading their plaint as a whole, it is clear that what they really want is that the award of the Registrar should be set aside. There is a specific provision in the Court-fees Act for the setting aside of awards, viz., Art. 17 (iv) of Sch. 2. For this a fixed fee of Rs. 15 is laid down in this province. It has been said that the award referred to there is an award by arbitrators and not the decision of the Registrar of Co-operative Societies, but an award is not defined in the Court-fees Act and I see no reason to limit the interpretation of the term to an award by arbitrators. The dictionary meaning of an award is a "judicial decision." Certain kinds of awards have been termed "decrees" by the Civil Procedure Code, therefore, it would appear to me that any judicial decision which is not a decree might be considered to be an award for the purposes of Art. 17 (iv), Court-fees Act.

In 35 Cal 202[14] their Lordships of the Privy Council held that a suit brought by a plaintiff, whose objection to the attachment of property in execution proceedings had been dismissed, to establish her title to the property by a declaration and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from executing his decree fell under Art. 17 (i), Court-fees Act, and therefore the fixed fee referred to in that article was payable on the plaint. Their Lordships, therefore, although 4 Bom 515[15] does not appear to have been brought to their notice, in effect confirmed the correctness of the Full Bench decision of the Bombay High Court, which was to the same effect. The ratio decidendi is very clearly set out in 4 Bom 515[15] and although it was a case under Art. 17 (i), the reasoning applies with full force to Art. 17 (iv). In that case the plaintiff prayed for a decree declaring the plaintiff's right to sell certain property covered by a mortgage which was then being executed and to recover his money by virtue of the said right. He paid the fixed fee ordained by Article 17 (i). The High Court observed that such a suit might fall either under S. 7 (iv) (c) or under Article 17 (i) of Sch. 2 and, therefore, it was their duty, inasmuch as the Court-fees Act is a fiscal enactment, to adopt that which generally would press least heavily on the subject and that was Art. 17 (i). The same can be said here because the case before me can fall under S. 7 (iv) (c) or under Art. 17 (iv) of Sch. 2 and that being so it behoves me to adopt that which presses least heavily on the plaintiffs, viz., Art. 17 (iv). A suit to which Art. 17 (v) applies could also be said to be a suit for a declaration that an adoption is invalid and for the consequential relief of having it set aside, but nevertheless a fixed fee has been provided for such a suit. In this connexion my attention has been drawn to A I R 1930 Nag 73[6] from which I have quoted above, as being a suit to set aside an adoption in which ad valorem court-fee was required to be paid, but the decision in A I R 1930 Nag 73[6] turned not upon Art. 17 (v) but on the notification under S. 9, Suits Valuation Act. It was because of that notification that ad valorem court-fee was held to be payable. Otherwise I have no doubt that a fixed fee under Art. 17 (v) would have been payable.

For the above reasons I hold that this suit falls under Art. 17 (iv) of Sch. 2 to the Court-fees Act and that the fee which has been paid is sufficient. The order of the lower Court requiring the applicants to pay ad valorem court-fee is set aside and the case will proceed on the court-fee already paid. Costs of this application will be costs in the suit. I allow Rs. 75 as counsel's fee.

NIYOGI AND GRUER JJ.

Gulab Nathuram — Defendant — Appellant

v.

Bindraban Sheocharan — Plaintiff — Respondent.

Second Appeal No. 393 of 1938, Decided on 7th April 1941, from appellate decree of Extra Additional District Judge, Saugor, D/- 24th February 1938.

C. P. Land Revenue Act (2 of 1917), Ss. 122, 123, 187 and 157 (3) — Cosharer defaulting in paying land revenue — Lambardar or sadar lambardar paying revenue on behalf of defaulting cosharer acquires charge on defaulting cosharer's share—He can charge interest in such case on equitable principles.

A lambardar or sadar lambardar who pays arrears of land revenue on behalf of his defaulting cosharer acquires a charge on the share of the defaulting cosharer or patti lambardar inasmuch as he stands in the position of a co-mortgagor so as to be entitled to the benefit of the securities on the principle of subrogation embodied in S. 92, T. P. Act, and even if the benefit of the Crown charge be not available to a private party the principle of maritime salvage lien as a principle of equity applies to such a case: 11 M I A 241 (P C), Rel. on; 7 C P L R 42 and 11 C P L R 111, Not approved; ('32) 19 AIR 1932 Nag 171, Approved. [245 C 2; P 249 C 1]

The lambardar or sadar lambardar is, in such cases, entitled to charge interest on equitable principles and the more so because of the specific provision in S. 157 (3), C. P. Land Revenue Act: ('32) 19 AIR 1932 Nag 171, Rel. on; ('38) 25 A I R 1938 P C 67, Expl. [P 249 C 1]

J. Sen — for Appellant.

A. V. Khare — for Respondent.

Order. — The questions which have been referred to this Bench are :

1. Whether a lambardar or sadar lambardar who pays arrears of land revenue on behalf of his defaulting cosharer acquires a charge on the share of the defaulting cosharer or the patti lambardar.

2. Whether the lambardar or sadar lambardar is, in such cases, entitled to charge interest; if so, on what principle ?

The facts out of which these questions have arisen are as follows : The appellant is a lambardar of Patti No. 2 of Mouza Bamana and the respondent is the sardar lambardar. On 14th January 1934, the respondent paid into the Government treasury a sum of Rs. 73-5-9 on account of land revenue of Patti No. 2 payable for the year 1933-34 and instituted his suit on 19th February 1937 to recover that amount from the appellant with a prayer that it should be declared a charge on the patti. The suit was dismissed in the trial Court as being beyond three years as computed from 14th January 1934. The lower appellate Court held that inasmuch as the plaintiff was seeking to enforce a charge on the patti, the three years' limitation should be computed from the end of the agricultural year 1933-34, i. e., 1st June 1934 under S. 160, C. P. Land Revenue Act, and decreed the claim. There has been an acute controversy on the point whether a co-owner who has paid land revenue in full is entitled to a charge on the shares of his defaulting co-owners. In 14 Cal 809,[1] 14 ALL 273,[2] 26 Bom 437,[3] 7 Pat 613,[4] 6 Rang 500,[5] 7 C P L R 42[6] and 11 C P L R 111[7] the answer was given in the negative. The contrary view was taken in 26 Mad 686[8] and 28 N L R 214.[9] Before the question came to be settled in Calcutta and Allahabad in the two Full Bench cases, the course of decisions was not uniform and even in the Full Bench cases the opinion was far from being unanimous. In Bengal, the old Saddar Diwani Court has held that a cosharer who paid the land revenue was not entitled to a charge. The opinion veered round to the other side in 14 Beng L R 155[10] on the strength of the dictum of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 11 M I A 241[11] at p. 258. Lord Romilly in delivering the judgment in the last-mentioned case made the following observations :

> Considering that the payment of the revenue by the mortgagee will prevent the Talook from being sold, their Lordships would, if that were the sole question for their consideration, find it difficult to come to any other conclusion than that the person who had such an interest in the Talook as entitled him to pay the revenue due to the Government, and did actually pay it, was thereby entitled to a charge on the Talook as against all persons interested therein for the amount of the money so paid.

This dictum was interpreted in 14 Beng L R 155[10] by Markby and Mitter JJ., as laying down a broad principle of maritime salvage-lien in favour of cosharers who, by payment of land revenue on behalf of their defaulting cosharers, saved the whole mahal from being lost to the proprietary body. Doubts having arisen as to the correctness of that interpretation the question was brought up for consideration before a Full Bench of five Judges in 14 Cal 809[1] and it was held by a majority of 3 to 2 Judges that the interpretation was erroneous; among the majority was Tottenham J., who had himself been of the contrary opinion. In Allahabad, 11 M I A 258[11] was followed in 8 ALL 384[12] at p. 386 but in view of the Full Bench decision in 14 Cal 809[1] the matter came to be considered in 14 ALL 273[2] by a Full Bench of five Judges who by a majority of 4 to 1 accepted the majority view of the Calcutta Full Bench. Edge C. J., who wrote the leading judgment declared his conversion to that view. In 11 Bom 313,[13] which was a case decided before 14 Cal 809,[1] Sargent C. J., and Birdwood J. expressed their opinion that the view taken in 14 Beng L R 155[10] on the basis of Lord Romilly's dictum in 11 M I A 241[11] was in accordance with justice, equity and good conscience and that it should be followed in India although the question as to the co-owner's payment in creating a charge on the other interests which shared the benefit of the payment was still unsettled in England. That view did not commend itself to Lawrence C. J., in 26 Bom 437[3] which came to be decided after the two aforesaid Full Bench decisions of the Calcutta and Allahabad High Courts. The learned Chief Justice was of opinion that the payment by a co-owner for protecting his own interest would not by itself entitle him to a charge on the share of his defaulting co-owners, although it might entitle him to obtain contribution.

In 7 Pat 613[4] the arguments on either side were exhaustively considered and although the opinion was in favour of the view taken by the majority of the Judges in the Calcutta Full Bench case it was conceded that the arguments in favour of the charge were entitled to weight. The decision in that case was in some measure influenced by the rule of practice obtaining in that Court not to depart from cursus curiae of the Calcutta High Court. On the other hand the course of decisions in the Madras High Court has been consistently against the majority view of the Calcutta and Allahabad Full Bench cases as will appear from 11 Mad 452,[14] 26 Mad 686[8] and 36 Mad 493.[15] The difference of opinion turns on the question whether such a charge can be sustained on any broad principle of equity recognized by the British Courts. It is common ground that in the Courts of Ireland the charge was held to arise in favour of the paying co-owner on the principle of the maritime salvage lien. The reason why that principle should not be applied in India is to be found in the following observations of Edge C. J., in 14 ALL 273[2] at pp. 299, 300:

> Justice, equity and good conscience are captivating terms; but before a Judge applies what may appear to him at first sight to be in accordance with justice, equity and good conscience, he must be careful to see that his views are based on sound general principles, and are not in conflict with the intentions of the Legislature or with sound principles recognized by authority. In my opinion, justice, equity and good conscience do not require us in India to go so far afield as the Irish Courts, in order there to seek for, and thence to import into India, novel principles of equity, based on unsound analogy, and rejected as unsound by Judges of such authority as Bowen and Fry L. JJ., and not followed by such an authority as the late Cotton L. J. in (1887) 34 Ch D 234.[16]

In 26 Mad 686[8] it was shown that the principle of maritime salvage lien was neither opposed to the fundamental English conception of equity, nor to the principles underlying the relevant provisions of the Transfer of Property Act nor to the policy of the Government as reflected in the various enactments in India. No doubt, Fry L. J., in (1883) 23 Ch D 552[17] and Bowen L. J., in (1887) 34 Ch D 234[16] were not prepared to apply the principle of the salvage lien to the facts immediately before them but from the observations made by Lindley L. J., in (1890) 62 L T (NS) 475[18] (referred to in 26 Mad 686[8] at p. 705) it cannot be maintained that the doctrine of salvage lien is foreign to the English ideas of equity:

> I do not, however, regard the plaintiffs' claim to a lien as necessarily excluded by the propositions in (1883) 23 Ch D 552.[17] If an owner of onerous property agrees with me to indemnify me or my property which may fall on me or my property, and the owner makes default, and I or my property have to bear those burdens, I am inclined to think that I should have, as against the owner of the onerous property, a lien on it for the money expended by me in bearing that burden which as between him and me he ought to bear. I should, in the case supposed, have preserved the onerous property for him under circumstances which entitled me to it at his expense, and I do not think that in such a case my sole remedy is by an action for damages against him; the existence of such personal remedy would not, I think, exclude such lien. I am not aware of any decision inconsistent with this view and the principles on which many cases of equitable lien depend seem to me to support a lien in such a case.

These observations which were made with reference to payment by a stranger cannot be inappropriate in the case of payment by a co-owner who shares with his defaulting co-owner the common obligation to pay land revenue. That the principle of the maritime salvage lien is not wholly foreign to English Courts is also clear from the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 21 Cal 142.[19] That was a case of a bona fide payment pending litigation of Government revenue and cesses for the preservation of the estate by a person as a consequence of which the estate was adjudged to his opponent. Their Lordships pointed out that his claim to recover the sums paid him was in the nature of salvage. This doctrine had been recognised by their Lordships in 11 M I A 241 [11] at p. 258 in the observation > that the person who had such an interest in the Talook as entitled him to pay the revenue due to the Government, and did actually pay it, was thereby entitled to a charge on the Talook as against all persons interested therein for the amount of the money so paid.

No doubt, in that case it was the mortgagee who had paid the revenue, but the principle reflected in the aforesaid dictum is wide enough to include the case of a co-sharer. This principle is fully recognised in American Courts as will be evident from the statement of the law contained in Freeman on Co-tenancy and Partition, at p. 321, (para. 263) as follows:

> But we think all claims by one co-tenant against another, arising out of the common property, and disconnected alike from any agreement between the parties, and from any circumstances which clearly establish that one must necessarily have been authorised to act for the other, must, in their assertion, be limited to the declaration and enforcement of a lien against the property. If a different rule prevailed, every part owner would constantly incur the hazard of being required to pay, for the removal of incumbrances, sums in excess of the value of the estate.

Even apart from the principle of maritime salvage lien, the well recognized principle of subrogation may well come into operation in cases such as the present. In 11 Mad 452[14] Muthusamy Iyer J., based his decision in favour of a charge on the principle of subrogation, although Bhashyam Aiyangar J., in 26 Mad 686[8] preferred to rest his decision on the principle underlying Ss. 82 and 100, T. P. Act. That principle of equity is now crystallised in S. 92, T. P. Act, which, when read with S. 100 of that Act, would apply to the case of a charge. There is nothing in the policy or the letter of the revenue law of our province to repel its application. On the other hand, the provision in S. 138, C. P. Land Revenue Act, whereby a purchaser of any estate or mahal, share or land sold for arrears of land revenue acquires it free from incumbrance, tends to show that the purchaser gets the benefit of the first charge in favour of the Crown. That is because the land revenue comes to be paid out of the sale proceeds. His position is precisely the same as that of a purchaser in execution of a mortgage decree obtained by the first of a series of incumbrancers. Not only the auction purchaser of an estate sold for recovery of arrears payable directly to the Crown under S. 122, C. P. Land Revenue Act, 1917, but also one who purchases a village share under S. 157 (3) of that Act for recovery of the amount due from a cosharer but not paid by him and paid by the lambardar, obtains a title free from any incumbrance as was held in 18 N L J 149[20] by Subhedar A. J. C., and in 18 N L J 185[21] by the Revenue Member. In the latter case it was observed :

> It cannot have been the intention that because the sum was first paid by the sadar lambardar the security from which the sum so paid was subsequently to be recovered should be less than if it were recovered direct. This would mean that the primary provision of s. 122, Land Revenue Act, which makes land revenue a first charge on all land would be abrogated. The incumbrance might be such that no recovery could be made subject to it and the sum paid could not be recovered. The intention of treating money due as an arrear of land revenue is to give that priority . . . .

In 30 N L R 240[22] at pp. 245-246 Staples A. J. C., expressed a different view as to priority of the purchaser, but implicit in these decisions is the recognition of the fact that the first charge in favour of the Crown is of the same nature and legal effect as that contemplated in S. 100, T. P. Act. If so, it must logically follow that the cosharers in a village stand to each other in the relation of co-mortgagors so as to attract the application of the rule of subrogation embodied in S. 92, T. P. Act. In this respect, it is pertinent to notice that S. 128 (d) provides the transferring of the share of any cosharer who has not paid his quota of land revenue to any cosharer who is willing to pay. This point is made clearer in R. 9 of O. 39, Civil P. C., which says that where land paying revenue to Government is the subject-matter of a suit, if the party in possession neglects to pay land revenue and such land is ordered to be sold, any party to the suit claiming to have interest in such land, may be put in immediate possession of the land upon payment of revenue by him. That clearly shows that the payment of land revenue due by the defaulting cosharer transfers to him the latter's interest in the property instead of merely creating a personal liability against him.

The old view of the Judicial Commissioner's Court enunciated in 7 C P L R 42[6] and 11 C P L R 111[7] followed the Full Bench decisions of the Allahabad and Calcutta High Courts presumably for the reason that in those times the first charge in favour of the Crown was supposed to be an incident of the Crown's prerogative, the benefit of which could not pass to the subject. Section 65 of the old C. P. Land Revenue Act, 1881, made revenue payable under a sub-settlement but not revenue payable under a settlement the first charge. The provision about land revenue being a first charge was made in the Act of 1917 following perhaps Ss. 141 and 142, U. P. Land Revenue Act, 1901. The old view was abandoned in 28 N L R 214[9] in which Macnair J. C. regarded the sadar-lambardar who paid land revenue as being in the position of a surety in view of the obligation laid on him to collect and pay land revenue by S. 123, C. P. Land Revenue Act. It is well known that a surety is entitled to the benefit of the securities and it is to be borne in mind that it is on this principle that the right of one of several joint debtors to be subrogated to the security of the common creditor arises (see Ghosh's Law of Mortgage, 4th edition, p. 347). The view taken by Macnair J. C., finds support in the two recent decisions of the Division Bench of this High Court, 1939 N L J 477[23] and A I R 1940 Nag 156.[24]

20. ('35) 22 A I R 1935 Nag 185: 158 I C 263 : 18 N L J 149, Manrakhanlal v. Parmanand.

24. ('40) 27 A I R 1940 Nag 156 : 190 I C 641, Sitaram v. Krishnarao.

Thus, it is clear from the foregoing discussion, that a cosharer who is liable to discharge the indivisible obligation to pay land revenue which constitutes the primary charge on the estate, stands in the position of a co-mortgagor so as to be entitled to the benefit of the securities on the principle of subrogation embodied in S. 92, Transfer of Property Act; even if the benefit of the Crown charge is assumed for the sake of argument to be not available to a private party, the trend of the revenue legislation and the decisions of both the highest revenue and judicial authorities would justify the adoption of the principle of maritime salvage lien as a principle of equity in view of the observations made by their Lordships in 11 M I A 241[11] at p. 258. Our answer to the first question is in the affirmative.

As to the second question, we see no reason to dissent from the view of Macnair J. C., in 28 N L R 214.[9] Nothing that has been said by their Lordships of the Privy Council in I L R (1938) 2 Cal 72[25] impairs the soundness of that view. That the statute itself contemplates award of interest is clear from the wording of S. 157 (3), Central Provinces Land Revenue Act. If the paying cosharer is entitled to recover interest when he pursues the summary remedy under that section there is no reason why he should be denied interest when he sues in the civil Court. In the Calcutta case cited above their Lordships lay down that considerations of equity would justify the award of interest in a case to which the Interest Act does not apply. In a case such as the present, the principle of equity comes to the aid of the cosharer who pays land revenue, as has already been shown. The same equity must dictate the award of interest, the more so because of the specific provision in S. 157 (3), C. P. Land Revenue Act. Our answer to the second question is in the affirmative.

Civil Revn. No. 636 of 1939, Decided on 15th October 1940, from decree of Sub-Judge, Second Class, Darwha, D/- 3rd August 1939.

(a) C. P. Debt Conciliation Act (2 of 1933), Ss. 8, 8 (2) and 9 (1) — Conditions of S. 8 fulfilled — Operation of S. 8 (2) is automatic and independent of order of Board—Civil Court has jurisdiction to determine whether conditions requisite for operation of S. 8 (2) were present or not — Aforesaid conditions not present — Board's order under S. 8 (2) cannot bind civil Court.

Section 8 (2) brings into operation a sort of guillotine which is automatic and which is independent of any order of the Board. The civil Court has jurisdiction in each case to determine whether in fact the matters which bring the provisions of S. 8 (2) into operation were present or not. If they were present then the discharge is automatic ; if they were not present then no order of the Board purporting to discharge the debt for the reason given in S. 8 (2) can bind the civil Court : ('37) 24 A I R 1937 Nag 259 and 20 N L J 29, Foll.; 1940 N L J 256 and 1939 N L J 171, Expl.

(b) Interpretation of statutes—Statute harsh and effecting departure from ordinary law — It must be construed strictly in favour of subject relying on ordinary law.

A harsh Act, such as the C. P. Debt Conciliation Act in so far as it affects a departure from the ordinary law, ought to be strictly construed and in favour of the subject who relies upon the ordinary laws of the land. [P 251 C 1]

(c) C. P. Debt Conciliation Act (2 of 1933), Ss. 8 (1) and (2) and 9A — Omission to verify statement as required by S. 9A is curable and not fatal defect — Unverified statement — No objection taken and matter allowed to proceed — Party concerned afforded no opportunity to cure defect—Statement must be deemed to have substantially complied with S. 8 (1).

An omission to verify statements as required by S. 9A is a curable irregularity and not a fatal defect. If no objection is taken at the time and the matter is allowed to proceed on the basis of the unverified statement and the party concerned is afforded no opportunity of setting the irregularity right, then the statement should be regarded as complying substantially with the provisions of section 8 (1). Order. — The suit is based on two promissory notes. The defendants admit execution and admit that they would be liable for the claim except for a defence which they raise under S. 8 (2), Debt Conciliation Act. It appears that the defendants went to the Debt Conciliation Board and included this among other debts. Notices were issued to the plaintiff and the other creditors, and on 26th October 1936 the plaintiff submitted his written statement purporting to act under S. 8 (1), Debt Conciliation Act. That statement however was not verified in accordance with the provisions of S. 9A, but no objection was taken to this before the Board, nor did the Board reject the statement for that reason or object to it; on the contrary it proceeded to endeavour to bring about a conciliation. On the next hearing (10th November 1937) the Board stated that it had seen the papers, which of course would have included this written statement, and again no objection was taken, and the Board told the agents of the parties to consult their masters about a conciliation which had been proposed. On the next hearing (17th March 1938) the creditors stated that they did not want to settle. The Board thereupon stated that after scrutiny of the plaintiff's written statement it found that it was not properly verified: therefore it was not a proper statement in law, and in the absence of a proper statement the debt stands discharged under S. 8 (2). It thereupon issued a certificate under S. 15 (1), Debt Conciliation Act, in respect of this and other debts.

The lower Court decides that it has no jurisdiction to entertain this claim because the question whether the order of the Debt Conciliation Board discharging the debt under S. 8 (2) was correct or not cannot be gone into by the civil Court. The learned Judge relies on 1939 N L J 171.[1] The question is not free from difficulty, but the decisions seem to be uniform, except for the ruling just cited, that S. 8 (2) of the Act brings into operation a sort of guillotine which is automatic and which is independent of any order of the Board. If the facts stated in that section are present then the guillotine falls; if they are not then the guillotine cannot fall, and no order of the Board stating that it has fallen can affect the position. The civil Court has in each case to determine whether in fact the matters which bring the provisions of S. 8 (2) into operation were present or not. If they were present then the discharge is automatic; if they were not present then no order of the board purporting to discharge the debt for the reason given in S. 8 (2) is binding on a civil Court. These rulings include a decision of the Division Bench in I L R (1938) Nag 489[2] at pp. 493 and 495 and also a decision of a single Judge in 20 N L J 29.[3] Gruer J., in 1939 NLJ 171[1] also appears to be of that opinion, because he states that though it is difficult to reconcile two dicta which he quoted from the decision of the Division Bench he concludes that he is bound to follow the one which holds that consideration of the point by the civil Courts is not shut out by the Debt Conciliation Act. I am also referred by Mr. Rajwade for the non-applicants to a decision in 1940 N L J 256[4] which states that although the civil Court can enquire into the question whether a Debt Conciliation Board has exceeded its jurisdiction yet the Court will not interfere with the board's order if the proceedings before the board were with jurisdiction. But the point here is that the operation of S. 8 (2) is independent of the board and is automatic. No question of the board's jurisdiction to determine whether the matters which S. 8 requires are present or not arises. As I have just said all the rulings are agreed that what the board chooses to say on this question is neither here nor there. It is for the civil Court to determine when the matter comes before it whether the facts which bring S. 8 (2) into play are present or not. It is no part of the board's business to discharge debts under section 8 (2).

The difficulty in the case, however, is due to another passage in 1939 N L J 171.[1] In dealing with the merits of the board's decision in that case Gruer J., appears to have been of the opinion that the view of the board that an unverified statement is no statement at all under the law was correct. But I am not clear about the ratio decidendi upon which the learned Judge proceeds, because after stating that the board in his opinion acted harshly in not giving the plaintiff in that case time for amendment of the statement, which he agrees it could have done, he continues:

> The Legislature, however, in S. 18 expressly provides that no appeal or application for revision shall lie against any order passed by a board, and when the civil Court finds that that order, although harsh, is technically correct it cannot interfere.

The decision consequently appears to me to be based upon the assumption that the board is required under the Debt Conciliation Act to pass an order of discharge under S. 8 (2), and that if it does so no civil Court can question that order. That, however, as I have shown, is directly contrary to the decisions which I have cited above including the decision of the Division Bench, and with respect appears to me to be contrary to what Gruer J., himself had stated a little earlier in his decision. I therefore do not feel bound by the decision because naturally

1. ('39) 1939 N L J 171, Baboo v. Heeralal.
2. ('37) 24 A I R 1937 Nag 259 : 170 I C 905 : 20 N L J 57 : I L R (1938) Nag 489, Shivdin v. Ramratan.
3. ('37) 20 N L J 29, Motiram v. Bhurmalsao.
4. ('40) 1940 N L J 256, Jawarchand v. Tapiram.

I have to follow the decision of the Division Bench.

I have therefore now to decide whether, quite apart from the Board's view of the matter, an unverified written statement is fatal under S. 8 (2). There is no doubt that the Act is not very clearly worded and that it is possible to take either view. On the whole I am inclined to take the view which disturbs the existing law as little as possible. The Act is a harsh one, and it has repeatedly been held that in so far as it affects a departure from the ordinary law it ought to be strictly construed and construed in favour of the subject who relies upon the ordinary laws of the land. Section 8 (1) requires a statement of debts to be submitted. Section 8 (2) states : "Every debt of which a statement is not submitted . . . shall be deemed . . . to have been duly discharged, etc." So far as this section is concerned no question of verification arises. Section 9 (1) then sets out certain particulars which the creditor is bound to set out in his statement, and then comes the provision which is relevant to this case, viz., S. 9-A. That is mandatory in its terms in that it uses the word 'shall,' and it requires every statement submitted under sub-section (1) of S. 8 to be signed and verified in the manner prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure for signing and verifying plaints. The question arises however whether an omission to do so is a curable irregularity, or whether it is a fatal defect. It is clear that every irregularity in the statement cannot be held to invalidate it and thus bring into operation the very harsh provision of S. 8 (2). It must therefore be a question for decision in every case whether the irregularity complained of is so fatal as to go to the root of the matter and make the statement in point of law no statement at all. That is the ordinary rule which is followed in the civil Courts in respect of the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code even where the Code employs language which is as mandatory as the language we find in S. 9-A.

Even in the matter of verification of plaints, we find O. 6, R. 15, Civil P. C., employing language which is just as mandatory as that to be found in S. 9-A. It has however never been doubted that an unverified plaint is not a nullity; it has never been doubted that the defect, if discovered in time, can be cured; and it has never been doubted that a decree passed on the basis of such a plaint when not cured is not a nullity; that is to say, the plaint even though not verified is a valid document. There seems to be no reason why the same rule of interpretation should not be applied in the case of the Debt Conciliation Act, especially when, as I have said, the Act is a harsh one, taking away rights and privileges which the ordinary law confers. In the circumstances, I am of opinion that the type of irregularity which we find here is a curable one and is not fatal. If no objection is taken at the time, and the matter is allowed to proceed on the basis of the unverified statement and the party concerned is afforded no opportunity of setting the irregularity right then, in my opinion, the statement should be regarded as complying substantially with the provisions of S. 8 (1) in exactly the same way as a plaint would in similar circumstances be regarded as complying substantially with the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure even though not verified. The application is allowed, and the claim will now be decreed. But the effect of the certificate given by the Debt Conciliation Board under S. 15 (1), Debt Conciliation Act, will be given effect to, that is to say, the plaintiff will not be allowed either interest or costs, and the enforcement of this decree will be postponed in accordance with the provisions of S. 15, Debt Conciliation Act. Costs of this revision will be paid by the non-applicants No counsel's fee as no certificate has been filed.

* Contract Act (1872), S. 12—Insanity—Onus is on person alleging insanity — Person established to be usually of unsound mind—Burden of proof is on party alleging execution of document during lucid interval — Evidence as to insanity—Cumulative effect should be gauged.

But once it has been established that the person is usually of unsound mind the burden of proof is on the party who alleges that the document was executed during a lucid interval : Case law relied on. [P 252 C 2]

Judgment.—This is an appeal by defendant 2 against a preliminary foreclosure decree on a mortgage executed by one Govinda on 28th May 1920 to secure a sum of Rs. 3000 alleged to have been advanced to him by four mortgagees whose representatives are the respondents in this appeal. The appellant is the subsequent transferee of part of the mortgaged property. The mortgagor Govinda is dead. The main defence of the appellant in the lower Court was that at the time of executing the mortgage Govinda was of unsound mind and incapable of understanding the nature of the mortgage contract which was therefore void. This contention forms the basis in the lower Court of issue 3 which has been dealt with in para. 8 of the judgment in the following way :

Issue 3. — On the point of Govinda's unsound condition of mind all that the defendant's evidence shows is that he was at times of unsound mind. Even this evidence comes from persons who had little personal knowledge about it. Jani who must be the best informed person about her husband's mental condition deposed that Govinda used to behave well and give no trouble if he were to get his meals regularly and tobacco when wanted by him. The defendant has thus failed to prove that Govinda was imbecile or was of unsound mind at the time of the execution of the mortgage-deed in suit. I find accordingly.

This shows that the lower Court placed the burden of proving the unsoundness of Govinda's mind on the appellant who according to the learned Judge had failed to discharge it. No doubt the onus of proving insanity is in the first place on the person who alleges it, the normal presumption being of sanity. In this connexion the learned counsel for the respondents has placed before us A I R 1923 Pat 187[1] and A I R 1927 Cal 889.[2] Both these were cases which turned on the primary burden of proving insanity which, as we have just stated, lies on the party alleging it. The Courts held that in the circumstances of those cases the party alleging the insanity had failed to prove it. Different considerations arise however where there is sufficient evidence to discharge this primary burden, for instance, such a case would be as in 40 Mad 660[3] where the person whose mental capacity was being considered had been certified to be a lunatic under the Lunacy Acts. A similar case is that in (1848) 11 Beav 105[4] where it is said :

The finding of the jury upon a commission of lunacy that a party is lunatic, throws the burthen of proof on those who contend the contrary. The presumption is not then as it would otherwise be, in favour of sanity or soundness of mind, but the contrary must be proved; that is, they who allege the sanity of a person at a time subsequent to that at which he has been found lunatic under a commission, have the burthen cast on them of proving the soundness of mind of such person.

But the shifting of the burden of proof is not confined to cases where the lunatic has been certified. If there is sufficient evidence to prove that the person whose mental capacity is in doubt is usually of unsound mind, then the burden shifts to the person who alleges his sanity to prove that the contract was made during a lucid interval. This is recognised by S. 12 of the Contract Act. The section says :

A person is said to be of sound mind for the purpose of making a contract if, at the time when he makes it, he is capable of understanding it and of forming a rational judgment as to its effect upon his interests.

A person who is usually of unsound mind, but occasionally of sound mind, may make a contract when he is of sound mind.

A person who is usually of sound mind, but occasionally of unsound mind, may not make a contract when he is of unsound mind.

This principle also finds support in (1778-1794) 29 E R 632 at p. 634[5] :

If derangement be alleged, it is clearly incumbent on the party alleging it, to prove such derangement; if such derangement be proved, or be admitted to have existed at any particular period, but a lucid interval be alleged to have prevailed at the period particularly referred to, then the burthen of proof attaches on the party alleging such lucid interval, who must show sanity and competence at the period when the act was done, and to which the lucid interval refers . . . and it certainly is of equal importance, that the evidence in support of the allegation of a lucid interval, after derangement at any period has been established, should be as strong and as demonstrative of such fact, as where the object of the proof is to establish derangement.

See also A I R 1932 Rang 24[6] in which the learned Judge refers to the passage which we have cited in (1771-1794) 29 E R 632[5] and says :

This, no doubt, would be a satisfactory method where the unsoundness of mind has been proved by definite expert evidence, but in the present case there is no evidence of that kind.

The learned Judge then goes on to discuss the evidence in the case before him and holds that it is sufficient to prove that at the time when the old lady, whose mental capacity was under consideration, executed the document, the validity of which was in question she had a lucid interval. A I R 1940 Mad 73[7] is a case where an old man was found to be suffering from senile dementia previous to the time at which he executed the documents which were in question in the case; it was held that the nature of the executant's derangement was such that it was improbable that he would show any improvement in the course of time, and hence the burden of proof was on the party who alleged that he had executed the documents while of sound mind. The evidence was then examined and the conclusion reached that the circumstances coupled with the nature of the executant's disability were sufficient for the Court to hold that he was of unsound mind when he executed the documents. Therefore taking into consideration the above case law together with the provisions of S. 12, Contract Act, we hold the view that once it has been established that the person is usually of unsound mind the burden of proof is on the party who alleges that the document was executed during a lucid interval.

That being so, we next have to examine the facts and circumstances in order to determine whether Govinda was usually sane or insane. As far as the evidence of his insanity is concerned, we have the statements made by Motiram (D. W. 1), who was the agent of Jani, the wife of Govinda, to the effect that, on the day he joined the service with Jani, while a police enquiry was going on, a settlement was arrived at in a dispute between Soni and Jani as to who was to look after Govinda and his property, that Soni should remain in possession of the property and that Govinda should live with her while Jani went to reside with her father. Jani was dissatisfied with this decision and applied to the Sessions Judge, presumably the witness meant the District Judge, for regaining possession of her husband Govinda and the proceedings were probably under the Lunacy Act. The witness goes on to say that before the enquiry had ended a compromise was effected and hence Govinda was not declared a lunatic. The next witness Ukandrao (D. W. 2) states that Govinda was insane and used to answer irrelevantly when he was spoken to. He was brought back from the village of Mangroli by the Circle Inspector and was questioned as to why he had gone there and he replied that he had been taken there by Bhanji, respondent 4, whereupon the Circle Inspector gave Govinda in charge of Jani who managed his estate. In cross-examination this witness stated that Govinda used at times to talk sensibly and at times not. This visit of the Circle Inspector took place about a fortnight after the execution of the mortgage in suit. Similarly, witness 3 for the defence, Ramchandra, says that Govinda was "a little half mad and used to act on what others used to tell him." His estate was managed by Soni for a time and thereafter by Jani. This witness also speaks of Govinda being brought from Mangroli by the Circle Inspector of Police and given in the custody of Jani. At this time, the witness adds, he looked like a half mad man. The value of this witness's evidence would not be great if taken alone because in cross-examination he admits that he only considered Govinda to be half mad because he spoke little and answered 'yes' when asked if he would come to his village and sometimes gave no answer at all when questioned. Nevertheless the evidence has some value specially when taken in conjunction with the other evidence in the case.

Witness 5 for the defence is Mt. Jani, who is the only witness about whom the learned Judge of the lower Court has said anything. He discounts her evidence because she says that Govinda gave no trouble as long as his meals were regularly given and tobacco when required. This statement is certainly made by Jani, but it is not all that she says. She commences her deposition by saying that on account of Govinda being mad the panchas advised her to marry him so that he might be properly looked after and she accordingly married him some 16 years before the date of her deposition and she looked after him. She also corroborates the other witnesses, to whom we have referred above, as to Govinda being brought back by the police and given in Jani's custody. The nature of Govinda's derangement according to Jani was apparently melancholia. Witness 6 for the defence, Kedaji, also speaks of Govinda's insanity, saying that he used to throw stones at times. The witness was apparently in Govinda's service for two or three years during which time he behaved normally for weeks at a time. The witness used to look after his cultivation and sometimes used to feed him and had occasions to lock him up when he became violent. He also speaks of Govinda being brought to Jani by the police. It is noteworthy that Kedaji does not say that Govinda ever threw stones at him although he does not say that he did not. It is noteworthy because Uttam Singh (D. W. 9) gives Kedaji as the source of his information when he says that Govinda used to throw stones, adding that he threw a stone at Kedaji in his presence. This witness avers that Govinda was mad and used to throw stones at people and assault passers-by unnecessarily. He used at times to sit on the roof of his house and throw stones or tiles at passers-by and sometimes had to be chained with iron chains. He was mad in 1919 when the panchayatnama (Ex. 2 D. 6) was executed. The only evidence on the plaintiff respondents' side to rebut the above evidence is that of respondent 4, Bhanji, who was the principal defendant in the case and very much interested in the result. He says that Govinda was not a lunatic or insane or of weak intellect. In fact one of the plaintiffs' own witnesses, Ramchandra (P. W. 3), has admitted that Govinda was sane at times and insane at times.

When, in addition to this oral evidence of Govinda's insanity, we examine the circumstances which have come to light in the case, we feel convinced that Govinda's normal state of mind was unsound. He was a kind of village idiot. Thus we find that before the mortgage in suit was executed Govinda had partitioned his property equally with Soni, his brother's daughter. No doubt a gift of property by one relation to another would not be any indication of unsoundness of mind, but it was not a deed of gift that was executed but a partition deed, and a partition is usually executed only when the persons between whom the property is to be partitioned have each a claim on that property. Soni had no claim to this property and hence it is curious, to say the least, that Govinda should have found it necessary to partition the property with her. Then again we find that the partition deed and the mortgage in suit were not executed at Borgaon, where Govinda ordinarily resided, but at Mangruli where Soni was living with Bhanji who was keeping her. Govinda was in some way induced to go to Mangruli, and while there he was presumably to some extent under the influence of Soni and Bhanji and we find him executing the questioned document whilst there. Then again the mortgage purports to have been executed for a consideration of Rs. 3000 which is said to have been required by Govinda for the liquidation of his debts to others and for the improvement of his cultivation. There is no evidence whatsoever of anybody having been paid off by Govinda or on behalf of Govinda out of the mortgage money. Nothing could have been easier, if this recital in the document were true, than to have examined at least one of the creditors paid out of the money, and moreover the evidence shows that Govinda was not managing his own cultivation but either Soni before she went to live with Bhanji or Jani or paid agents managed it for him. It seems improbable therefore that Govinda while staying in their village without the help of Jani or of any agent should have taken a loan for purposes of his cultivation. Thus it has not been proved that he required money at the time.

It is true that a show was made of paying over the money before the Sub-Registrar, but there was nothing to prevent the money being taken back as soon as the parties came out of the Sub-Registrar's office. If the Sub-Registrar had been examined as a witness, as he was in A I R 1932 Rang 24,[6] and had said that at the time when the transactions took place in his presence Govinda appeared to be in a perfectly normal state of mind, that would have been something, but the Sub-Registrar has not been examined in this case. Besides this the circumstances of the bringing back of Govinda by the police, the commencement of proceedings in lunacy in the Court of the District Judge, the marriage of Jani to Govinda in order that he should have somebody to look after him, all point to the fact of Govinda being a man of weak intellect. Finally it is admitted that nothing was repaid towards the mortgage debt; nevertheless no action was taken to enforce the debt by a suit until the very end of the period of limitation, and even limitation was only saved by the fact that the civil Court vacation was continuing at the time when the period of limitation would normally have expired. These circumstances, taken individually, would of themselves be of little value to prove insanity, but, as has been pointed out by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 15 N L R 68,[8] they have to be considered together and their cumulative effect gauged. The cumulative effect then of all this evidence convinces us that insanity was the normal state of Govinda's mind, and therefore the burden was on the respondents to prove that the transaction in question took place during a lucid interval. There is no evidence of this beyond the bare statement of Bhanji himself to which we have referred. Bhanji entered the witness-box in rebuttal of the defendants' evidence. It was surely his duty to rebut the evidence of insanity which had been adduced by the defendants. Apart from his own bare statement, there is not a particle of evidence examined in rebuttal on the question of Govinda's state of mind.

The only difficulty which we felt in coming to a conclusion in favour of the appellant was the fact that the appellant himself had acquired his interest in the mortgaged property from Govinda. If Govinda was, as we think he was, a lunatic it would appear that the appellant's claim to the fields is no better than that of the respondents since he, like them, has acquired his interest from a lunatic. In their reply to the written statement of the defendants the plaintiffs actually made this point in para. 13 where they say:

> The defendants have also got their title from this very Govinda, subsequent to the mortgage. The defendants or their transferors, who got the property from Govinda, having acquired the property from the very source—Govinda—cannot challenge the transaction of the plaintiffs on the ground that Govinda was not competent to transfer.

But although they took the point they do not seem to have pressed it; no issue was framed in respect of it. No argument was addressed apparently in the Court below on these lines since the learned Judge has said nothing about it in his judgment, and even before us the respondents' counsel has not said anything on this aspect of the case. The defendant did not acquire his interest directly from Govinda but from the transferees of Govinda, and possibly the respondents may have felt that the defendant would have been able to advance some plea which would have had the effect of neutralising this contention on their part if it had been pressed. Since therefore the respondents have not chosen to press this point on their own behalf, we do not consider that we should press it for them. The defendant is admittedly in possession of the mortgaged fields and must remain in possession of them unless the plaintiffs can establish a better title. For the reasons which we have set out we do not consider that they have established a better title. The appeal accordingly succeeds and the plaintiffs' suit is dismissed with costs in both Courts.

VIVIAN BOSE J.

Rambhaoo Lalji Tote — Plaintiff — Appellant

v.

Gurudayal Nagolal Khatri — Defendant 4 — Respondent.

Appeal No. 580 of 1938, Decided on 14th March 1941, from appellate decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Amraoti, D/- 23rd December 1937.

(a) Hindu law—Alienation — Legal necessity — Necessity and benefit to estate are questions of fact—Plea as to necessity and benefit expressly waived in trial Court — First Appellate Court is justified in refusing it to be raised before it—Nor can it be raised in second appeal.

It is beyond doubt that an alienee who wishes to bind the shares of persons not a party to his mortgage has to allege and prove necessity or benefit or antecedent debt or something of that kind. Where the plea of legal necessity and benefit to the estate has been expressly waived in the trial Court by the plaintiff, the first Appellate Court is justified in refusing it to be raised before it and being a question of fact the plea cannot be raised in second appeal. [P 256 C 2 ; P 257 C 1]

(b) Hindu law — Alienation— Joint family — Necessity depends upon pressure on estate—Family in affluent circumstances and well in position to pay its debts—There can be no necessity to alienate to satisfy debt.

It is well settled that under the Hindu law necessity depends upon pressure on the estate. If therefore the joint family is in affluent circumstances and can well afford to pay its debts there can be no pressure, and consequently there can be no necessity for alienating to satisfy the debts. [P 258 C 1]

(c) Stamp Act (1899), S. 36—Pronote insufficiently stamped admitted in evidence—It is not open to parties or to Court to call it in question on ground of insufficiency of stamp.

Where an insufficiently stamped pronote has been admitted in evidence it is not open to either side, and still less to the Court, to call it in question on the ground of the insufficiency of the stamp. It has to be treated as if it had been properly stamped: 1938 N L J Notes 57, Foll.; ('27) 14 A I R 1927 Nag 241, Ref. [P 257 C 2]

(d) Hindu law—Debts — Father's antecedent debt— Son is liable — Non-father manager can alienate son's share provided there is legal necessity — But father manager can alienate it irrespective of necessity.

Under the Hindu law the sons are liable to pay their father's antecedent debts. The non-father manager can alienate a son's share for this purpose provided it is necessary to do so. Whether it is necessary will depend upon the circumstances of the family. But the father manager stands on a higher footing vis a vis his sons and can alienate for his own antecedent debts whether it is necessary or not: ('33) 20 A I R 1933 All 273 (FB), Foll.; ('24) 11 A I R 1924 P C 50, Expl. and Rel. on ; 13 Cal 21 (P C), Ref. [P 258 C 2]

(e) Pleadings — Waiver — Plea of necessity held waived.

In reply to the express pleas of the defendants the plaintiff stated that the debt was binding because it was antecedent and that consequently the question of legal necessity did not arise :

Held that there was clear waiver of the question of legal necessity. [P 257 C 1]

M. R. Bobde and T. P. Naik—for Appellant.

Judgment. — The only question with which we are concerned in this appeal is whether defendant 4 Gurudayal is liable on the mortgage in suit. It will be necessary to have the family tree to understand the facts. The tree is as follows :

PANDULAL

Sheshlal (defendant 1)	Kesheolal (defendant 2)	Narayanlal (defendant 3)	Nagolal (dead)
Ramdayal (defendant 5)	Sheodayal (defendant 6)	Shrikisanlal (defendant 7)	Gurudayal (defendant 4).

The suit is on a mortgage, Ex. P-1 dated 16th June 1933, executed by the first three defendants who are the sons of Pandulal shown in the tree. It was executed by them personally and was also executed by defendant 1 on behalf of defendant 4 who was then and still is a minor, his father Nagolal having died previous to this. The mortgage was for Rupees 4000. This Rs. 4000 was due on a promissory note dated 9th April 1929 (Ex. P 3) executed by all the four sons of Pandulal. That note in turn was executed as a renewal of an earlier note Ex. D-10 dated 16th January 1926 which was also executed by all the four sons of Pandulal. Nagolal died after the execution of the second promissory note, Ex. P-3, and the question is whether defendant 4's uncles as managers of the family could alienate his share in the family property for a debt for which the father Nagolal was responsible.

There are various ways in which the share of defendant 4 could be reached in circumstances like these. It would be possible for the plaintiff to allege and prove either legal necessity or benefit to the estate, or it would perhaps be possible to rely on the rule of antecedent debt. So far as the questions of legal necessity and benefit to the estate are concerned, I do not think we can go into them here because they were expressly set on one side by the plaintiff in the lower Courts and being questions of fact cannot be raised in second appeal. It is denied in this Court that the matter was waived in the Courts below and there is a ground of appeal to that effect. But the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court states that it was expressly waived in the first Court. The passage in which he says so reads thus :

The question of legal necessity was expressly waived aside by counsel for the plaintiff in the original Court and the doctrine of antecedent debt relied upon. There was no attempt to make out legal necessity, and in these circumstances there is no need to ask if it is present.

It would appear from this passage that there was an attempt to raise this question in the lower appellate Court but the learned Judge brushed it aside on the ground that the question had been expressly waived in the first Court. We have consequently to go back to the proceedings in that Court to see whether this is so. It is beyond doubt that an alienee who wishes to bind the shares of persons not a party to his mortgage has to allege and prove necessity or benefit or antecedent debt or something of that kind. He has to show why persons who have not signed the document are nevertheless liable upon it. No attempt was made to show this in the plaint. The defendants however went out of their way to state that even if the consideration for the mortgage was proved, the same was not binding upon them because there was neither legal necessity nor family benefit, and one set of defendants stated in explicit terms that the family was then in affluent circumstances and was consequently in a position to pay off its debts and that therefore even if those debts existed there was no necessity to mortgage.

It is well settled that necessity depends upon pressure on the estate. If therefore the family is in affluent circumstances and can well afford to pay its debts, it is clear that there can be no pressure, and that consequently there can be no necessity for alienating to satisfy the debts. The learned counsel who appeared for the plaintiff in the first Court appears to have realised this because he stated in reply to these express pleas of the defendants that the debt was binding because it was antecedent and that consequently the question of legal necessity did not arise. The exact plea is as follows :

The debt for which the mortgage deed in suit was executed constitutes a valid antecedent debt of defendant 4's father and therefore the mortgage deed is binding on the share of defendant 4 as well as the other minor defendants, irrespective of the question of legal necessity or benefit of the family

In my opinion, this is clear waiver of the question of legal necessity. The position which the learned counsel was adopting was that an enquiry into the circumstances of the family was unnecessary because, even conceding that they were in an affluent condition the debt is still binding on defendant 4 because so far as he is concerned it is an antecedent debt. The pleadings, or what passes for pleadings in this Province, then continued. The defendant stated that even if the debt was antecedent it had been borrowed for an illegal purpose, namely the starting of a new business which was not an ancestral business of the family. The plaintiff denied this and set out what the debt had been borrowed for, namely for cultivation purposes, and therefore alleged that the debt was neither illegal nor immoral and consequently formed a good antecedent debt. In these circumstances the lower Court was justified in declining to enter into the questions of necessity and benefit. It will be noticed that there was no issue about these questions in the first Court. It is clear therefore that the matter was not tried and it is clear that it was not tried because of the attitude which the plaintiff adopted. I cannot allow the matter to be raised here.

That leaves outstanding a difficult question of law, namely, whether the father alone can alienate for an antecedent debt of his or whether a manager can also do so for a debt of the father of the person sought to be made liable. But before entering into that, I will dispose of another point which arises in the case, namely whether the debt, antecedent or otherwise, was time-barred at the date of the mortgage. That depends upon whether the promissory note, Ex. P-3, constituted a good ground of liability. The finding of the lower appellate Court is that it did not because it was insufficiently stamped as a promissory note. It bore a stamp of only one anna.

The learned counsel for the appellant argues that even though the stamp was insufficient to make this document a good promissory note, it was enough to make it a good acknowledgment, and he relies on a decision in 10 N L J 45[1] which states that a document insufficiently stamped as a promissory note can be used as an acknowledgment if it bears a one anna stamp. I need not decide here whether that case was rightly decided because in my opinion the matter is settled in another way by a Division Bench of this Court in 1938 NLJ Notes 57.[2] Section 35 of the Stamp Act states that no instrument chargeable with duty shall be admitted in evidence for any purpose if it is not duly stamped, but S. 36 states that if in spite of this the document is admitted then it shall not be called in question at any stage of the same suit on the ground that it was not duly stamped. Now Ex. P-3 was admitted in evidence in the lower Court and consequently it was not open to either side, and still less to the Court, to call it in question on the ground of the insufficiency of the stamp. It had to be treated as if it had been properly stamped. If it is so treated, then clearly the debt due at the time of the mortgage was not time-barred.

Going back now to the point which raises the only real difficulty in the case, the learned counsel for the appellant relies on a decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 46 ALL 95[3] at p. 104 and particularly on the third proposition enunciated by their Lordships on that page. Unfortunately, the language used by their Lordships is ambiguous. They have set out five propositions. In the first, they deal with the right of the managing coparcener of a joint undivided estate to alienate or burden the property qua manager. In the second, they state "if he is the father ..." In the third they state "if he purports to burden the estate by mortgage. . . . " . The question is whether the word "he" used in the third proposition relates to the managing coparcener referred to in the first or to the father referred to in the second. It might refer to either. Unfortunately also there is not much in the body of the judgment which can elucidate the difficulty and consequently the decision does not, in my opinion, assist us in the present case.

The learned Judge of the lower appellate Court has relied upon a Full Bench decision of the Allahabad High Court in 55 ALL 370.[4] The position there was much the same as here and what the learned Judges held was that the father alone has the privilege of alienating for an antecedent debt and that if a manager who is not the father attempts to do so, then the alienation is not binding on the "son" even though it would have been binding on him had the alienation been made by his father. The learned Judges however appeared to have considered that the fact that the debt was due by the father might make it necessary for the manager to alienate so as to bind the son for the simple reason that that debt would constitute pressure on the estate and would therefore be for a necessary purpose. They accordingly remanded the case to enable the question of necessity to be tried. I was asked to do the same here but as I have said necessity depends not only on the existence of a debt and of its nature but also on the circumstances of the family. If they were in affluent circumstances and could have paid off the debt, clearly there was no necessity to mortgage. As that question has been shut out the course adopted in the Allahabad case cannot be taken and we are therefore left with the proposition of law with which the learned Judges dealt. As to that the learned Judges did not consider the question for themselves because they were of opinion that the matter was settled by the Privy Council in 46 ALL 95.[3] They took the word "he" in the third proposition to refer to the father as distinct from a manager who is not the father, and there is certainly much to be said for that point of view. But as their Lordships were not considering this particular point in 46 ALL 95,[3] and as the other construction which is contended for on behalf of the appellant in this case is also possible, I prefer to examine the question independently, especially as it is one of considerable importance.

I do not think anything can be gained by going back to the original texts because, as the Judicial Committee has remarked in 46 ALL 95[3] at pp. 101 and 102, the present position has been reached as a result of a long course of decisions which, stare decisis, cannot be unsettled now. The rule is illogical. It is destructive of the principle of independent coparcenary rights in the sons, (which is the fundamental right), and so I do not think it should be extended further than the decisions warrant. At best it is an exception grafted on to the fundamental position by Judges. As to the authorities, there also I do not think any useful purpose will be served by scrutinising them at length because the rules they embody have been summed up by the Judicial Committee in 13 Cal 21[5] at p. 25 and have been quoted in 46 ALL 95[3] at p. 102. Lord Hobhouse said in the former case :

> Destructive as it may be of the principle of independent coparcenary rights in the sons, the decisions have, for some time, established the principle that the sons cannot set up their rights against their father's alienation for an antecedent debt, or against his creditor's remedies for their debts, if not tainted with immorality.
> In the latter case their Lordships remark:
> It is probably bootless to speculate as to how these seemingly conflicting principles were allowed to develop. On the one hand there is the general rule of the Mitakshara law that the manager cannot burden the estate for his own purposes . . . On the other hand there is the obligation of the son to discharge his father's debts, based on the doctrine of pious duty, but perhaps reflecting a remnant . . . from the older laws of Manu under which the son had no interest during the father's life-time.

If this is how the position arose, and their Lordships would appear to suggest that that is probably the case, then there is a wide difference between the father's powers and the powers of a manager who is not the father. If the former derives his power from the residuum left to him from the old days when the sons had no right during his life-time, then the rule cannot apply to the non-father manager because he never had such rights. His powers have always been limited to alienating for necessity or for benefit. In the circumstances I agree with the conclusion reached in 55 ALL 370.[4] There can of course be no doubt that the sons are liable to pay their father's antecedent debts, and I think there can be no doubt that the non-father manager can alienate a son's share for this purpose provided it is necessary to do so. Whether it is necessary will depend upon the circumstances of the family. But the father-manager stands on a higher footing vis a vis his sons and he can alienate for his own antecedent debts whether it is necessary or not. That appears to be the distinction between the two. The decision appealed from is therefore correct and the appeal is dismissed with costs.

The main object of O. 23, R. 1 (2) is to prevent the defeat of justice on technical grounds. The words "sufficient grounds" in the aforesaid rule refer to some defect in the suit, which has the effect of shutting out a fair trial on the merits, and arises out of some error made in good faith by the plaintiff, or by the Court at the instance of either party which can only be effectively set right by a trial de novo : 5 N L R 88 and ('17) 4 A I R 1917 Nag 121, Foll. [P 260 C 1]

The plaintiff sued for refund of goods purchased by him as the goods were not of the standard agreed upon. The defendant denied that the goods supplied were not up to the agreed quality and counterclaimed the price of the goods sought to be recovered by the plaintiff on the ground that plaintiff had not paid the same. The plaintiff however subsequently filed an application to withdraw the suit with permission to bring a fresh suit on the ground that he had sold the goods and realised a reasonable price. The permission was granted by the trial Court:

Held* that by being able to sell the goods which the plaintiff had purchased from the defendant, at a satisfactory figure, the plaintiff thereby no longer suffered any damage, and his whole cause of action had vanished. There was therefore no need to reserve any right to bring a fresh action. [P 260 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 8, R. 6 — Suit on regular side — Defendant claiming set-off or making counterclaim — Plaintiff's claim breaking down by reason of withdrawal or otherwise — Defendant can claim decree for set-off in same Court in same suit—Counterclaim triable by Court of Small Causes — Defendant cannot agitate it in regular Court in which suit was filed.

In the case of a genuine set-off, such as is contemplated by O. 8, R. 6 if the plaintiff's claim breaks down for any reason including a withdrawal the defendant is entitled to have his set-off considered by the same Court, and can be given a decree for a set-off in the same suit, but where his claim is not a genuine set-off but a counter-claim which is triable by the Small Cause Court, he cannot agitate it in the regular Court in which the suit was instituted : 9 C W N 748 and ('34) 21 AIR 1934 All 543, Expl. [P 261 C 1]

Order.—The plaintiff brought this action to obtain a refund of the price of certain materials which he had purchased from the defendant on the ground that they were not up to the standard of quality which was agreed upon. He claimed a refund of Rs. 373 which he had paid to the defendant. The latter denied that the materials supplied were not up to the agreed quality, and, on the ground that the plaintiff had not paid Rs. 373, which was the price of the materials he counter-claimed Rs. 373. Subsequently on the 12th February 1940, when the case was fixed for evidence, the plaintiff's pleader made the following statement to the Court, which was the Court of the third Subordinate Judge, second class :

Plaintiff has sold the films in dispute, and they have fetched a reasonable price. He does not therefore wish to prosecute this suit, but reserves his right to raise these points by way of defence in case the defendant chooses to file a suit against him. Under the circumstances permission should be granted to him to bring a fresh suit, if necessary.

Upon this statement the Court passed the following order :

Plaintiff is allowed to withdraw this suit, with the permission to bring a fresh suit, if necessary. He shall pay defendant's full costs. Pleader's fees on the admission scale.

Thereafter, holding that by the withdrawal of the suit the counterclaim had become a separate suit which was triable by the Small Cause Court, he returned the written statement as a plaint to be presented in the proper Court. The defendant has accordingly presented his claim in the Small Cause Court, but that Court, I am informed, has postponed registration of the suit until this application has been decided, as it was doubtful whether it had any right to entertain the claim in the circumstances in which it came to be presented to it. The application raises two questions for determination : (i) whether the lower Court was right in reserving to the plaintiff permission to bring a fresh action on withdrawing this action, and (ii) whether the lower Court was right in returning the written statement for presentation as a plaint to the Small Cause Court.

(i). On this point the contention of the applicant is that, once the plaintiff was satisfied with his bargain with the defendant by reason of his having disposed of the goods at an adequate price to a third party, that was the end of his suit, and the only question remaining to be decided was whether he had paid the consideration of Rs. 373 to the defendant or not. There was no need therefore to reserve to the plaintiff a right to bring a fresh action and the matter did not fall within the purview of O. 23, R. 1 (2), Civil P. C. The order purports to be made under O. 23, R. 1 (2) (b), which is to the following effect :

Where the Court is satisfied that there are other sufficient grounds for allowing the plaintiff to institute a fresh suit for the subject-matter of a suit or part of a claim, it may, on such terms as it thinks fit, grant the plaintiff permission to withdraw from such suit or abandon such part of a claim with liberty to institute a fresh suit in respect of the subject-matter of such suit or such part of a claim.

The non-applicant in support of the lower Court's order argued that the order is not a final order but is conditional, the condition being that set out in the statement quoted at the beginning of this order, that it will only operate if it is rendered necessary in defence of the defendant's suit to recover Rs. 373 from him. The order does not make this clear, but even if it did, I am of the opinion that the circumstances are not such as to justify the application of O. 23, R. 1 (2). The circumstances in which that rule comes into play have been explained in 5 N L R 88[1] and A I R 1917 Nag 121[2] with which I fully concur. In 5 N L R 88[1] the learned Additional Judicial Commissioner referred to a ruling by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in 13 M I A 160[3] which was given prior to the present Civil Procedure Code. Therein, their Lordships prescribed the limits within which the power of the Court to allow a fresh suit could be used. The Courts, according to that ruling, were limited to questions of form. The learned Additional Judicial Commissioner then pointed out that, when the law was codified in the Civil Procedure Code, effect was given to this pronouncement of their Lordships by requiring the Court to be satisfied (a) that the suit must fail by reason of some formal defect or (b) that there were sufficient grounds for allowing withdrawal or abandonment of a suit or part of a suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit. He then pointed out that the main object of this rule is to prevent the defeat of justice on technical grounds, and that the words "sufficient grounds" in the rule referred to some defect in the suit, which had the effect of shutting out a fair trial on the merits, and arose out of some error made in good faith by the plaintiff, or by the Court at the instance of either party, which could only be effectively set right by a trial de novo. In A I R 1917 Nag 121[2] the same view is expressed.

In the case before me there was no defect which shut out a fair trial. What had happened was that, by being able to sell the materials, which the plaintiff had purchased from the defendant, at a satisfactory figure, he thereby no longer suffered any damage, and his whole cause of action had vanished. There was therefore no need to reserve any right to bring a fresh action. The request seems to have been made to the Court out of excess of caution, the plaintiff being afraid that he might not be able to meet the direct issue which would arise on the defendant's claim for Rupees 373, that direct issue being whether the plaintiff had or had not paid the money, and he hoped to be able to avoid payment, if it was found that he had not paid, by some of the pleas which he had put forward in this case. That is not, to my mind, the purpose of O. 23, R. 1 (2). Consequently the order of the lower Court reserving permission to the plaintiff to bring a fresh suit is illegal and must be set aside. The plaintiff's suit will be withdrawn without permission to bring a fresh action.

(ii). This is a very curious point in respect of which I am unable to find any parallel. On the disappearance of the plaintiff's claim the defendant's counter-claim is left high and dry and is of a kind triable by a Court of Small Causes. Is the defendant to take back his claim and place it before the Small Cause Court or should the matter be concluded by the Court in which the question was first ventilated? In 56 ALL 912[4] at p. 920 Niamat-ullah J. felt some difficulty in holding that the defendant's claim to a set-off came within the purview of O. 8, R. 6. Bennet J., the other member of the Bench, felt no such difficulty. The difficulty which Niamat-ullah J. felt has been expressed by him in the following passage :

> It is clear that defendants 1 to 3 intended to make a counter-claim against the plaintiff for Rs. 212-12-0 and paid a court-fee of Rs. 16-8-0. For all practical purposes para. 17 of their written statement might well have been considered to be a plaint; and as the plaintiff did not deny that that sum was due to the firm Bachu Lal Lalta Prasad, a decree in favour of defendants 1 to 3 could have been passed but for the difficulty that the defendants' claim in its nature is one cognizable by the Court of Small Causes, and the Additional District Judge, before whom the suit was pending had no jurisdiction to pass a decree in a suit cognizable by a Court of Small Causes.

The learned Judge however did not desire to differ from the opinion of Bennet J., since he considered that the latter's view led to substantial justice between the parties, and for that reason he did not record his dissent on the ground mentioned. If that ground of dissent is correct, then it decides the point, which I am now considering, in favour of the non-applicant. 9 C W N 748[5] was a case of a genuine set-off and not a case of a counter-claim, and although the amount claimed by the defendant was triable by the Small Cause Court, the High Court allowed the matter to be agitated in the regular Court as it was a set-off. It seems to me that I can arrive at an adequate decision by reconciling these two decisions and by holding that in the case of a genuine set-off, such as is contemplated by O. 8, R. 6, if the plaintiff's claim breaks down for any reason including a withdrawal, as in the present case, then the defendant would be entitled to have his set-off considered by the same Court, and he could be given a decree for a set-off in the same suit, but where his claim is not a genuine set-off but is a counter-claim, as it is in the present case, then, if that counter-claim lies in the Small Cause Court he cannot agitate it in the regular Court. The lower Court should really never have allowed the defence to be raised because it was a counter-claim and not a set-off and was not cognizable by it. That being so, the Court was right in returning the written statement for presentation to the proper Court. On this point therefore the application fails. The parties, having partly succeeded and partly failed, will pay their own costs of this application.

Civil Revn. No. 62 of 1940, Decided on 21st November 1940, from decree of Sub-Judge, 2nd Class, Kelapur, D/- 22nd November 1939.

(a) Trust—Tripartite agreement among debtor and his two creditors A and B — Agreement providing that A should reduce his claim, that debtor should transfer his immovable property to B in full satisfaction of B's claim and that B should pay A's claim on behalf of debtor—This does not constitute trust in favour of A.

It is essential in every trust which is not wholly unilateral that there should be a confidence reposed. Secondly, in every trust the beneficiary is clothed with title to the property—not indeed a legal title because that resides in the trustee—but an equitable one. Thirdly no trustee can use trust property for his own benefit. He is bound to hold for the benefit of the beneficiary and is liable to account to him for it. [P 262 C 2 ; P 263 C 1]

Where in accordance with a tripartite agreement among a debtor and his two creditors A and B it is agreed that A should reduce his claim, that the debtor should transfer his immovable property to B in full satisfaction of B's claim and that B should pay A on behalf of the debtor, there is no trust in favour of A. [P 263 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 115 — Rule that High Court should not exercise its discretionary powers in revision when lower Court has done substantial justice, when applies stated.

It is true that High Court ought not to exercise its discretionary powers in revision when lower Court has done substantial justice. But the substantial justice referred to in such rule relates to rights to which a party has a legal as opposed to a purely moral claim. The rule applies when owing to some technical rule of procedure or to some stupid blundering the claim is likely to fail whereas had the proper rule or remedy been applied it would have succeeded. It does not refer to cases where whatever the plaintiff had done his claim could not in any event have succeeded. If a plaintiff's suit is barred by time on the date on which it is instituted there is nothing that he can do to remedy the defect and consequently the rule referred to is not attracted. Order.—The plaintiff had a money decree for Rs. 201-8-6 outstanding against defendant 2. Defendant 1 also had a claim for Rs. 1000 against defendant 2. Defendant 2 went to the Debt Conciliation Board and the following agreement was reached. In the first place the plaintiff agreed to scale down his demands to Rs. 175 and agreed to recover this sum in two instalments. Defendant 1 for his part agreed to reduce his claim to Rs. 600. It was also agreed that defendant 2 should transfer to the first a part of her immovable property in full satisfaction of this Rs. 600. The third term in this tripartite agreement is the one which concerns us here. It is recorded by the Debt Conciliation Board in the following terms and is to be found in Ex. P-2 :

Mohmad Husain (defendant 1) undertakes to pay these instalments for the debtor and to execute an agreement to that effect in her favour.

The instalments were fixed at Rs. 75 payable on 15th March 1935, and Rs. 100 payable on 15th March 1936. The first instalment appears to have been paid and apparently Rs. 25 was paid on the second. At any rate, the plaintiff admits that he has received Rs. 100 and confines his suit to the balance Rs. 75. He has joined both defendants 1 and 2 to the action but has only asked for a decree against defendant 1 in the first instance because under the agreement referred to above defendant 1 had agreed to pay the debt of defendant 2 and the plaintiff had agreed to look to him. A decree has been passed accordingly and defendant 1 applies in revision. The defence to the action is limitation. The agreement referred to above was reached on 3rd January 1935, that being the date of the order sheet Ex. P-2, in which it was recorded. Under it the second kist for which the suit is brought was payable on 15th March 1936. The suit was not filed till 20th March 1939 and consequently defendant 1 urges that the claim is beyond time. In the plaint the cause of action has been given as 15th March 1936, and no explanation has been offered to show how the claim is within time. The defence of limitation was taken and no attempt was made to amend the plaint. In argument before me, the plaintiff relies on the registered agreement, Ex. P-1. But defendant 1 was not a party to this. The document is between the plaintiff and defendant 2. Consequently in so far as the suit is grounded on contract, Ex. P-1 is no use whatever against defendant 1. The contract with him is not in this document but is the oral agreement entered into before the Board the terms of which the Chairman has recorded in the order sheet Ex. P-2.

But the learned counsel for the plaintiff urges that his suit is not founded in contract but in trust. He argues that the plaintiff is a stranger to the consideration and so there can be no contract between the plaintiff and defendant 1. Under the transaction before the Board defendant 1 received property from the second on the understanding that he would do something for the benefit of the plaintiff, namely pay him the money which defendant 2 owed him. This the learned counsel states constitutes a trust which the plaintiff who is the beneficiary can enforce so long as defendant 1 retains possession of the property, and he refers me to Iyer's Law of Contracts, Edn. 3, p. 618. I am clear that the rule to which Iyer refers has no application here. The plaintiff was not a stranger to the contract nor was he a stranger to the consideration. He was a party to the contract and, as is the case in every other composition which creditors make with their debtors received consideration under it. When the transaction is carefully analysed, it will be found that the consideration, which the plaintiff received for his promise to abandon part of his claim and to release defendant 2 provided the first paid, was the promise of defendant 1 likewise to abandon a part of his claim and to pay the plaintiff in place of defendant 2. The whole constituted a valid and binding contract between the plaintiff and defendant 1 and can be enforced by the former. The cases referred to by Iyer are cases in which the person suing is not a party to the contract at all and in which no consideration moves from him. In such cases he can only sue if there is a trust under which he is the beneficiary. It is sometimes difficult to distinguish a trust from a contract because the law of trusts and the law of contracts overlap in places and because, as Maitland points out at p. 54 of his book on Equity, it is > impossible so to define a contract that the definition shall not cover at least three quarters of all the trusts that are created.

But various tests serve to separate the two. In the first place it is essential in every trust which is not wholly unilateral that there should be a confidence reposed. In a hard business deal though each party may trust the other to carry out his part of the bargain neither reposes confidence in the other in the sense in which the term is used in the law of trusts. To put it in another way there is always a fiduciary relationship between trustee and beneficiary, but none between creditor and debtor as such. The following examples culled from the American Law Institutes Volume on Trusts, p. 41, S. 12 under the heading "A debt is not a trust" will illustrate the difference. (1) A transfers to B a bond to hold in trust for C. That creates a trust which gives C an interest in the bond and entitles him to sue should B act to his (C's) detriment. (2) A transfers to B a bond, and in consideration of the transfer B agrees to pay Rs. 1000 to C. There is no trust. C obtains no interest in the bond and has no right of action in respect of it. This latter illustration is almost exactly the case here with the exception that in place of the bond immovable property was transferred and instead of C being outside this transaction he was a party to the consideration. And that brings me to a second test; in every trust the beneficiary is clothed with title to the property not indeed a legal title because that resides in the trustee, but an equitable one. He is possessed of what in England is called the equitable estate. This is to be gathered from Salmond's Jurisprudence, Edn. 7, p. 286, from which the following passage is quoted by Aiyar in his Commentaries on the Indian Trusts Act at p. 16:

> A trust is more than obligation to use one's property for the benefit of another; it is an obligation to use it for the benefit of another in whom it is concurrently vested. The beneficiary has more than a mere personal right against his trustee to the performance of the obligations of the trust. He is himself an owner of the trust property.

Following this up we find from S. 56, Trusts Act, that where there is only one beneficiary and he is competent to contract, or where there are several beneficiaries and they are competent to contract and all of one mind, he or they may require the trustee to transfer the trust property to him or them, or to such person as he or they may direct.

It would be idle to contend in the present case that the tripartite agreement which we are considering gave the plaintiff-applicant any interest in the property transferred and still less that it gave him a right to compel defendant 1 to transfer the property to him. That brings me to a third test. No trustee can use trust property for his own benefit. He is bound to hold for the benefit of the beneficiary and is liable to account to him for it. It can hardly be contended here that, so far as the property is concerned, there was not a sale out and out to defendant 1. It can scarcely be pretended that he was not the sole owner of it and that he could not for example sell or mortgage it for his own benefit. Still another test is this. Lewin in his Law of Trusts and Maitland in his Equity both quote a definition of trust which is to be found in Coke on Littleton. It is as follows:

A confidence reposed in some other, not issuing out of land, but as a thing collateral, annexed in privity to the estate of the land, and to the person touching the land, for which cestui que trust has no remedy but by subpoena in Chancery.

This definition is not wholly accurate as Maitland points out and as is also shown by the American Law Institute, but it serves to bring out a general broad distinction. In the ordinary way equity merely supplemented the law and would not intervene where a remedy lay at law. Therefore, if an obligation could be effectively enforced contractually or as a debt by the common law Courts equity would not intervene. There can be no doubt here that whatever else this agreement constituted, it brought into existence a valid and binding contract enforceable as such. That being so, there is no trust. It was then argued that even if the lower Court is wrong in its law, as the defence is a technical one raised to defeat a just claim, this Court ought not to exercise its discretionary powers in revision in the applicant's favour. The lower Court has done substantial justice and so its decision should stand. I was referred to a decision of Clarke J. in Civil Revision No. 862 of 1939 where he applied this rule following certain Allahabad and Lucknow decisions. I do not doubt the soundness of the rule but it has to be applied with care. The substantial justice referred to there relates to rights to which a party has a legal as opposed to a purely moral claim. The rule applies when owing to some technical rule of procedure or to some stupid blundering the claim is likely to fail whereas had the proper rule or remedy been applied, it would have succeeded. It does not refer to cases where whatever the plaintiff had done his claim could not in any event have succeeded. If a plaintiff's suit is barred by time on the date on which it is instituted there is nothing that he can do to remedy the defect and consequently the rule referred to is not attracted.

The application is allowed. The decree of the lower Court is set aside and the plaintiff's claim is dismissed against both defendants with costs here and in the lower Court. Counsel's fee Rs. 10. The reason for dismissing the claim against defendant 2 as well is that under the agreement on which the suit is founded defendant 2's debt was completely extinguished. The plaintiff for good consideration undertook to release defendant 2 from her obligation and agreed to look wholly to defendant 1. This operated as a complete extinguishment of defendant 2's liability. Defendant 1 was not here a mere surety who guaranteed performance by defendant 2. He took upon himself the complete burden of the debt. Consequently there was nothing left over on which the plaintiff could proceed against defendant 2.

Order. — This application for revision is the outcome of a suit for accounts of a dissolved partnership. The parties consist of three groups : A the plaintiff, B the defendants 1 to 3, of whom defendant 1 has died since the suit was brought, defendants 2 and 3 being parties to this revision application, and C defendant 4. Group B were the active partners while groups A and C were sleeping partners who provided only the capital of the partnership business. The suit was instituted in August 1935 and proceeded in the ordinary way until a preliminary decree was passed in March 1937. The preliminary decree declared the share of the parties, the date of the dissolution of the partnership and ordered accounts to be taken of the partnership business. A commissioner was appointed to make the accounts. He worked as commissioner until 18th January 1938, when the parties all agreed to appoint him arbitrator and applied to the Court to that effect. The Court accordingly acceded to their request and appointed the commissioner arbitrator and referred to him the following matter to be decided :

> What amount each of the parties has to pay on account of his share in losses or what amount each of the parties has to receive on account of his share in the profits of the partnership business, keeping in mind the directions given in the preliminary decree dated 25th March 1937 ?

The Court also permitted him to make use of the proceedings before him as commissioner. The arbitrator submitted his award on 17th March 1938 by which he directed that group A should receive Rs. 2794-4-3 from group C and Rs. 1399-9-3 from group B. The Court gave the requisite time to the parties to submit their objections, if any, to the award. No objections were submitted by groups A or B but group C, that is to say defendant 4, raised certain objections. Now it so happened that, apart from partnership dealings, there had also been private dealings between the parties. Certain payments made by group B to groups A and C were appropriated towards the private dealings, while other payments were appropriated towards the partnership dealings. The arbitrator therefore considered it impossible to make a just and equitable settlement of accounts as regards the partnership dealings unless he knew whether the payments appropriated towards the private dealings had been properly appropriated. He therefore looked into the private accounts of groups A and C and on finding therein that certain items had not been properly appropriated he debited them to the partnership account, thereby increasing the amount which defendant 4 had to pay to the plaintiff. The objection therefore which defendant 4 raised before the lower Court was against the deduction of some of these items. He alleged that the arbitrator by going into these private accounts, when his instructions were to look into the partnership accounts only, had exceeded his powers under the order of reference and had thereby been guilty of misconduct, and therefore the award was invalid and should be superseded. The lower Court has agreed with these observations of defendant 4 and has superseded the award. Against that order both groups A and B have made separate revision applications. This order, besides dealing with the application of group B—defendants 2 and 3—will also dispose of the plaintiff's application, Civil Revision No. 170 of 1939. According to the applicants in both applications the Court had no jurisdiction to supersede the award of the arbitrator on such grounds since the arbitrator had not exceeded his authority but was required to look into the private account of the parties, otherwise he could not have come to a just and proper finding as to the state of the partnership accounts. Defendant 4 supports the order of the lower Court on the merits and also contends that the order is not revisable under S. 115, Civil P. C. The first question therefore which requires to be considered is whether the order superseding the award is open to revision or not.

One of the grounds put forward is that it is not revisable because it is appealable. It is said that the award was an agreed settlement between the parties and falls under O. 23, R. 3, Civil Procedure Code, and is therefore appealable under O. 43, R. 1 (m). Whatever may be the views of the other High Courts on this question, the view of this Court is settled by the Full Bench decision in I L R (1939) Nag 250[1] which holds that an award in arbitration cannot be recorded as an adjustment by compromise under O. 23, R. 3. It is true that that was a case of arbitration without the permission of the Court, but if that is the law in a case of arbitration without the permission of the Court, it is the law a fortiori in an arbitration with the permission of the Court. Hence the revisability of the lower Court's order is not taken away by its being appealable since it is not appealable.

It is however contended much more strenuously that the order is not revisable because it is not a 'case' within the mean-the parties entered into a contract under which disputes between them were to be referred to arbitration. The disputes arose were referred to the arbitrator who made an award. The appellants before their Lordships contended that the award was ultra vires and corrupt. One of their complaints was that the arbitrator had exceeded his instructions. The lower Court set aside the award. Their Lordships held that the arbitrator had not exceeded his jurisdiction and that the award could not be attacked. At p. 45, Lord Watson observed :

> I think I state the law correctly when I say that it will be a good ground of reduction at the instance of either party, if he is able to show independently of the Regulation either that the arbiter has exceeded what are called in Scotland the fines compromissi, or that in the course of the arbitration he has disregarded any one of the express conditions contained in the contract of submission, or any one of those important conditions which the law implies in every submission . . . And so in those cases where an act innocently committed by the arbiter amounts to misconduct which in the opinion of the Court, would naturally imply that justice had not been done between the parties, the award must be set aside.

These observations, so far as they go, are against the applicants who have cited this case, but it actually does not serve as any guide to the interpretation of S. 115, Civil P. C., which is the section that I am required to interpret. In 1901 their Lordships of the Privy Council had before them the case in 29 Cal 167[23] at a time when the present Civil Procedure Code was not in force but the Code of 1882 was in force. Their Lordships observed at p. 183 that > the time has long gone by since the Courts of this country shewed any disposition to sit as a Court of appeal on awards in respect of matters of fact or in respect of matters of law, and they referred to (1891) A C 31.[10] In that case the Court had pronounced a decree in accordance with the award of the arbitrators which appeared on its face to be a fair and reasonable settlement of the matters in dispute. Their Lordships agreed with the finding of the Chief Court of the Punjab that no appeal lay from the decree and observed that :

> In the case of an award revision would be more objectionable than an appeal. If an application in revision were admissible in a case like the present the finality of any award would be open to question.

Their Lordships then went on to criticise the action of the Chief Court in interfering with the decree which the lower Court had pronounced in accordance with the award, 23. ('02) 29 Cal 167 : 29 I A 51 : 6 C W N 226 : 8 Sar 154 (P C), Ghulam Khan v. Muhammad Hassan.

observing that even if the arbitrators had erred in law or in fact the award was not thereby vitiated, and therefore the Subordinate Judge by pronouncing a decree in accordance with it had not exceeded his jurisdiction, and therefore the Chief Court had no jurisdiction to interfere with the decree under the section of the old Code corresponding to S. 115 of the present Civil P. C. Thus, their Lordships there held that the High Court had no jurisdiction under S. 115 to interfere in revision with a decree passed by the lower Court in accordance with an award of arbitrators even if the arbitrators were wrong in deciding any points of law or fact.

The question before me is whether the High Court can interfere in revision with an order of the lower Court which supersedes an award of the arbitrators by holding that the arbitrators had exceeded their jurisdiction. 29 Cal 167[23] is not therefore a direct authority on this point, although the observations of their Lordships which I have quoted would be equally applicable to either case.

26 Bom 551[2] held that, where an award on a reference to arbitration in the course of a suit is superseded on the ground of the arbitrator's misconduct, the order superseding the award is not subject to revision. It is an interlocutory order and may be a ground of appeal against the decree passed in the suit. The Court has there followed a Full Bench ruling of the Allahabad High Court reported in 5 ALL 293[24] to the same effect. If the arbitrator in the present case has exceeded his jurisdiction that would amount to misconduct on his part and therefore if 5 ALL 293[24] and 26 Bom 551[2] are good law, no revision would lie in the case before me. 30 Cal 397[3] is a Full Bench decision of the Calcutta High Court to the same effect. 43 ALL 305[11] supports the applicants that the High Court can interfere in revision. The facts of that case were most exceptional because the lower Court had superseded the award of the arbitrators on a totally inadequate ground. As the learned Judges say, the decision of the Subordinate Judge was clearly indefensible. The ground upon which he had interfered was no ground at all for questioning either the arbitration proceedings or the award. The High Court held accordingly that in the circumstances the lower Court had no jurisdiction to reverse the order of reference, which it had in substance done, and in superseding the order it had acted with material irregularity and so its order was liable to revision. The learned Judges are also careful to point out that their decision is not to be taken as departing in any way from the principle of inviolability which attaches to decisions, either upholding or rejecting objections under Para. 15 of Sch. 2, Civil P. C., when they are in fact decisions upon real objections of invalidity to the arbitration proceedings and award. In the case before me the objections are real objections to the invalidity of the award and so 43 ALL 305[11] is distinguishable.

47 Bom 721[4] follows 26 Bom 551[2] and is against the applicants. In 46 ALL 686,[12] the lower Court had pronounced a decree in accordance with the award and had refused to set it aside. The High Court observed that there are only two ways of getting rid of an award, one by getting it set aside under paras. 15 and 16 of Sch. 2 or by a revision application, where the lower Court had committed a material irregularity in the course of the proceedings before him to decide whether or not the award was objectionable. In the present case the lower Court has not committed any such material irregularity in the proceedings before it. The learned Judge had jurisdiction to decide whether the arbitrator had been guilty of misconduct or not and he has held that he was. Even therefore if the lower Court is wrong in so holding, the error has not been brought about by any material irregularity in the proceedings and therefore even according to the Allahabad decision no revision would lie.

47 ALL 121[6] and 47 ALL 916[6] both support the non-applicant that no revision lies. 48 ALL 239[15] also supports the non-applicant because it holds that although a revision may lie in certain circumstances it does not lie where, as here, objections are raised as to the proceedings before the arbitrator and they are the subject of a decision by the trial Court. In such a case it cannot be said that there has been any irregularity committed by the Court in the exercise of its jurisdiction. A I R 1928 Lah 550[13] is a case where the Court accepted the award and not one in which it set it aside. Moreover, it is a single Judge decision and only one Punjab case not officially reported was cited by the learned Judge in support of the proposition that no revision lay. AIR 1929 Lah 369[14] was a case in which the same Judge held that as the error was in the Court referring the case to arbitration without a properly constituted agreement to refer, all the arbitration proceedings in such reference were invalid. That case can, therefore, be easily distinguished, and moreover, it has been overruled by the Lahore High Court in 14 Lah 715[9] which I shall discuss below. 51 ALL 1010[16] is a case in which the arbitration proceedings were superseded before the delivery of the award by the arbitrators. It is, therefore, no guide. 53 ALL 1006[7] supports the non-applicant and follows 47 ALL 121,[5] 47 ALL 916[6] and 5 ALL 293.[24] One of the learned Judges who decided 53 ALL 1006[7] was a party to the decision in 51 ALL 1010.[16] He tried to distinguish the two cases but felt some difficulty in doing so. Nevertheless, in view of the direct application of three cases just referred to —5 ALL 293,[24] 47 ALL 121[5] and 47 ALL 916[6]— he held that no revision lay against an order superseding an award. So, if the case of a supersession before award cannot be distinguished from a supersession after award, then the authority of 51 ALL 1010[16] is considerably shaken by 53 ALL 1006.[7]

A I R 1932 Bom 232[8] takes the same view as the earlier decision in 26 Bom 551[2] which supports the non-applicant. 14 Lah 715[9] holds that no revision lies where the Court refused to supersede an award. The learned Judges observed that there is no difference between a case in which an award is set aside and where the Court refused to set it aside; both are interlocutory orders, and in neither case has the suit concluded and in both cases further action is necessary. 57 ALL 459[17] relates to the amendment of a plaint and not to arbitration proceedings. The remarks of the learned Judge there are obiter as far as arbitration cases are concerned. There it is said :

> I am of opinion that an interlocutory order which terminates a proceeding started by an application should be considered to be the "decision" of a "case" within the meaning of S. 115, provided such proceeding is so far distinct from the suit itself that it can be separated from it as a collateral matter . . . . . I would, therefore, consider each case on its own merits and find whether the rule accepted in the later Full Bench cases is applicable to it. In my opinion the Court should err in doubtful cases on the side of entertaining a revision rather than refusing to do so, if it is found that the subordinate Court exercised a jurisdiction not possessed by it or failed to exercise its jurisdiction, or acted illegally or with material irregularity in the exercise of it.

In I L R (1937) ALL 317[21] a Full Bench distinguishes between cases in which the error is in the proceedings before the arbitrator and those in which it is in the proceedings before the Court. In the former case it holds that a revision does not lie while in the latter revision lies. This case crystallises the final view of the Allahabad High Court on this vexed question. At p. 323 the learned Chief Justice observes :

> It seems to me that there is a clear distinction between the proceedings before an arbitrator and the proceedings in the Court itself, whether before the reference is made to the arbitrator or after the receipt of his award. So far as the proceedings before the arbitrator are concerned, they can be taken exception to by way of objections to the award when it is delivered and the trial Court has exclusive authority to consider such objections and to dispose of them finally. Whether it decides them in favour of the objector or against him, the matter cannot be reopened in the appellate or revisional Court because at the very most the trial Court has erred on a point of law in deciding the objection in the way it has done. But so far as the proceedings before the Court itself are concerned, that Court cannot be made the sole judge of the propriety of its own proceedings. It should not have the final word on the question whether it has acted without jurisdiction or with illegality or material irregularity in the exercise of such jurisdiction. In such a case therefore, even if the proceedings have terminated in a decree in terms of an award and even though no appeal lies from such a decree, it is open to the High Court to interfere in revision and set aside the orders which have been passed by the Court itself, provided they are vitiated either by want of jurisdiction or illegality or irregularity in the exercise of jurisdiction.

At p. 327 he observes :

> When the reference itself is challenged on the ground of its initial invalidity the attack is directed not against the award itself but against the procedure adopted by the Court in its exercise of jurisdiction. There is ample authority in this Court in support of the view that the revisional powers exist.

In the case before me the error, if error there be, is one on the part of the arbitrator, the only error of the Court, if there is an error, being on a point of law in deciding the objection in the way it has done. This ruling also supports the non-applicant. In A I R 1940 Oudh 405[22] the facts were very peculiar. There were two awards. After the arbitrator had given an award the Court remitted it for reconsideration on a ground which the High Court considered improper and the arbitrator then gave a modified award. The High Court held that the Court in remitting the award to the arbitrator had exceeded its jurisdiction and therefore it interfered. The case thus falls within the second class of cases referred to in I L R (1937) ALL 317[21] above and is therefore distinguishable from the case before me. In 16 Pat 742[20] the point was raised as to whether the High Court had jurisdiction under S. 115, Civil P. C., to interfere with the order of a Subordinate Judge ordering an award of arbitrators to be filed, but the Court did not discuss the question because the case could be decided on an entirely different ground and accordingly the case was decided on a different ground. Finally I have been referred to I L R (1936) Nag 44[19] as being a case in which Pollock J. had interfered in revision with an order superseding an arbitration award. That however was a case in which the trial Court accepted the award and on appeal the District Judge came to the conclusion that the arbitrators had exceeded their jurisdiction and set aside the award. It was not the order of the trial Court which was being revised but the order of the District Judge. Although Pollock J. has at some length gone into the merits and into the case law on the subject of superseding awards, with all respect, I am of opinion that that case could have been decided on the simple ground that whereas para. 16 (2) of Sch. 2 bars an appeal except on certain grounds which did not exist in that case, the District Judge had proceeded to hear and decide an appeal and in appeal had set aside the lower Court's order. Therefore the District Judge's order was clearly without jurisdiction and the High Court must interfere.

Accordingly on a review of the above authorities it appears to me to be clear that there is a marked preponderance of judicial opinion in favour of the view that no revision lies. That being so, it is not necessary to go into the merits of these applications. They are both dismissed with costs. Counsel's fee Rs. 50. I allow only one set of counsel's fees.

Civil Revn. Appln. No. 93 of 1940, Decided on 10th February 1941, to revise order of Sub-Judge, First Class, Raipur, D/- 20th December 1939.

(a) C. P. and Berar Relief of Indebtedness Act (14 of 1939), Ss. 20 and 23—Ss. 20 and 23 totally bar jurisdiction of civil Court in respect of any matter pending before Debt Relief Court —Notice under S. 6 (3) of Act issued—Civil Court staying proceedings—No revision lies to High Court from stay order.

The C. P. and Berar Debt Relief Act provides a complete code of appeal for any person aggrieved by an order of the Debt Relief Court. Ss. 20 and 23 bar the jurisdiction of the civil Court in respect of any matter pending before the Debt Relief Court. Consequently it is not open to a party to avoid the aforesaid provisions by applying for revision to the High Court against the civil Court's order staying the proceedings before it in obedience to the notice issued by the Debt Relief Court under S. 6 (3) of the Act : ('40) 27 A I R 1940 P C 105, Rel. on; 1940 N L J 562, Expl.; ('37) 24 A I R 1937 Nag 259 and ('38) 25 A I R 1938 Nag 373, Disting.

(b) C. P. and Berar Relief of Indebtedness Act (14 of 1939), S. 6 (3) — Mortgage — Preliminary decree passed against mortgagor and his transferees—Pending application for final decree transferees applying to Debt Relief Court — Mortgage being one and indivisible, proceedings for final decree must be stayed for both mortgagor and transferees or for none.

Where preliminary mortgage decree is passed against the mortgagor and his transferees and pending the application for making the decree final the transferees alone apply to the Debt Relief Court, the mortgage being one and indivisible, the proceedings for final decree must be stayed under S. 6 (3) for both the mortgagor and the transferees or for none. [P 271 C 1]

J. Sen, A. V. Khare and W. B. Pendharkar — for Applicants.

R. G. Rau — for Non-applicants 4 to 7.

Order.—The applicants obtained a preliminary decree for foreclosure of a mortgage against the seven non-applicants on 28th August 1936. The first three non-applicants are the sons of the mortgagor while the last four non-applicants are subsequent transferees of a part of the mortgaged property. During the pendency of proceedings to make the preliminary decree absolute the last four non-applicants made a joint application to the Debt Relief Court under S. 6 (1), Central Provinces and Berar Relief of Indebtedness Act (14 of 1939), praying for the determination of this debt which they owed to the applicants. Thereupon the Debt Relief Court under S. 6 (3) of the Act, after admitting the application, issued a notice to the civil Court, which in obedience thereto stayed the proceedings for making the foreclosure decree absolute. Against this order staying the proceedings the applicants have come in revision.

The main contention on the part of the applicants is that the Debt Relief Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the application of non-applicants 4 to 7 since they were not persons entitled to present such an application and therefore the civil Court should have refused to stay proceedings and that even if the Court was right in staying proceedings as far as those non-applicants were concerned who applied to the Debt Relief Court, it could not stay them in respect of the first three non-applicants who had made no such application. On behalf of the applicants, Mr. Sen advanced several arguments to show that the Debt Relief Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the application under S. 6. In the first place, it is said that they are not debtors because the mortgage being by conditional sale the mortgagors were under no personal liability to pay the mortgage money, much less were the subsequent transferees under any such obligation. Secondly, non-applicants 4 to 7 were not debtors because they had not incurred any debt to the mortgagee; all that they had done was to purchase part of the mortgaged property. So far from owing money and being unable to pay their debts they had been able to find ready money to purchase this property. Thirdly a joint application to the Debt Relief Court by transferees who had taken separate transfers was not tenable under the Central Provinces and Berar Relief of Indebtedness Act, and fourthly that under S. 4 (j) of the Act this transaction did not come under the Act at all.

In my view, it is not necessary to go into these questions here. The proper forum for agitating them is the Debt Relief Court before which the present applicants will be necessary parties. I agree with the non-applicants that a revision application on the part of the applicants in the present circumstances is untenable. The terms of Ss. 20 and 23, Central Provinces and Berar Relief of Indebtedness Act, are very clear and bar the jurisdiction of the civil Court. I have been referred to certain rulings of this Court under the old Debt Conciliation Act in which it was held that a revision application could be entertained in certain circumstances, but the provisions of the Relief of Indebtedness Act are not by any means the same as those of the Debt Conciliation Act and rulings therefore which were given under the old Act do not necessarily apply to the Relief of Indebtedness Act. Such rulings are : A I R 1938 Nag 373,[1] 1940 N L J 562[2] and I L R (1938) Nag 489.[3] A I R 1938 Nag 373[1] was a case in which a Debt Conciliation Board had discharged a decree-holder's debt in consequence of his default in submitting a statement when the debtor had no right to present any petition to the Board not being an agriculturist. Niyogi J. held that in such cases the civil Court had power to enquire into the question whether a special tribunal created for a specific purpose had acted within the limits of the enactment which created it. Apart from the question of the different wording of the two Acts, that was a case in which a Board had passed a final order, and, unless the civil Court could intervene in a case where the Board flagrantly exceeded its powers, the aggrieved party would have been left without any remedy. In the case before me the special tribunal has still to decide whether the non-applicants are entitled to put in motion the powers allowed to such tribunals by the Act, and furthermore a right of appeal to the District Court is provided if the decision of the Board goes against the applicants. 1940 N L J 562,[2] which is a decision to which I was myself a party, was a case in which the application to the Board was made before the addition of S. 7-A to the Debt Conciliation Act and we observed at page 564 :

> After the passing of S. 7-A in respect of applications made after S. 7-A was passed the civil Court cannot go into the question of jurisdiction but as regards applications pending when S. 7-A was passed it can.

That ruling is therefore authority for holding that even under the old Debt Conciliation Act after the passing of S. 7-A the civil Court could not have entertained a question of jurisdiction. I L R (1938) Nag 489[3] was a case in which the facts were somewhat similar to A I R 1938 Nag 373.[1] The decision is based on S. 16, Debt Conciliation Act, which as I shall presently point out, is materially different from the similar provisions in the Relief of Indebtedness Act. There, this Court found some difficulty in understanding what was meant by a suit in respect of "any matter pending before a Board" such as is envisaged by S. 16 (a) (i), Debt Conciliation Act. That decision was also based on the Act as it stood before S. 7-A was inserted in it and in the last sentence of the ruling the Court observed that their decision would not apply if S. 7-A had been in force. Accordingly, it remains to examine S. 7-A and S. 16, Debt Conciliation Act and compare them with Ss. 20 and 23, Central Provinces and Berar Relief of Indebtedness Act. Before the passing of S. 7-A the only section which governed the jurisdiction of the civil Court was S. 16 which provided that :

3. ('37) 24 AIR 1937 Nag 259 : 170 I C 905 : ILR (1938) Nag 489, Shivdin v. Ramratan.

No civil Court shall entertain—

(a) any suit in respect of—(i) any matter pending before a Board, or (ii) the validity of any procedure or the legality of any agreement made under this Act, or (iii) the recovery of any debt recorded as wholly or partly payable under an agreement registered under sub-s. (2) of S. 12 from any person who, as a debtor, was party to such agreement, whether such agreement is subsisting or not, or (iv) the recovery of any debt which has been deemed to have been duly discharged under sub-s. (2) of S. 8, except a debt which is revived under the proviso to that sub-section;

(b) any application to execute a decree, the execution of which is suspended under sub-s. (3) of Section 15.

That is to say the jurisdiction of the civil Court was barred in respect of suits of four different kinds and in respect of applications for execution of a decree suspended under S. 15 (3), and as was pointed out in I L R (1938) Nag 489,[3] it was difficult to understand what was meant by suits of the first two kinds. After the enactment of S. 7-A the jurisdiction of the Board was not allowed to be questioned in any civil Court. Now, under the new Act, the matter is governed by Ss. 20 and 23. Section 20 lays down that any person aggrieved by an order of a Debt Relief Court may apply to the District Court for revision of the order on the grounds: (a) that it was contrary to law, (b) that the Debt Relief Court had exceeded its jurisdiction, and (c) as to the fairness of instalments fixed by the Court, and the section then goes on to provide that, subject to such orders as the District Court may pass thereon, such order shall be final and no application for revision shall lie against such order.

Section 23 provides that subject to the provisions of section 20 the jurisdiction of the civil Courts shall be barred in respect of "(a) any matter pending before a Debt Relief Court" and certain other matters with which I am not at present concerned. Reading these two sections together, it is difficult to understand how the jurisdiction of the civil Court could have been more effectively barred. Comparing S. 23 with the old S. 16, Debt Conciliation Act, whereas the old Act barred a civil suit in respect of a matter pending before a Board, the present Act bars the jurisdiction of the civil Court in respect of any matter pending before a Debt Relief Court. The new section is therefore very much wider than the old and the difficulty which this Court felt in understanding the meaning of S. 16 (a) (i) and (ii) of the old Act could not have been felt in respect of S. 23 (a) of the present Act. In I L R (1940) Mad 599,[4] their Lordships of the Judicial Committee were considering somewhat similar provisions in the Sea Customs Act (8 of 1878). At p. 614 they observe:

It is settled law that the exclusion of the jurisdiction of the civil Courts is not to be readily inferred, but that such exclusion must either be explicitly expressed or clearly implied. It is also settled that even if jurisdiction is so excluded, the civil Courts have jurisdiction to examine into cases where the provisions of the Act have not been complied with, or the statutory tribunal has not acted in conformity with the fundamental principles of judicial procedure.

They then point out that the provisions of the Act which they were considering provided a precise and self-contained code of appeal in regard to obligations created by the statute and they add:

It is difficult to conceive what further challenge of the order was intended to be excluded other than a challenge in the civil Courts; and they held therefore that the jurisdiction of the civil Courts was excluded. At p. 615 they went on to observe:

The determination of this question must rest on the terms of the particular statute which is under consideration, and decisions on other statutory provisions are not of material assistance, except in so far as general principles of construction are laid down.

Applying these general principles to the provisions of the Relief of Indebtedness Act I find that the terms are expressed even more strongly than in the Sea Customs Act so as to bar the jurisdiction of the civil Court. The Sea Customs Act has no provision similar to S. 20, Relief of Indebtedness Act, which after providing a right of application to a superior tribunal for revision of an order of the Court specifically bars an application for revision against the order of the superior Court. Accepting therefore the principles laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council it is clear that the present Act provides a complete code of appeal for any person aggrieved by an order of the Debt Relief Court and it is impossible for the present applicants to avoid that procedure by applying for revision against the order of the civil Court which has acted in obedience to directions received from the Debt Relief Court for which there is provision made in the Act. The correct procedure therefore for the applicants was to raise the questions that they have raised before me before the Debt Relief Court and, if that Court came to a conclusion adverse to them, to apply, under S. 20 of the District Court for redress of their grievance. They cannot omit that procedure and agitate the questions in the High Court in the guise of an application for revision of the civil Court's order, which is merely carrying out the directions of the Debt Relief Court to stay the proceedings.

As regards the contention of the applicants that even if the proceedings have to be stayed against those non-applicants who applied to the Debt Relief Court they should continue at any rate against the non-applicants who did not so apply. I need only point out, as was said before me by Mr. Sen on behalf of the applicants, that under Ss. 60 and 67, T. P. Act, a mortgage is one and indivisible, and it would not be feasible therefore and would lead to impossible situations if such a course as is suggested were to be adopted. The mortgage being one and indivisible the proceedings for making the decree final must be stayed for all the non-applicants or for none. Accordingly the application fails and is dismissed with costs. I allow Rs. 20 as counsel's fee.

Civil Revn. Appln. No. 111 of 1940, Decided on 22nd January 1941, for revision of decree of Sub-Judge, Second Class, Jalgaon, D/- 15th December 1939.

(a) Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (1887), Art. 13 — Suit on promissory note executed for dues in respect of interest in hereditary office is not barred by Art. 13.

Where the suit is a suit on a promissory note executed for dues payable to the plaintiff by reason of his interest in the hereditary office it is not barred by Art. 13 because the suit is not to recover the dues but to recover money on a negotiable instrument : 29 Cal 461 (PC) and 35 All 558, Disting.; ('28) 10 A I R 1923 All 420, Rel. on. [P 272 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 11 —Consent decree — Pleas settled by consent — Same pleas are res judicata in subsequent suit by successor-in-interest.

A party is estopped from raising the pleas which were raised in the former suit by his predecessor-in-interest and which were settled by consent: ('39) 26 AIR 1939 Pat 225, Expl., and Disting.; (1867) L R 1 H L Sc 117; (1895) 1 Ch D 37; 13 MIA 497 (PC) and 36 Bom 283, Rel. on; ('26) 13 AIR 1926 Cal 672, Expl., and Rel. on. [P 273 C 1]

(c) Promissory note — Interest —Promissory note mentioning rate of interest —Party cannot lead evidence to prove that rate of interest was different—Nor can he be given different interest by way of damages.

Where a promissory note is silent as to interest evidence is not admissible to prove a contemporary oral agreement to pay a certain rate of interest under s. 92. If that is the case where the document is silent as to the rate of interest, a fortiori evidence is not admissible in a case where the document mentions a rate of interest to prove that the rate was different from that mentioned in the document. Nor does the question of awarding interest by way of damages arise in such a case : ('20) 7 AIR 1920 Nag 131, Rel. on. [P 273 C 1]

W. B. Pendharkar — for Applicant.

A. L. Halwe — for Non-applicant.

Order. — The non-applicant-plaintiff brought this action in the Small Cause Court, Jalgaon, on a promissory note executed in his favour by the applicant-defendant on 27th May 1936 for Rs. 266. He has added to the principal sum of Rs. 266, Rs. 72 by way of interest and has, therefore, sued for a total sum of Rs. 338. The first contention raised by the applicant before me is one which he did not raise in the lower Court, namely as to the jurisdiction of the Small Cause Court to entertain this suit. He contends that the suit falls under Art. 13 of the schedule to the Small Cause Courts Act and is therefore excepted from the cognizance of a Small Cause Court. Article 13 excepts from the cognizance of such a Court a suit to enforce payment of the allowance or fees respectively called malikana and hakk or of cesses or other dues when the cesses or dues are payable to a person by reason of his interest in immovable property or in an hereditary office or in a shrine or other religious institution.

The promissory note (Ex. P-1) recites that the executor has to pay to the executee Rs. 266 "on account of rusum of Deshpandeship for the two years 1934-35 and 1935-36 at Rs. 133 per annum." Therefore, according to the applicant, this is a suit of the kind referred to in Art. 13. The non-applicant-plaintiff contends that whatever may be the origin of the consideration for the promissory note, the suit is a suit on a promissory note and is not a suit to recover dues payable to the plaintiff by reason of his interest in a hereditary office. The question, therefore, which I have to decide is whether I can go behind the promissory note and consider what was the nature of the consideration for it. In support of his argument that the Court can go behind the negotiable instrument itself and look into the nature of the consideration therefor the applicant relies on 29 Cal 461[1] and 35 ALL 558.[2] The former is a Privy Council case in which a suit had been brought on two promissory notes and it was urged that the consideration for these promissory notes was illegal, the transactions being the outcome of gambling transactions. Their Lordships found that the transactions were gambling transactions and void under S. 30, Contract Act, and they therefore dismissed the suit on those promissory notes. The latter case also was one of promissory notes being given for gambling transactions. The case was decided on the first proviso to S. 92, Evidence Act, but S. 92 has no application to the facts of the case before me. These cases are therefore easily distinguishable. I agree with the learned counsel for the non-applicant that in the circumstances of this case it is not barred by Article 13 because the suit is not to recover the dues but to recover money on a negotiable instrument. The case is similar to A I R 1923 ALL 420[3] in that it is a suit to recover a sum due under a contract entered into between the parties and is therefore of a small cause nature.

The next question is whether an earlier decision in Civil Suit No. 28 of 1882 between the predecessors of the present parties operates as res judicata in the present suit. This point arises in the following manner. The plaintiff's predecessor brought the said action in 1882 to recover 7 years' arrears of the same dues, amounting to Rs. 973 odd, from the predecessor of the defendant. The suit was compromised by the defendant paying Rs. 931 to the plaintiff in that case. The lower Court has held that that decision operates as res judicata as to the liability of the defendant to pay the said dues to the plaintiff. On behalf of the applicant it is contended that a consent decree cannot operate as res judicata against anyone except the parties who actually consented to the decree, and reliance is placed on A I R 1939 Pat 225,[4] but that case is not to the point at all; in that case the plaintiff's father had brought a suit along with certain other persons against one Hanuman Bux and others to recover possession of a village. The plaintiff's father died during the pendency of that suit and his heirs refused to join as plaintiffs. Consequently, they were joined as pro forma defendants. A decree followed with which Hanuman Bux was dissatisfied and appealed. In the appellate Court he compromised the dispute with the other contending parties. The plaintiff however was no party to that compromise. When therefore the plaintiff brought a subsequent suit challenging the validity of the compromise, the Court held that, as he had not been a party to the compromise, he was not bound by it. In that case the plaintiff was not the successor-in-interest of one of the parties who had agreed to the compromise, as are the parties to the case before me. That case therefore has no application to the question now raised.

In (1867) L R 1 H L Sc 117[5] the House of Lords entertained no doubt that a compromise decree would be as much binding on the actual parties to it and their privies in interest as if a judgment had been arrived at after the case had been fought out. In (1895) 1 Ch D 37[6] the Official Receiver who was the successor-in-interest of the South American & Mexican Co. was not allowed to reagitate a question which had been settled by a consent decree. In 13 M I A 497[7] it was held by the Privy Council that when a state of facts is accepted as the basis of a compromise whereby a suit pending decision is amicably adjusted and when the compromise is not vitiated by fraud, those who were parties to it and their privies should not afterwards be heard to say for the purpose of reviving the controversy that the real state of things was otherwise. The same view was expressed in 36 Bom 283.[8] In AIR 1926 Cal 672[9] it is true that a Division Bench of the High Court expressed the view that a consent decree did not come within the rule of res judicata but it held that a consent decree raised an estoppel as much as a decree passed in invitum and it held that the consent decree which was before it was binding as between the consenting parties and their successors in interest. That case therefore also supports the contention of non-applicant. The law on the subject can be said to be sufficiently clear that the applicant-defendant is estopped from raising the pleas which were raised in the former suit by his predecessor in interest and which were settled by consent. This plea which the applicant has sought to raise in this suit is that the plaintiff is not entitled to the emoluments of his office as moharir. It is because he raised this contention that he went on to plead that the promissory note in suit was without consideration. It follows therefore from the finding of the point of res judicata that the promissory note must be held to have been executed for consideration and to be valid.

The only other point made by the applicant in this case is as to the amount of interest to which the plaintiff is entitled. The promissory note (EX. P. 1) expressly provides for interest at the rate of one per cent. per annum. The lower Court has held that the rate there mentioned was a mistake, "per annum" being mentioned by mistake for "per mensem" and it held that there was an agreement to pay interest at one per cent. per month and that even if there was no agreement the plaintiff is entitled to interest by way of damages at the rate of ten per cent. per annum which he has charged in his statement of claim and this is the rate which has been allowed. In 16 N L R 68[10] it was held that where a promissory note is silent as to interest, evidence is not admissible to prove a contemporary oral agreement to pay a certain rate of interest under S. 92, Evidence Act. If that is the case where the document is silent as to the rate of interest a fortiori evidence is not admissible in a case where the document mentions a rate of interest to prove that the rate was different from that mentioned in the document. Section 79, Negotiable Instruments Act, provides that where interest at a specified rate is expressly made payable on a promissory note interest should be calculated at the rate specified. No question of awarding interest by way of damages therefore arose. Accordingly, the revision application fails except on the point of interest. The decree will be modified so as to allow the plaintiff interest at one per cent. per annum instead of ten per cent. Costs throughout will be proportionate. Counsel's fee Rs. 15.

District Council, Wardha through Dr. H. M. Hasan — Defendant — Applicant

Anna Daulatrao Kunbi — Plaintiff — Non-Applicant.

Civil Revn. No. 394 of 1940, Decided on 18th December 1940, to revise decree of the Sub-Judge, Second Class, Arvi, D/- 3rd May 1940.

(a) Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (1887), S. 25 — Lower Court's order doing substantial justice — High Court will not interfere in revision.

Where the lower Court's order has done substantial justice the High Court will not interfere in revision under S. 25 : 13 All 277 (F B); ('29) 16 A I R 1929 Nag 70; ('36) 23 A I R 1936 Oudh 247; ('38) 25 AIR 1938 Bom 223 and ('39) 26 AIR 1939 Oudh 141, Rel. on. [P 274 C 2]

(b) C. P. Local Self-Government Act (4 of 1920), S. 75 — Contract in breach of S. 75 is illegal.

Where the Legislature says that the breach of one of its provisions shall be deemed to be an offence under the Penal Code then that provision of law must be intended to protect the public and the breach is therefore impliedly prohibited and therefore illegal. Consequently a contract in breach of the provisions of S. 75 is illegal : 24 Bom 622; 26 Mad 156 and ('27) 14 A I R 1927 Lah 333, Disting. [P 275 C 2]

(c) C. P. Local Self-Government Act (4 of 1920), S. 75 — Construction — Word "respectively" should be read after words "with that Council, Board or Committee" — Member of Committee interested in contract with District Council — No offence is committed.

Section 75 should be read as though the word "respectively" were inserted after the words "with that Council, Board or Committee" in that section. Therefore S. 75 does not necessarily mean that if a member, officer or servant of a committee is interested in a contract with the District Council he shall be deemed to have committed an offence. [P 275 C 2; P 276 C 1]

(d) C. P. Local Self-Government Act (4 of 1920), S. 73 — S. 73 does not apply to actions based on breach of contract — District Council taking premises on lease for placing school therein — Suit by lessor for arrears of rent — S. 73 does not apply — Limitation for suit is governed by ordinary law.

Section 73 does not apply to actions based upon contracts entered into by the District Council. [P 276 C 1]

The District Council obtained a lease of certain premises for the purpose of placing a school therein. In the suit by the lessor for the recovery of arrears of rent :

Held that although the placing of a school in the lessor's premises was an act by the Council done under the Act but the suit being for the Council's failure to pay rent agreed upon by it with the lessor S. 73 did not apply and therefore notice under

S. 73 (1) was not necessary and the limitation for the suit was governed not by S. 73 (2) but by the ordinary law of limitation which provided three years : ('30) 17 A I R 1930 Nag 179, Foll.; 2 Mad 124, Expl.; ('33) 20 A I R 1933 Bom 164, Approved. [P 276 C 1]

(e) Pleadings — Amendment — Suit by plaintiff for arrears of rent of house leased — Defendant pleading lease to be void—Plaintiff seeking to base his claim under S. 65, Contract Act, by amending plaint — Amendment held did not introduce new case and could be allowed.

Where in his suit for recovery of rent of the house leased by him, the plaintiff applies to amend his plaint as soon as he knows of the defendant's plea that the agreement of lease is void and to base his claim under S. 65 the plaintiff is entitled to the amendment inasmuch as it does not introduce a new case : ('38) 25 A I R 1938 Nag 388, Disting.; ('28) 15 A I R 1928 Nag 27, Rel. on. [P 276 C 2]

(f) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 6, R. 17 — Amendment allowed subject to costs—Party accepting costs cannot challenge amendment unless he expressly reserved such right.

Where an amendment is allowed subject to the payment of costs to the other party, the party receiving the costs cannot challenge the amendment subsequently unless he has expressly reserved his right to do so while accepting the costs : ('34) 21 AIR 1934 Nag 163, Foll. [P 277 C 1]

(g) Contract Act (1872), S. 65 — Agreement void ab initio — S. 65 applies.

An agreement discovered to be void under S. 65 is one discovered to be not enforceable by law, and, on the language of the section, includes an agreement that was void in that sense from its inception, as distinct from a contract that becomes void : ('22) 9 A I R 1922 P C 403, Foll.; Case law relied on. [P 277 C 2]

(h) Interest — Court cannot allow interest merely because money due is withheld.

A Court has no power to award interest merely because money due is withheld and the plaintiff was unnecessarily delayed : ('29) 16 AIR 1929 Nag 170, Foll.; ('34) 21 AIR 1934 Nag 78; ('33) 20 AIR 1933 Pat 196 and ('30) 17 A I R 1930 Mad 727, Approved. [P 277 C 2]

(i) Contract Act (1872), S. 65 — Suit for compensation for use and occupation of house — Interest prior to suit cannot be allowed.

In the case of suit under S. 65 for compensation for use and occupation of a house, interest prior to the date of the suit cannot be allowed : ('38) 25 AIR 1938 P C 67, Rel. on. [P 278 C 1]

S. R. Mangrulkar and G. D. Bhide — for Applicant.

R. K. Rao and S. K. Wankhede — for Non-applicant.

Order. — Daulatrao, the father of the plaintiff, was a member of the school committee at a place called Khadki in the Wardha District. The school there was housed in a building which belonged to Daulatrao and now belongs to the plaintiff. This building was leased to the District Council, Wardha, by Daulatrao at a rent of Rs. 4 per month. The rent was duly paid by the District Council up to 31st August 1936 but thereafter they stopped paying rent by reason apparently of an objection taken by the auditors when auditing their accounts. Accordingly the plaintiff has brought this action on 16th August 1939 to recover rent at Rs. 4 per month from 1st September 1936 to 31st July 1939. Alternatively in case it be held that the lease was illegal or void, he claimed compensation for the use and occupation of the house by the District Council for the period in suit. The Small Cause Court has held that the lease was void under S. 75, Local Self-Government Act, but the plaintiff has succeeded on the alternative claim by virtue of S. 65, Contract Act. The District Council has applied for revision of this decree which includes interest and notice charges.

The District Council has challenged this decree before me on several grounds. First it is said that the absence of a notice under S. 73 (1), Local Self-Government Act, is fatal to the suit. Secondly it is said that the suit is barred by limitation under S. 73 (2) of the Act, not having been brought within six months of the accrual of the cause of action. Thirdly it is said that as the suit on the lease has been held to be void under S. 75, as being opposed to public policy, the suit must fail on the alternative claim for compensation for use and occupation. Finally it is said that no interest or notice charges should have been allowed against the applicant council. The non-applicant-plaintiff, on the other hand, contends that the finding that the contract is void under S. 75 of the Act is wrong. These then are the points which I am required to consider. I may say at the outset that even if the application could not be dismissed on the merits it could be dismissed on the ground that the lower Court's order has done substantial justice and, where such is the case, the High Court will not interfere in revision under Sec. 25, Small Cause Courts Act. It is only just and equitable that if the District Council has had the use of the plaintiff's house they should pay for it at a reasonable rate, and it is not suggested that the rate which has been allowed by the Court is unreasonable: 13 ALL 277,[1] AIR 1929 Nag 70,[2] A I R 1936 Oudh 247,[3] A I R 1938

Bom 223[4] and 14 Luck 588.[5]

I shall next take up the question whether the suit on the contract is void under S. 75, Local Self-Government Act. On behalf of the non-applicant-plaintiff Mr. Rao has argued that s. 75 does not say that a contract made in contravention of the section shall be void but it only says that if a member, officer or servant of any Council, etc., is interested in a contract made with that body he shall be deemed to have committed an offence under S. 168, Penal Code. It is said that this language does not attract the provisions of S. 23, Contract Act. I have been referred to Anson's Principles of the English Law of Contract, 18th Edn., p. 211, where a distinction is drawn between statutes which declare a contract to be illegal and void and those which impose a penalty on the parties without declaring it to be illegal or void. It is stated that this is one of the latter class since the Legislature has merely imposed a penalty on one of the parties to the contract. I have also been referred to 24 Bom 622,[6] 26 Mad 156[7] and 8 Lah 310.[8]

After the passage which I have referred to from p. 211 of Anson the learned author goes on to explain that in those instances where the Legislature imposes a penalty on the parties to a contract without declaring the contract to be illegal or void, the effect depends on the construction of a particular statute, and if there is any doubt as to its intention it is material to ask whether the object of the Act in imposing the penalty is merely to protect the revenue or whether it is to protect the general public or some class of the general public, since in the latter case it is probable that the act for the doing of which the penalty is imposed is impliedly prohibited by the statute and therefore illegal. The cases cited by Mr. Rao are all cases in which the object of the Act is obviously to protect the revenue and therefore it can be said that the parties can make such a contract provided they pay for it. Thus in 24 Bom 622[6] the statute concerned was the Tolls Act (Bombay Act, 3 of 1875) S. 10 of which prohibits the sub-letting of the lease from Government to collect tolls without the previous permission of the Collector and authorizes the Collector to impose a fine for breach of any of the conditions of the lease. 26 Mad 156[7] was a similar case under S. 16, Canals and Public Ferries Act (2 of 1890 (Madras)). 8 Lah 310[8] was a case in which an Indian State prohibited the person, who took a contract from the State to cut and remove bamboos from its jungles, from having partners. The Court said at page 314 :

> There is nothing to indicate that the agreement in question was forbidden by law. All that can be said of the condition is that it was imposed for administrative purposes. The State might have refused to recognise the partners under the agreement, but none of them was competent to wriggle out of it on that ground.

None of these were cases in which the statute said that a breach of its conditions shall be deemed to be an offence under the Penal Code, as is the case here. It is quite clear that if the Legislature says that the breach of one of its provisions shall be deemed to be an offence under the Penal Code, then that provision of law must be intended to protect the public and the breach is therefore impliedly prohibited and therefore illegal. This contention therefore of the non-applicant has no force. At the same time, while S. 75 makes a contract, which is a clear breach of its provisions, illegal and void, it is by no means clear that the present contract is a breach of the provisions of that section. The wording of the section is :

> If any member, officer, or servant of any Council, Board or Committee established under this Act is directly or indirectly interested in any contract made with that Council, Board or Committee, he shall be deemed to have committed an offence under S. 168, Penal Code.

It is true that the word "respectively" does not appear after the words "with that Council, Board or Committee," but the ordinary sense of the language would appear to be the same as if the word "respectively" had been inserted. Thus, it seems to be the intention of the Legislature that if a member, officer or servant of the District Council is interested in a contract made with the District Council, he shall be deemed to have committed an offence, and similarly, if a member, officer or servant of a Local Board is interested in a contract with the Local Board, he shall be deemed to have committed an offence, and if a member, officer or servant of a committee is interested in a contract made with that committee, he shall be deemed to have committed an offence. It does not necessarily mean that if a member, officer or servant of a committee is interested in a contract with the District Council he shall be deemed to have committed an offence. That is what has been done here. It is for this reason that I am not at all sure that there has been a breach of the provisions of S. 75. At the same time as the word "respectively," which would have made this position clear, has not been inserted, it may have been the intention of the Legislature to prohibit all contracts, without the leave of the Government, made between any of the bodies mentioned and the members, officers or servants of any of them. For this reason I do not propose to interfere with the finding of the lower Court as to the contract being void under S. 75. I shall deal next with S. 73 of the Act. That section provides :

73 (1)—No suit shall be instituted against any Council, Board or Committee established under this Act or against any member, officer or servant thereof, or any person acting under the direction of any such Council, Board, Committee, officer or servant, for anything done or purporting to be done under this Act or any rule or bye-law made under it, until the expiration of two months next after notice in writing, stating the cause of action, the name and the place of abode of the intending plaintiff, and the relief which he claims, has been, in the case of a Council, Board or Committee delivered or left at its office, and in the case of any member, officer, servant or person as aforesaid, delivered to him or left at his office or usual place of abode.

(2) Every such suit, unless it is a suit for the recovery of immovable property, or for a declaration of title thereto, shall be dismissed, unless it is instituted within six months from the date of the cause of action and unless service of notice as aforesaid is admitted or proved.

It is contended by the applicant Council that the act of placing a school in the plaintiff's house was an act done by the Council under the Local Self-Government Act and therefore under sub-s. (1) of S. 73, a notice was necessary before a suit was filed. No doubt the placing of a school in the plaintiff's house was an act done by the Council under the Act, but it is not for that act that the Council is being sued; it is for the failure on the part of the Council to pay rent which had been agreed upon with the owner of the house. 26 N L R 81[9] is therefore direct authority for holding that S. 73 does not apply to this suit and that the period of limitation will not be that which is provided by sub-s. (2) but the period provided by the ordinary law of limitation which is three years. Mr. Mangrulkar on behalf of the Council has relied on 2 Mad 124,[10] 46 Bom 123[11] and A I R 1923 ALL 267.[12] Of these, 2 Mad 124[10] is against him and 46 Bom 123[11] has been disapproved of in 26 N L R 81[9] and has been distinguished in 57 Bom 67,[13] which holds the same view as in 26 N L R 81.[9] A I R 1923 ALL 267[12] has also been distinguished in 26 N L R 81[9] on account of the special wording of the section which was being there considered. I see no reason therefore for not following 26 N L R 81.[9]

Next it is said on behalf of the applicant that even if the period of limitation is three years and not six months, that part of the claim, which is more than three years before the date of the amendment of the plaint whereby the plaintiff was permitted to sue for compensation for use and occupation of the property, would be barred by limitation. The plaint, as at first presented, only claimed a relief of recovery of the arrears of rent under the agreement. On 24th January 1940 the plaintiff was allowed to amend his plaint by adding an alternative prayer. It is said therefore, relying on I L R 1939 Nag 194,[14] that the part of the claim which relates to the period before 24th January 1937 is barred by limitation, i. e., the claim for the period from 1st September 1936 to 23rd January 1937. I L R (1939) Nag 194[14] says:

Amendments should readily be allowed unless they prejudice the rights of the opposite party. An amendment of the plaint should not ordinarily be allowed when the application is made at a very late stage and the result of the amendment is to bring on the record a new case which on the date of the amendment is time barred.

I L R (1939) Nag 194[14] is no bar to the amendment in the case before me; here the application for amendment was not made at a late stage. As soon as the plaintiff knew what was the District Council's defence and that the plea was being taken that the agreement was void, he applied to amend the plaint on 25th October 1939. Moreover, the result of the amendment was not to bring on the record a new case; the plaintiff wanted the money to which he was entitled by reason of the occupation of his house by the Council, and, if he could not obtain it on the basis of the agreement, he claimed it by reason of S. 65, Contract Act. Had the defendant not pleaded the bar of S. 75, Local Self-Government Act, it would have been unnecessary for the plaintiff to fall back on S. 65, Contract Act. In I L R (1939) Nag 194[14] the application for amendment was made after all the evidence, oral and documentary, had been put in and the case was at the argument's stage, and moreover by the amendment the plaintiffs in that case sought to found their claim not upon the document on which they originally based it but upon an earlier agreement, so that case is easily distinguishable. 23 N L R 152[15] is a ruling which is more appropriate to the facts of this case.

There is also another fatal objection to this contention on the part of the applicant. The amendment was allowed subject to the payment of Rs. 4 as costs to the defendant and the latter accepted those costs without demur. The applicant therefore cannot be permitted to challenge the order. In 30 N L R 347[16] it was held, following A I R 1930 Mad 268[17] and A I R 1933 Mad 410[18]:

> If under the terms of the order a party receives costs, subject to which the other party has been allowed a relief, the former will not be permitted to challenge the order. He will, of course, be entitled to do so provided he either does not accept the benefit allowed to him under the order or accepts it expressly reserving his right to challenge the order.

I now come to the material ground on which the lower Court has granted the plaintiff the relief which he claimed, namely, that under S. 65, Contract Act, he is entitled to compensation for use and occupation of the house by the Council. That section provides:

> When an agreement is discovered to be void, or when a contract becomes void, any person who has received any advantage under such agreement or contract is bound to restore it, or to make compensation for it, to the person from whom he received it.

It is said on behalf of the applicant that this section has no application to a case, such as this, where the agreement is void ab initio by reason of a provision of law. It is also said that the section only applies to cases like that mentioned in Illustration (a) to the section, where a promise was made to marry a person who was dead at the date of the promise. In view however of the pronouncement of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 45 ALL 179[19] at p. 184 no such position is tenable. In the words of their Lordships:

> An agreement, therefore, discovered to be void is one discovered to be not enforceable by law, and, on the language of the section would include an agreement that was void in that sense from its inception, as distinct from a contract that becomes void. The agreement here was manifestly void from its inception, and it was void because its subject-matter was incapable of being bound in the manner stipulated.

This case was followed in A I R 1929 Nag 241[20] and A I R 1929 Nag 257,[21] 53 Mad 309,[22] 54 Mad 112[23] and was the view held in 20 N L R 87.[24] See also 11 Bom L R 693,[25] 54 Cal 189[26] at p. 217, 48 Cal 790[27] at p. 827, 11 Lah 121,[28] 11 Lah 375,[29] 58 Mad 65[30] and A I R 1936 Mad 98.[31] The only question now outstanding is as to the claim for interest and notice charges. The only ground on which the lower Court has allowed this part of the claim is that the plaintiff was unnecessarily delayed. In 25 N L R 81[32] it was held that the allege and prove facts by virtue of which it can be held that the interest claimed was payable under a provision of the law or a settled principle.

This ruling was quoted with approval in 30 N L R 213[33] at p. 217 and the same view was expressed in 12 Pat 216.[34] See also 53 Mad 549.[35] In I L R (1938) 2 Cal 72[36] the Privy Council allowed interest from the date of suit until realisation in a case where a contractor entered into a contract with a railway company to execute certain works at scheduled rates which were found insufficient and were abandoned by mutual consent but the works were continued and completed. Compensation was allowed to the contractor on a quantum meruit basis as in the case before me. In view of that pronouncement of their Lordships, I am of opinion that the lower Court should not have allowed interest prior to the date of suit, and no claim has been made for future interest; but I see no reason whatever for disallowing notice charges. The result is that the lower Court's decree will be reduced by Rs. 8-2-6, which is the amount allowed for interest, and the decree will be for Rs. 140-15-6. The applicant, having failed to all but a very minute extent, will pay costs of the application. I allow Rs. 20 as counsel's fee.

NIYOGI AND GRUER JJ.

Kesheorao Bapuji Yende—Plaintiff — Applicant

v.

Ganeshrao Shamrao Kunbi and another—Defendants—Non-Applicants.

Civil Revn. Appln. No. 632 of 1939, Decided on 24th March 1941, from order of the Dist. Judge, Wardha, D/- 5th August 1939.

Civil P. C. (1908), S. 115 and O. 43, R. 1 (a) —Appellate Court's order under O. 43, R. 1 (a) is not immune from operation of S. 115—Appellate Court by its wrong decision making subordinate Court assume or abdicate jurisdiction or lending it support in doing so — High Court can interfere in revision — Under S. 115 High Court is concerned with original and not appellate Court's order — Question as to legality or illegality of appellate Court's order becomes immaterial.

The attributes of jurisdiction are external to the tribunal and independent of its decision. The appellate Court's order under O. 43, R. 1 (a) is not immune from the operation of S. 115. If the appellate Court assumes or abdicates jurisdiction by its own wrong decision, the High Court has jurisdiction to rectify the error in revision. Consequently where the appellate Court, by its wrong decision, makes a Court subordinate to it assume or abdicate jurisdiction or lends support to it in doing so, its decision cannot but be pronounced as illegal or at any rate irregular exercise of jurisdiction and therefore would fall under S. 115 (c). Moreover the decision of the appellate Court in such a case amounts to the exercise of a jurisdiction not vested in it by law and therefore the decision would fall under S. 115 (a) inasmuch as the appellate Court can neither confer on the sub-Court a jurisdiction which it has not under the law nor take away from the sub-Court a jurisdiction vested in it by law : ('30) 17 A I R 1930 All 713 (FB) Rel. on. [P 279 C 2; P 280 C 1]

Moreover, the High Court under S. 115 is not concerned with the order of the appellate Court so much as with the order of the original Court, whether or not it is affirmed by the appellate Court, because the only question which under S. 115 is material for the High Court is whether the original Court has or has not jurisdiction to try, and not whether the appellate Court's order is right or wrong. Since S. 115 empowers the High Court to send for the record of the case of its own motion, notwithstanding the appellate order, it must also give power to pass the necessary order affecting jurisdiction of the original Court. From this point of view the issue as to the legality or the illegality of the lower appellate Court's order becomes immaterial : ('26) 13 A I R 1926 All 58 and ('25) 12 A I R 1925 Oudh 163, Rel. on; ('37) 24 A I R 1937 Nag 39, held correctly decided; Case law reviewed. [P 279 C 1]

D. T. Mangalmurti — for Applicant.

V. V. Kelkar — for Non-applicants.

Niyogi J. — I concur with Gruer J. in answering the question in the affirmative. I wish to add what follows. The serious difficulties and anomalies envisaged by Bose J. in his referring order arise in my opinion from the assumption that the appellate Court is in a privileged position as compared with the original Court. The learned Judge observes:

Therefore, so far as the first Court is concerned I think the issue is clear cut and simple. Its duty is to try the case, and it either has or has not jurisdiction to do so. If it has and refuses to exercise it there is a refusal to exercise jurisdiction whatever the reason may be. If it has not jurisdiction and decides that it has, again the matter is revisable because there is then an attempt to exercise a jurisdiction which the Court does not possess. But the position of the appellate Court is not as clear "because" express jurisdiction is conferred upon the Court under O. 43, Rule 1 (a) to determine whether an order of the first Court returning a plaint for presentation to the proper Court is right or wrong.

On these premises the learned Judge's conclusion is that the lower appellate Court's order, though wrong, is not illegal so as to debar the High Court from interfering with its order. One answer to that is that the High Court is not concerned with the order of the appellate Court so much as with the order of the original Court, whether or not it is affirmed by the appellate Court. That is because the only question which under S. 115, Civil P. C., is material for the High Court is whether the original Court has or has not jurisdiction to try, and not whether the appellate Court's order is right or wrong. Since S. 115, Civil P. C., gives power to the High Court to send for the record of the case of its own motion, notwithstanding the appellate order, it must also give power to pass the necessary order affecting jurisdiction of the original Court. From this point of view, the issue as to the legality or the illegality of the lower appellate Court's order becomes immaterial. But, in my opinion, the order of the lower appellate Court, if wrong, is one that would fall under Cls. (a) and (c), S. 115, Civil P. C. If O. 43, R. 1 (a), Civil P. C., expressly provides a right of appeal from an order of the original Court returning a plaint for presentation to the proper Court, it by necessary implication postulates that the original Court has in the first instance jurisdiction to determine whether or not it has jurisdiction to try a particular suit. If the original Court has jurisdiction to decide that issue, and it decides it wrongly, that decision being a wrong decision as contradistinguished from an illegal decision may be immune from the cognisance of the High Court under S. 115, C. P. C. Nevertheless Bose J. is prepared to concede (para. 8 of the referring order) :

Had the learned Judge accepted the plaint his decision would, in my opinion, have been open to scrutiny in revision.

If ex hypothesi an illegal and not a wrong order is open to scrutiny and the High Court can interfere with the original Court's order only on the ground of its being illegal, can it be said that the illegality lies not in the order itself but in the action of the Court in relation to the suit which follows the order? The action of the Court flows from the decision as effect from cause. It is obvious that the illegality in the effect must be shared by the cause. It must therefore be held that the decision is not merely wrong but illegal. The High Court's power of revision comes into play because the original Court while exercising its jurisdiction in deciding whether or not it has jurisdiction to try the suit has decided wrongly so as to give jurisdiction to itself when the law does not give it or to renounce jurisdiction when the law gives it. Has the Court jurisdiction to assume or abdicate its jurisdiction by its own wrong order ? It would indeed be bold to say that it has; but granting that it has, can it be said that it is a valid exercise of jurisdiction ?

Now if the original Court's order is amenable to correction under S. 115, Civil P. C., I fail to see why the appellate Court's order cannot be, since both the Courts act in exercise of the jurisdiction vested in them by law. When the High Court sends for the record of any "case" it is primarily and immediately concerned with the jurisdiction of the Court which has to try or has tried the "case." A question of jurisdiction when raised in the Court of first instance can be decided in one of two ways, viz., that the Court has jurisdiction or has not jurisdiction. In the first case, the case is directly brought before the High Court; in the second case it comes to the High Court through the medium of the appellate Court. Whichever way it comes, the issue before the High Court is identical, viz., whether the Court of first instance has jurisdiction. No Court subordinate to the High Court has final power to decide that question. Its decision is final and its finality bears with it the presumption of correctness. If the High Court were not to act upon its decision because the appellate Court's order is sacrosanct, the result would be obviously contrary to law since the High Court itself would be guilty of failure to exercise jurisdiction vested in it by law in permitting the original Court to usurp or renounce jurisdiction according to the nature of the appellate Court's order. A train of reasoning which leads to such a strange and capricious result cannot possibly be sound. The flaw in the reasoning lies in the assumption that the appellate Court's order is immune from the operation of S. 115, Civil P. C. If the appellate Court were to assume or abdicate jurisdiction by its own wrong decision, it cannot be disputed that the High Court would have jurisdiction to rectify the error in revision. I fail to see why that Court should enjoy immunity when it, by its wrong decision, makes a Court subordinate to it assume or abdicate jurisdiction or lends support to it in doing so.

Bose J. rightly observes that the attributes of jurisdiction are external to the tribunal and independent of its decision. That is so, because jurisdiction is authority to decide matters in controversy, and the limits of that authority are imposed by the Legislature. While the original and appellate Courts as well as the High Court have power to decide questions of jurisdiction, the decision of the High Court is final. The jurisdiction cannot therefore be independent of the decision of the High Court as in the case of the Subordinate Courts. When the High Court differs from the appellate Court's decision it has jurisdiction to interfere under S. 115, Civil P. C., because the appellate Court cannot by its order confer or take away the jurisdiction of any Court. If that is so, how can the appellate Court be regarded to have exercised its jurisdiction legally when its order resulted in conferring on another Court an authority which it has not under the law or in taking away authority which it has under the law ? An exercise of jurisdiction which manifestly runs counter to the law cannot but be pronounced as illegal or at any rate irregular exercise of jurisdiction. On this view the case would fall under cl. (c) of S. 115, Civil Procedure Code.

The question may be viewed from another angle. If the appellate Court holds that a Court subordinate to it has jurisdiction when it has not, has the appellate Court jurisdiction to confer authority on a Court which it has none under the law ? If it has not, would it not be right to say that the appellate Court has exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law ? If, on the other hand, the appellate Court holds that a Court has no jurisdiction when it has it under the law, has that Court jurisdiction to take away from another Court an authority that is vested in it by law ? If it has not, would it not be again right to say that the appellate Court has exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law ? The case would thus fall under cl. (a) of S. 115, Civil P. C. This was the conclusion reached in the Full Bench case reported in 53 ALL 75.[1]

Gruer J. — The question referred to us for decision is whether the case in I L R (1937) Nag 97[2] has been rightly decided. That case held that where a civil Court found that it had no jurisdiction to try a case and that order was upheld by the District Judge in appeal the orders of the lower Courts amounted to refusing to try the case and to exercise the jurisdiction that is vested in them and therefore the High Court has power to interfere under cl. (b) of S. 115, Civil P. C. The case out of which this reference arises was one for arrears of rent which was brought in accordance with S. 106, proviso, Central Provinces Tenancy Act, in the Court of a Judge who was also a revenue officer. The Judge held that on the facts the case could not be one for arrears of rent and therefore returned the plaint for presentation to a regular civil Court. That order was upheld in appeal. Bose J. therefore puts the question, "Has the High Court, in these circumstances, jurisdiction under S. 115 of the Code to entertain a revision against the order of the appellate Court ?" He finds no difficulty in holding that so far as the trial Court is concerned the learned Judge refused to exercise jurisdiction, but he would distinguish the position of the appellate Court whose function is not to try the case but to decide whether the order of the first Court about jurisdiction is right or wrong. In doing so, if it duly discharges the duty which the law imposes upon it, how does that attract the provisions of either cls. (a), (b) or (c) of section 115 ?

It cannot be disputed that the District Judge had on appeal made to him under O. 43, R. 1, Civil P. C., jurisdiction to examine the order of the lower Court returning the plaint and to decide whether that order was right or wrong. It therefore cannot with any show of reason be said that there has been violation of cls. (a) and (b) of S. 115 by the appellate Court. So far as cl. (c) is concerned, it is not alleged that there has been any irregularity in procedure. So the Judge has not acted with material irregularity in the exercise of his jurisdiction. The view however has been taken in some cases that where a Judge when dealing with a matter of jurisdiction passes an order which is wrong in law he is acting illegally in the exercise of his jurisdiction. That view is to be found in 32 Cal 146[3] which is followed in I L R (1937) Nag 97[2] under discussion. On this point I agree with the reasoning of Bose J. in para. 13 of the referring order that an illegal decision is to be distinguished from a wrong decision or one which is wrong in law : 41 Cal 323[4] at pp. 337 and 340, 53 I A 271[5] and 11 Cal 6.[6] In 40 Mad 793[7] their Lordships said :

> The section is not directed against conclusions of law or fact in which the question of jurisdiction is not involved.

Now, no doubt, a question of jurisdiction is involved in a wrong decision in law on a point of jurisdiction, but it is not a logical inference from the above pronouncement of their Lordships, to say that the section is directed against all conclusions of law or fact in which the question of jurisdiction is involved. A Judge is not acting illegally merely because he takes a mistaken view on a law point. I therefore do not agree with the proposition stated in A I R 1928 Bom 548[8] that where the question of law involved is a question of jurisdiction the High Court has power to interfere in revision even when the lower appellate Court has committed only a mistake of law.

If then we confine ourselves strictly to the District Judge's order the line of reasoning and the position arrived at by Bose J. appears to me to be logically correct. One has however to consider that the weight of authority is against the view now propounded that no revision lies. Bose J. has also candidly admitted that his view involves serious difficulties and anomalies although he attempts to show that they can partly be got over. The position in the different High Courts would seem to be as follows : Bombay, Madras and Patna held consistently that revision lies : 15 Bom 148,[9] 20 Bom 50,[10] 1 Pat 232,[11] 39 Mad 195.[12] In Calcutta, 32 Cal 146[3] dissented from the old case in 1 C W N 626.[13] In Allahabad there has been some inconsistency, but even where it was held that the error of the appellate Court was not open to revision the High Court reversed the order of the Court of first instance : 48 ALL 168;[14] see also 8 ALL 111,[15] 43 ALL 334[16] and 53 ALL 75.[1] In the Lahore High Court and the Oudh Judicial Commissioner's Court there was a difference of opinion : A I R 1934 Lah 536,[17] A I R 1934 Lah 108,[18] A I R 1929 Lah 83,[19] A I R 1933 Lah 210;[20] see also, A I R 1917 Oudh 49,[21] A I R 1923 Oudh 38,[22] A I R 1925 Oudh 163,[23] A I R 1926 Oudh 31,[24] 4 Luck 347[25] and 4 Luck 667.[26]

The difficulty can be got round if one adopts the view set out in various cases including 48 ALL 168[14] and A I R 1925 Oudh 163[23] that the Court is not confined to an enquiry as to the jurisdiction exercised by the lower appellate Court alone but can revise the original order. Section 115, Civil P. C., empowers the High Court to call for the record of any case decided by any Court subordinate to it and in which no appeal lies to itself. The conditions are therefore fulfilled as an appeal lay not to the High Court but to the District Judge's Court. As the High Court can act suo motu it could therefore revise the order of the first Court although it is moved by a motion to revise the order of the appellate Court. Of course that involves going behind the appellate Court's order although the reasons on which it was based might be considered. Where, as here, the appellate Court's order confirms that of the first Court it can be said that the original order remains alive and so can be revised. I confess that a difficulty would arise where the appellate Court upsets the order of the first Court because that would mean that the High Court would be revising and upholding an order which has already been set aside by a competent Court. Even so I am not prepared to say that that could not be done. In the case out of which this reference arises and in I L R (1937) Nag 97[2] no such difficulty arises as the lower Courts have come to the same decision. It is to be observed that Pollock J. deals with the two lower Courts together where he says the orders of the lower Courts amounted to refusing to try the case. I think that that decision was correct in holding that the Court had power to interfere under cl. (b) of S. 115, Civil P. C. That interference however should be taken to be with the order of the trial Court which happens to be confirmed in appeal, and not with the order of the appellate Court itself.

Order. — This is an application for a writ of certiorari. The applicant is a shareholder of the Akola Co-operative Adat Shop Ltd. That society applied for an award against Akola Central Bank in 1936-37 to recover its adat fund of Rs. 2000 in accordance with the resolution passed at a general meeting held in 1927. When the registrar served a notice on the bank it suggested liquidation of the adat shop as a remedy. Later on the bank was suspended and taken over by the Government co-operative department. The registrar deputed the circle auditor attached to the Akola Central Bank to make enquiry into the financial condition of the adat shop under S. 35, Co-operative Societies Act, and thereafter ordered cancellation of the registration of the adat shop under S. 39 (1) of that Act. The registrar appointed the circle auditor as liquidator on 27th October 1937. Against the registrar's order the applicant filed an appeal to the Provincial Government which summarily dismissed it on 14th April 1939 without notice to the applicant. The applicant has applied for a writ of certiorari to issue against the registrar of the co-operative society and the co-operative circle auditor, Akola, and call for records relating to the matter of cancellation of the registered co-operative adat shop which is alleged to be solvent with a view to quash the Government's order.

The applicant has himself argued his application before me and has placed at my disposal his argument in writing. His argument in short is that this Court under its Letters Patent and Ss. 223 and 224, Government of India Act, has been vested with all the powers of the King's Bench Division of the Supreme Court of England, that by Ss. 219 and 220, Government of India Act, all the High Courts in India are put on the same level as to their jurisdiction and authority, and that the Nagpur High Court is thus empowered to issue a writ of certiorari in the exercise of the extraordinary original civil jurisdiction. The fact that this High Court had issued a writ of habeas corpus in a case reported in 1938 N L J 423[1] is relied on as a precedent.

The point is of first impression. The solution of the problem presented by this application involves an enquiry into the nature and origin of the writs of certiorari as well as the constitution and jurisdiction of the power and authority of the various High Courts in India. The writ of certiorari is one of the principal prerogative writs which under the common law powers, the Court of King's Bench was authorized to issue.

The writs owe their name to the fact that they originally issued only at the suit of the Crown, and from the early years of the 18th century they were also available to the subjects as supplementary remedies against the wrong doing of public authorities (Stephen's Commentaries, Vol. IV, p. 545, Edition 19). As the result of the Judicature Act of 1873 the various Courts such as the King's Bench, the Common Pleas, the Court of Exchequer, etc., were merged in the Supreme Court of Judicature. Among the Common Law Courts, the King's Bench Division was the first in rank. There the King was always presumed to sit in person and it enjoyed the authority to issue prerogative writs such as mandamus for the purpose of compelling discharge of a public duty by persons or bodies on whom such duty was cast, or such as prohibition to restrain excessive jurisdiction by inferior Courts or by writ of certiorari to take cases from them and bring them before itself. There are many varieties of this writ but all of them are commands issued to the inferior Courts to send their proceedings to be examined by the King's Bench Division of the Supreme Court of England. A form of such a writ is given at p. 147 of Vol. I, Stephen's Commentaries on the Laws of England, Edn. 19. The characteristics of this writ are described by Scrutton L. J., in (1931) 2 K B 215[2] at p. 233 in this way :

> The writ of certiorari is a very old and high prerogative writ drawn up for the purpose of enabling the Court of King's Bench to control the action of inferior Courts and to make it certain that they shall not exceed their jurisdiction ; and therefore, the writ of certiorari is intended to bring into the High Court the decision of the inferior tribunal, in order that the High Court may be certified whether the decision is within the jurisdiction of the inferior Court. There has been a great deal of discussion and a large number of cases extending the meaning of "Court." It is not necessary that it should be a Court in the sense in which this Court is a Court; it is enough if it is exercising, after hearing evidence, judicial functions in the sense that it has to decide on evidence between a proposal and an opposition; and it is not necessary to be strictly a Court: if it is a tribunal which has to decide rights after hearing evidence and opposition, it is amenable to the writ of certiorari.

There are elaborate discussions of this writ in (1924) 1 K B 171[3] and (1929) 1 K B 619.[4] In (1906) 2 K B 501[5] at p. 535 Moulton, L. J., pointed out that the procedure of certiorari applies in many cases in which the body whose acts are criticised would not ordinarily be called a Court, nor would its acts be ordinarily termed "judicial acts" and observed that the true view of the limitation would seem to be that the term "judicial act" is used in contrast with purely ministerial acts. The question is whether the power to issue these prerogative writs including the one under consideration has been conferred on this High Court by the Letters Patent or the Government of India Act of 1935. Stress is laid on para. 5 of the Letters Patent which provides that all writs, summonses, precepts, rules, orders and other mandatory process to be used, issued or awarded by the High Court of Judicature at Nagpur shall run and be in the name and style of Us, or of Our Heirs and Successors. That only dictates the form but does not purport to endow the High Court with authority in that behalf; nor can such authority be implied from the wording of any other paragraph in the Letters Patent. Paragraph 9 no doubt gives power to remove and to try and determine, as a Court of extraordinary original jurisdiction, but that relates only to a suit falling within the jurisdiction of any Court subject to its superintendence. It is analogous to the provisions of S. 24, Civil P. C. Much reliance is placed on Ss. 223 and 224, Government of India Act, 1935. The latter section relates to the administrative functions of the High Court and cannot be taken to apply to a case which involves exercise of judicial authority by this Court. Section 223 of that Act runs as follows :

> 223. Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, to the provisions of any Order in Council made under this or any other Act and to the provisions of any Act of the appropriate Legislature enacted by virtue of powers conferred on that Legislature by this Act, the jurisdiction of, and the law administered in, any existing High Court, and the respective powers of the Judges thereof in relation to the administration of justice in the Court, including any power to make rules of Court and to regulate the sittings of the Court and of members thereof sitting alone or in Division Courts, shall be the same as immediately before the commencement of Part 3 of this Act.

This section reproduces the substance of the provisions of Ss. 106 (1), 108 and 112, Government of India Act of 1915. Part 3, Government of India Act, 1935, came into force on 1st April 1937 and this section only confirms such jurisdiction as any High Court possessed before that date. It is not helpful in determining the extent of jurisdiction of this High Court which was established but 15 months before Part 3, Government of India Act, came into force. Section 219 provides that the various Courts specified therein shall, in relation to British India, be deemed to be High Courts for purposes of the Government of India Act, but that does not abolish the distinction between the Chartered High Courts and other High Courts in point of constitution and jurisdiction; nor would the fact that the provisions of Chap. 2 of Part 9 of that Act are made applicable by sub-s. (2) of that section to every High Court in British India destroy the effect of the plain provisions of s. 223 which expressly declares that the jurisdiction of, and the law administered in the existing High Courts shall be the same as immediately before the commencement of Part 3 of this Act.

It is suggested that because this High Court is established by His Majesty's Letters Patent it becomes clothed with all the power and authority which the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice in England is under the English Common Law empowered to do. The argument would indeed be sound were the common law of England the common law of India. Their Lordships of the Privy Council in 9 Lah 510[6] at p. 518 observed in regard to the interpretation of Indian statutes that their language ought not to be enlarged by any implication of English doctrines. To the same effect are to be found observations in 7 Pat 221[7] at p. 227. These observations, though they were made in regard to the statutes passed by the Indian Legislature, are eqally applicable to those passed by the Parliament to define or regulate the powers of the Courts in India, and would appear to reprobate any attempt to enlarge the meaning of expressions used in such enactments by importing the considerations of the common law of England. The assumption involved in the argument is contradicted by the very terms of S. 223, Government of India Act, which leaves every High Court free to exercise such jurisdiction and authority as that particular High Court had or could exercise on the date specified therein. The expression "shall be the same as immediately before the commencement of Part 3 of this Act" is highly significant. To grasp the meaning of that expression it is necessary to inspect the terms of the Letters Patent of the High Courts of Madras, Bombay and Calcutta as distinguished from other High Courts in India, and the Charters which preceded the Letters Patents. For the purpose of the present discussion it would suffice to examine the constitution of the Calcutta High Court. That High Court came to be established originally as a Supreme Court by a Charter dated 26th March 1774 which was granted under 13 Geo. III, Ch. 63, popularly known as the Regulating Act. Section 13 of that Act empowered the King to establish by Charter or Letters Patent Supreme Courts at Madras, Bombay and Fort William in Bengal with such powers as by the said Charter might be granted or committed to the said Court. Section 14 provided that the jurisdiction, powers and authority to be conferred upon the Supreme Courts were to extend to all British subjects who would reside in the Kingdoms or Province of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa under the protection of the said East India Company. It was in pursuance of this power that by cl. 4 of the Charter dated 26th March 1774 it was ordained as follows :

> And it is our further will and pleasure that the said Chief Justice . . . to have such jurisdiction and authority as our Justices of our Court of King's Bench have and may lawfully exercise within that part of Great Britain called England by the Common Law thereof.

By cl. 21 of that Charter, the Court of Requests and Court of Quarter Sessions established at Fort William, and the Justices, Sheriffs and Magistrates appointed for the said districts were made subject to the order and control of the Supreme Court in such sort, manner and form as the inferior Courts and Magistrates of and in England were, by law, subject to the order and control of the Court of King's Bench, and to that end the Supreme Court was empowered to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, procedendo or error to be directed to such Courts or Magistrates : see 41 Cal 173[8] at pp. 204 and 205. After the Indian High Courts Act of 1861 came into operation Letters Patent were issued in 1862, which were superseded by a fresh Letters Patent dated 28th December 1865 : see p. 1333, Mulla's Civil Procedure Code. In the preamble to the Letters Patent it was declared that the High Court to be established should have and exercise all jurisdiction and every power and authority whatsoever in any manner vested in any of the Courts in the same presidency abolished under the said Act at the time of the abolition of such last mentioned Courts, and in para. 2 it was specifically provided that notwithstanding the revocation of the said Letters Patent of 1862 the High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal would continue as from the time of the original establishment thereof, the High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal. It must be observed that the preamble referred to above was drawn up in terms of S. 9, Indian High Courts Act of 1861. The Supreme Courts of Madras and Bombay were also established by similar Charters in 1801 and 1823 and their constitution and authority were the same as those of the Calcutta High Court. The High Court of Allahabad was established by Letters Patent issued on 17th March 1866, but in them the special authority which had been conferred on the three Presidency High Courts by their Charters was not mentioned. That High Court was simply declared to be a Court of Record and its Letters Patent do not, in their terms, materially differ from those of the High Court of Patna, established in 1916, of the High Court of Lahore established in 1919 or of the High Court of Rangoon established in 1922 or of the Nagpur High Court established in 1936.

Although the Chartered High Courts of Madras, Bombay and Calcutta have the power to issue prerogative writs, that power was materially restricted by legislation. Section 45, Specific Relief Act, declared that the High Courts of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal, Madras and Bombay had the power to require any specific act to be done or forborne by a person holding a public office only within the local limits of its original civil jurisdiction. Section 50 of that Act abolished the power to issue any writ of mandamus. It was pointed out by Coutts Trotter J., in 40 Mad 125[9] at p.136 that though the proceedings under S. 45, Specific Relief Act, were analogous to the proceedings for obtaining the English writ of mandamus, care must be taken to see that the analogy of the English cases does not lead one outside the words of the Indian statute. It is pertinent to notice that the Specific Relief Act was passed in 1877 when the High Court of Allahabad had already been brought into existence. Non-mention of that High Court in that section clearly goes to show that the Letters Patent which constituted it did not concede that authority to it. It was for this reason that when the Rangoon High Court came to be established in 1922 the power to issue the writ of mandamus was granted to it by its inclusion in S. 45, as a result of Act 11 of 1923. The question whether the Patna High Court had power to issue the prerogative writ of mandamus independently of S. 45, Specific Relief Act, came up for consideration before a Full Bench of that Court in a case reported in 10 Pat 218,[10] and it was held that it had no such power.

Similarly the common law power of the Chartered High Court to issue the prerogative writ of habeas corpus was abrogated by S. 491, Criminal P. C. There was no doubt a controversy on the question whether the High Courts retained their power notwithstanding S. 491, Criminal P. C., as will appear from 50 Bom 616[11] and 45 Mad 14[12] and 54 Cal 727,[13] but that controversy is now set at rest by the decision of their Lordships in A I R 1939 P C 213 [14] where their Lordships approving the view taken in 54 Cal 727[13] ruled that a High Court or any Judge of it cannot issue a common law writ of habeas corpus in any case covered by S. 491, Criminal P. C. As to the writ of certiorari a question arose in 36 Mad 72[15] whether or not the Madras High Court had jurisdiction to issue a writ on an officer beyond the limits of its jurisdiction. The learned Judges who composed the Bench differed in their views as to the extent of jurisdiction of the Madras High Court, but both attributed the power of the High Court to issue such writs to the Charter which established it and Letters Patent which subsequently confirmed the authority derived from the Charter. In 43 Mad 146[16] it was contended before their Lordships of the Privy Council that the High Court of Madras had no power to issue a writ of certiorari with regard to which contention their Lordships observed as follows :

> It would seem that at any rate the three High Courts of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay possessed the power of issuing this writ : see 1 Knapp 1[17] at pp. 49, 51 and 55 and 11 Cal 275.[18] Whether any of the other Courts which are by definition High Courts for the purposes of this Act have the power to issue writs of certiorari is another question.

It is apparent that their Lordships entertained a doubt and that doubt was warranted by the fact that while the three Presidency Courts had that common law power derived from their Charters the other High Courts had not. It therefore appears clear to me that the High Courts in India other than the Chartered High Courts have not the power to issue the prerogative writ of certiorari either under the Letters Patent or the Government of India Act. But it is said that the power to issue prerogative writs arises by necessary implication from its status as a Court of Record. It is true that para. 1 of the Letters Patent of the Nagpur High Court constitutes it to be a Court of Record and that S. 220, sub-s. (1), Government of India Act, declares every High Court to be a Court of Record. A Court of Record simply means a Court whose acts and judicial proceedings are enrolled for a perpetual memorial and testimony; and the rolls are called the Records of the Court. These Records are of such high authority that their truth cannot be called in question in any Court. All Courts of Record are the Courts of the King, in right of his crown and royal dignity; and they comprise both superior and inferior Courts, e. g., County Courts. A Court of Record has power to fine and imprison for contempt of its authority, so that if a new Court possessing this power is set up it ipso facto becomes a Court of Record : see Stephen's Commentaries on the Laws of England, Vol. 1, pp. 94-95, Edn. 19. In 41 Cal 173[8] at p. 213 Jenkins, C. J., pointed out that the power of the King's Bench to punish for interference with the lower Courts did not arise from its being a Court of Record but from its common law powers as custos morum. There the question was whether the High Court of Calcutta could punish a person for contempt of a mofussil Court beyond the limits of that Court's original jurisdiction and Jenkins C. J., had to consider whether that Court had power by the very fact that it was a Court of Record. As he was of opinion that the power to punish for contempt was vested in that Court as a common law power within the limits of its original jurisdiction it could not be exercised beyond the limits of its original jurisdiction. In that case the observations made by the learned Chief Justice are pertinent here, viz. :

> And I may here point out that this would hardly have been a satisfactory basis for the jurisdiction invoked, as it would be of use only where the common law prevails. A jurisdiction so founded would, as far as I can see, be of no use to the High Court of Allahabad, to any High Court established under the recent Act, or to any of the Chief Courts, but would belong only to the three High Courts which are vested with common law powers.

My attention is invited to 3 F L J 61,[19] 1 F L J 4[20] and 1 F L J 167.[21] These are cases relating to the issue of the writ of certiorari but they all arose in the chartered High Courts. In the first mentioned case Lokur J., expressly relied upon the powers conferred upon the Bombay High Court by the Letters Patent and the Charter Act, which powers were co-extensive with those of the King's Bench in England: see p. 67. In 1 F L J 4[20] the Madras High Court founded its jurisdiction on its Charter. In fact in both these cases the contention was that ss. 223 and 224, Government of India Act, deprived the Chartered High Courts of their authority to issue prerogative writ of certiorari. In both the cases the contention was overruled. There is again the question whether or not the Registrar is a Court, that is a person exercising judicial functions as opposed to administrative function. Reference may be made in this behalf to the English cases already cited and to 24 Mad 121,[22] 36 Mad 72,[15] and 39 Mad 414,[23] but it is unnecessary to go into the question as I hold that this Court has no power to issue the prerogative writ asked for.

To summarise:

(1) The power now exercised by the King's Bench Division of the Supreme Court in England to issue prerogative writs was derived from the common law of England.

(2) The High Courts of Bombay, Madras and Calcutta were endowed with that power by their respective Charters and that was affirmed by the subsequent Letters Patent and also by S. 223, Government of India Act, 1935.

(3) That with the development of the legislative machinery in India their power derived as above from the common law of England was circumscribed by legislation such as Ss. 45 and 50, Specific Relief Act, and S. 491, Criminal Procedure Code.

(4) That the non-mention of the High Courts other than the Chartered ones in S. 45, Specific Relief Act, and the inclusion therein of the Rangoon High Court by Act 11 of 1923 and the inclusion of other non-chartered High Courts in S. 491, Cr. P. C., by Act 12 of 1923 negatives the existence in them of the common law power to issue prerogative writs.

(5) The doubt expressed by Jenkins C. J., in 41 Cal 173[8] at p. 214 and by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 43 Mad 146[16] at p. 159 was resolved by a Full Bench of the Patna High Court in 10 Pat 218,[10] at least so far as that High Court was concerned against the assumption of the existence of the common law power in the High Courts other than the chartered ones.

(6) Section 224 (2), Government of India Act, denies to the High Courts jurisdiction to question any judgment of any inferior Court which is not otherwise subject to appeal or revision. This would preclude any High Court (presumably other than the Chartered High Courts) from exercising jurisdiction over the acts of any public authority even though they are judicial as opposed to merely administrative.

It must follow that the High Court of Nagpur has no other jurisdiction or authority except as provided in S. 24 and S. 115, Civil P. C., or Ss. 435 and 439, Criminal P. C. I dismiss the application without notice to the other side.

Ramlal Balaram Patil — Plaintiff — Appellant

v.

Rakhdu Pandu Halbi and others — Defendants — Respondents.

Second Appeal No. 228 of 1938, Decided on 25th October 1940, from appellate decree of Second Addl. Dist. Judge, Bhandara, D/- 13th December 1937.

(a) Easements Act (1882), S. 13 (a), (c) and (e)—Easement of necessity defined.

An easement of necessity is one without which the dominant heritage cannot be used at all. [P 288 C 2]

* (b) Easements Act (1882), Ss. 13 (d) and 5—Right to use water for irrigation through artificial watercourse is apparent and continuous easement—Transferor must be deemed to have reserved such easement when parting with servient heritage.

The dominant heritage is only entitled to the quasi-easements if they are apparent and continuous, but even then they can be expressly excluded in the document of transfer. Accordingly where no light is thrown by any document of transfer on the question whether such easement is or is not to attach, the criterion is whether the easement is apparent and continuous or not. If it is either non-apparent or discontinuous, then the dominant heritage will only be entitled to the easement if it is expressly mentioned in the document of severance as an attribute of that heritage. [P 288 C 2]

A right to use water for irrigation purposes through an artificial watercourse being a continuous and apparent easement, the transferor must be deemed to have reserved it under S. 13 (d) at the time of transferring the servient heritage when the deed of transfer is silent on the question whether such easement is or is not to attach : Case law discussed. [P 289 C 1]

Judgment. — The appellant-plaintiff is the occupancy tenant of field No. 402/1 of village Ghiwari whilst the respondents-defendants are the owners of khudkasht fields Nos. 328/2 and 329. Originally the eight anna share of the village, in which these three fields lie, belonged to the plaintiff and his brother jointly, but in 1927 they separated. Subsequently in 1932 the plaintiff sold his four anna share of the village to his brother Hiralal and thereby became an ex-proprietary occupancy tenant of the sir field No. 402/1. In the same year Hiralal sold the eight anna village share to one Dayaram, who in 1935 sold four khudkasht fields including Nos. 328/2 and 329 to the defendants. The plaintiff claims that his field No. 402/1 enjoys a right of irrigation from fields Nos. 328/2 and 329 but that the defendants have obstructed this right and hence he claims a permanent injunction restraining the defendants from interfering with his right of irrigation from those fields and a mandatory injunction to restore the embankments to their original condition in which they were while the right of irrigation was being enjoyed. The defendants have denied the plaintiff's right to irrigate his field from theirs, and the only question for determination in this appeal is whether such a right exists and requires to be protected by injunction. The plaintiff relies on S. 13 (d), Easements Act. The lower appellate Court has considered this question in paras. 6 and 7 of its judgment. The fields originally belonged to a common owner before the plaintiff acquired his occupancy rights to field No. 402/1 by the sale of his four anna share to his brother. Referring to that time of common ownership the learned Additional District Judge says :

> An easement by the plaintiff on his own land is a contradiction in itself. When the plaintiff was using the water from the two fields for his field No. 402/1 he did it as owner of all the fields and his user over his own site as owner would not give him any right of easement; and he cites 104 I C 503[1] as his authority for this proposition. No doubt it is true here, as it was in 104 I C 503,[1] that while both properties belonged to the same owner no question of any easement could arise, but that does not mean that no easement could arise as soon as the properties ceased to belong to the same owner. Then the learned Judge goes on to consider the effect of S. 13, Easements Act, and he expresses the opinion that that section cannot apply to the facts of this case because it gives a right to the transferee over the property of the transferor and not a right to the transferor over the property of the transferee. Here the transferor claims a right over the property of the transferee. Therefore he thinks that that section does not apply. Accordingly he considers that unless the right was specifically reserved by the plaintiff at the time when he sold fields Nos. 328/2 and 329 he could not retain any such right of irrigation. He distinguishes A I R 1930 ALL 313,[2] upon which the plaintiff relied in his Court, by saying that that case was one of partition for which there is a special provision in S. 13 and hence it could not support the plaintiff's claim where severance between the properties came about by a sale. In support of his opinion that the plaintiff must specifically reserve the rights if he wished to retain them the learned Judge has cited 18 Bom 616,[3] but S. 13 was not in force when the facts of that case came into existence : it was decided on general principles of law. We are here required to see whether S. 13 of the Act applies.

The scheme of the section is perfectly clear. It provides for six different situations which may arise where one person transfers or bequeaths immovable property. These six situations are covered by sub-ss. (a) to (f). Sub-sections (a) and (b) deal with the effect on the transferee's rights; sub-ss. (c) and (d) deal with the effect on the transferor's right; while sub-ss. (e) and (f) deal with the rights of the parties to a partition. Sub-sections (a), (c) and (e) all describe the result in law where an easement is necessary for the enjoyment of the property. These are called "easements of necessity" and they apply where the dominant heritage cannot be used at all unless the easement exists. In each of the three cases of an easement of necessity the dominant heritage is entitled to the easement, whatever may be the nature of the easement. Sub-sections (b), (d) and (f) refer to the so called "quasi easements." The dominant heritage is only entitled to these if they are apparent and continuous, and even then they could be expressly excluded in the document of transfer. Accordingly where, as in the present case, no light is thrown by any document of transfer on the question whether such easement is or is not to attach, the criterion is whether the easement is apparent and continuous or not. If it is either non-apparent or discontinuous, then the dominant heritage will only be entitled to the easement if it is expressly mentioned in the document of severance as an attribute of that heritage. The meaning of continuous and apparent easements is explained in S. 5 of the Act as follows :

> Easements are either continuous or discontinuous, apparent or non-apparent.
> A continuous easement is one whose enjoyment is, or may be, continual without the act of man.
>
> A discontinuous easement is one that needs the act of man for its enjoyment.
>
> An apparent easement is one the existence of which is shown by some permanent sign which, upon careful inspection by a competent person, would be visible to him.
> A non-apparent easement is one that has no such sign.

It is obvious that the easement in the present case is apparent. The only question is whether it is continuous, that is to say, whether its enjoyment is or may be continual without the act of man. The case of (1871) 6 Ch A 166[4] was a case in which the owner of properties A and B laid pipes to carry water from property B to property A for the purpose of supplying cattle sheds on property A with water. He sold property A to the plaintiff who enjoyed the right to the water until it was stopped by a purchaser of property B. The Court held that that was a continuous easement. In 2 Mad 46,[5] a watercourse across the servient heritage was held to be an apparent and continuous easement: see also 4 Cal 633[6] at pp. 639 and 642, 26 Mad 51,[7] 34 Mad 487,[8] A I R 1924 Mad 108,[9] A I R 1924 Mad 812,[10] A I R 1930 Pat 7,[11] A I R 1931 Mad 561[12] and 58 ALL 662.[13] It follows that the easement here was a continuous and apparent easement, and therefore under S. 13 (d) of the Act, the plaintiff must be deemed to have reserved it when he parted with fields Nos. 328/2 and 329 and consequently he will be entitled now to the use of the water from those fields. The result is that the lower appellate Court's decree is set aside and the trial Court's decree restored. Costs throughout on the respondents.

Civil Revn. Appln. No. 157 of 1940, Decided on 16th January 1941, from order of 2nd Sub-Judge, First Class, Khandwa, D/- 17th January 1940.

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 115—Appeal maintainable — Order may still be interfered with in revision.

(c) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 6, R. 17 — Suit by plaintiff on acknowledgment executed by defendant in plaintiff's account book — Defendant denying cash consideration pleading suit to be not maintainable and praying for reopening of accounts — Plaintiff immediately applying for amending plaint so as to base claim on original transaction—Amendment held could be allowed since case introduced by it though new was not inconsistent.

The plaintiff brought an action on the last day of limitation to recover a certain sum on the basis of stamped acknowledgment executed by the defendant in the plaintiff's account book. The defendant admitted execution of acknowledgment but denied receipt of cash consideration and pleaded that suit was not maintainable as based on mere acknowledgment and that if suit was maintainable previous transactions between the parties be reopened as the acknowledgment was executed on taking account of those transactions. As the defendant denied cash consideration the plaintiff sought to amend the plaint and to base his claim on the original transaction. The amended claim was however barred on the date of the application for amendment which was filed immediately after the defendant's written statement denying cash consideration :

Held that the plaintiff was entitled to the amendment which though introduced a new case did not introduce an inconsistent case. Even if it could be said that the amendment was sought at a late stage and that it sought to introduce a new and inconsistent cause of action, the special circumstances (defendant himself in his written statement having asked for reopening the previous transactions) of the case justified the amendment of the plaint : 11 M I A 468 (PC); ('21) 8 A I R 1921 P C 50 and ('33) 20 A I R 1933 Bom 476, Rel. on; ('22) 9 A I R 1922 P C 249, Disting.; ('38) 25 A I R 1938 Nag 388, Expl. [P 291 C 2 ; P 292 C 1]

R. S. Dabir — for Applicant.

Order. — The applicant-plaintiff brought this action to recover Rs. 4000 on the basis of a stamped acknowledgment executed by defendant 1 in the plaintiff's account book on 9th February 1936. This acknowledgment is Ex. P-1 and testifies to the fact of a sum of Rs. 4000 cash in Government currency as payable by defendant 1 and his son Beosingh. The action was brought on the last day of limitation for such a suit, namely on 9th February 1939. The defendants admitted executing the acknowledgment but denied that cash consideration was received from the plaintiff on 9th February 1936. According to them the acknowledgment was executed on the taking of an account of the previous transactions between the parties. They contended, in the first place, that the document on which the plaintiff sued was a bare acknowledgment which could not form the basis of a suit. In the alternative, if it should be held that the plaintiff could sue on this document, they demanded that the previous transactions should be reopened under the Central Provinces debt legislation and that they should be given relief in respect of the rate of interest charged on the debt as well as an instalment decree. The last of the written statements of the several defendants was filed on 6th October 1939. There is no material difference between the written statements of any of the defendants. On the same date the plaintiff in reply asked for time to apply for amendment of his plaint which was allowed and at the next hearing, 16th November 1939, the plaintiff submitted his application for amending the plaint and the defendants took another adjournment until 16th January 1940 in order to reply thereto. They duly replied and the case was argued.

The plaintiff in his amendment application stated that the amendment was necessary by reason of the defendants denying that the transaction of 9th February 1936 was a cash transaction in spite of an agreement between them that it should be treated as though it has been a cash advance of that date. The plaintiff explained that he had accepted this agreement as a novation of the original contract but that inasmuch as the defendant was now denying that it was a cash transaction it would be necessary to go into the previous accounts. He therefore set out the transactions which commenced on 19th May 1930 with a loan of Rs. 2000 to defendant 1 acknowledged in the plaintiff's account book in the same way as the acknowledgment of 9th February 1936. This acknowledgment of 19th May 1930 was acknowledged afresh on 23rd February 1933 when the admitted liability was Rs. 2822-8-0 and again on 9th February 1936 by the acknowledgment on which the suit was brought. By his application the plaintiff sought to base his suit on the original transaction of 19th May 1930, the limitation being saved by the acknowledgments of 1933 and 1936. The lower Court has rejected the application for amendment, relying on I L R (1939) Nag 194[1] and holding that by the amendment the plaintiff is seeking to make out a new and inconsistent case which would have been barred by limitation at the date of the application for amendment.

The first point which I have to consider is whether in view of the fact that the plaintiff would have a right of appeal on this question if the case were allowed to proceed to judgment I should interfere in revision at this stage. The answer to this is given in 55 ALL 256[2] where it was held that in a case like this a revision lies because the effect of the lower Court's order is to shut out a part of the plaintiff's claim and is therefore a "case decided" within the meaning of S. 115, Civil P. C. It was also there held that where the effect of allowing a revision in a matter in which an appeal might also lie, will be a convenience to the parties and will save expense, the Court will interpret S. 115 liberally. With these observations I respectfully concur. Although Mr. Dabir on behalf of the applicant has spent some time arguing whether Ex. P-1 is a bare acknowledgment or not, it is not for me to decide this question at this stage as that is a question which the lower Court will have to decide in the suit. The only question which I have to decide is whether the lower Court acted with material irregularity in the exercise of its jurisdiction in disallowing the plaintiff's application for amendment. In 11 M I A 468[3] the Privy Council allowed an amendment of the pleadings long after the suit would have been barred by limitation if it had been freshly instituted on that date. Their Lordships observed that in the circumstances of the case before them the defence of limitation would be inequitable and as the case had been heard ex parte and the respondent was not before their Lordships they could not put her on terms as to her defence to a fresh suit. They therefore allowed the plaintiff to amend his plaint. 48 Cal 110[4] is another case in which their Lordships considered that the special circumstances of the case warranted an amendment of the plaint after the expiry of the period of limitation. They observed at page 116 :

> That there was full power to make the amendment cannot be disputed, and though such a power should not as a rule be exercised where its effect is to take away from a defendant a legal right which has accrued to him by lapse of time, yet there are cases, (see for example 11 M I A 468[3]), where such considerations are outweighed by the special circumstances of the case, and their Lordships are not prepared to differ from the Judicial Commissioner in thinking that the present case is one.

As has been pointed out in I L R (1939) Nag 194[1] unless there are special circumstances such as existed in 11 M I A 468[3] and 48 Cal 110[4] the effect should be given to the rule laid down by their Lordships in 36 Cal 780[5] to the effect that the Court should refuse to entertain at a late stage of the case a new question the solution of which must depend on evidence. In both 36 Cal 780[5] and I L R (1939) Nag 194[1] the amendment was sought at a very late stage after the evidence was closed and the cases were fixed for arguments. The Division Bench has however been careful to observe that > amendments should always be made with great readiness .... but where one sees an amendment asked for at so late a stage which introduces a new cause of action after the period of limitation for a fresh suit has expired then exceptional circumstances must be present "to justify a Court letting the plaintiff do in one litigation what he cannot do in another."

I L R (1939) Nag 194[1] therefore amounts to this : Amendments should be allowed with great readiness but, if all the following circumstances exist, i. e., if the application is made at a late stage, and especially if at the time of the application for amendment a suit on the amended plaint would be barred by limitation, and if the amendment seeks to introduce a new and inconsistent case, then special circumstances must exist before amendment should be allowed. In the present case the only feature present of those set out above is that a fresh suit on the amended plaint would be barred by limitation. The application was not made at a late stage and it does not to my mind seek to introduce a new and inconsistent case. The application was made as soon as the defendants had submitted their written statements. Moreover, in I L R (1939) Nag 194,[1] the plaintiffs stated in their plaint, after reciting the documents which they filed with the plaint, "there is no other paper either in the possession of the plaintiffs or other persons to be produced in evidence of the claim," which was interpreted as meaning that the document on which they wished to rely by way of amendment was irrelevant to the claim which they originally pleaded. In the case before me the plaintiff says in para. 6 of the plaint : "The plaintiff ... will produce other papers that will be found necessary after statements of the defendants." I would draw attention to certain other observations of their Lordships in 48 Cal 110[4] at p. 116 where they say :

> But their Lordships are in full agreement with the statement made by the Judicial Commissioner that, "however defective the frame of the suit may be, the plaintiffs' object was to pre-empt the land, their cause of action was one and the same whether they sued for possession or not." If this be so, all that happened was that the plaintiffs, through some clumsy blundering, attempted to assert rights that they undoubtedly possessed under the statute in a form which the statute did not permit. But if once it be accepted that they were attempting to establish those rights there is no sufficient reason shown for disturbing the judgment of the Judicial Commissioner, who thinks they should be at liberty to express their intention in a plainer and less ambiguous manner.

The Division Bench in I L R (1939) Nag 194[1] considered that the case before them was similar to 48 Cal 832,[6] another Privy Council case in which leave to amend was refused. 48 Cal 832[6] has been explained and distinguished in 57 Bom 802[7] in which there was a suit on a promissory note executed by one of the defendants and the plaintiff having sued that defendant and another defendant he was allowed to amend his plaint so as to base his claim against the other defendant on the transactions which gave rise to the promissory note. There, as here, the real subject-matter of the suit was the indebtedness of the defendants. The amendment, although it may seek to introduce a new case, does not seek to introduce an inconsistent case. Furthermore, even if it could be said that the amendment here was sought at a late stage and that it sought to introduce a new and inconsistent cause of action, the special circumstances of this case would appear to justify an amendment of the plaint. These special circumstances are that the defendants themselves have in their written statement asked for the previous transactions to be reopened. The plaintiff has only acceded to their wish by agreeing to the reopening of the transactions. I hold therefore that the amendment should have been allowed. I see no reason for putting the plaintiff on terms as to costs. The application is allowed and the finding on the preliminary issue will be 'yes' instead of 'no.' Civil Revn. No. 263 of 1940, Decided on 20th December 1940, for revision of decree of Judge, Small Cause Court, Raipur, D/- 8th December 1939.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 18, R. 18 — Parties agreeing to accept opinion of Judge on certain point requiring spot inspection and leading no evidence — Opinion of Judge formed on spot inspection can be accepted in place of evidence.

It is true that in an ordinary case the opinion of the Judge formed on spot inspection cannot take the place of evidence, but where the parties had agreed to accept the opinion of the Judge on certain point requiring spot inspection and for that reason led no evidence, in such special circumstances, the opinion of the Judge can be accepted in place of evidence. (b) C. P. Municipalities Act (2 of 1922), S. 133 (1) (e) — Flour mill, unless raising offensive noises, smell or smoke, is not licensable under Section 133 (1) (e).

Section 133 (1) (e) means that the manufactory, engine-house or place of business must be capable of description as one from which offensive or unwholesome smells, noises or smoke arise. It is obviously not intended that any manufactory should require a license whether offensive or unwholesome smells, noises or smoke arise from it or not. Hence if a flour mill is to be licensable under this section it must be one from which offensive or unwholesome smells, noises or smoke arise.

(c) Interpretation of statutes—Marginal note.

The marginal note can be taken into consideration showing the intention of a section.

[P 293 C 1, 2]

T. P. Naik — for Applicant.
G. R. Deo — for Non-applicant.

Order. — The non-applicant Wamanrao owns a flour mill within the limits of the Bilaspur Municipality. The latter recovered from him Rs. 53 by way of license fee under S. 133, Central Provinces Municipalities Act. Wamanrao brought this action to recover that amount from the municipality on the ground that his was not a business which fell within the description of businesses taxable under S. 133. He has been successful in the lower Court, and hence the Municipal Committee has now come up in revision. Only two points arise for determination. The first is one of fact whether in point of fact the non-applicant's business is of an offensive nature; the other is one of law as to whether on the finding that the business is not of an offensive nature it is nevertheless taxable under S. 133. On the first point the parties led no evidence but they agreed to accept the opinion of the Judge himself on a spot inspection of the non-applicant's factory. The Judge accordingly visited the factory and, as he says, he found that the mill was run by a small electric motor which made a pleasant humming sound scarcely audible outside the mill and he failed to detect any kind of offensive smell. He therefore found that the mill did not produce any offensive smell or noise. The applicant committee has objected before me to the finding being based on the personal opinion of the Judge. Obviously the opinion of a Judge as formed by an inspection of the subject-matter of the dispute is envisaged by the provisions of O. 18, R. 18, Civil P. C. If the Judge was not expected to form any opinion of what he saw himself, there could be no object in allowing a spot inspection. I am not prepared to say that in an ordinary case the opinion of the Judge so formed could take the place of evidence, but in the present case, in view of the fact that the parties had agreed to accept the opinion of the Judge on that point, and for that reason led no evidence, in such special circumstances, the opinion of the Judge could be accepted in place of evidence. The situation is similar to the taking of a special oath by a party or the constitution of the Court as an arbitrator for the purpose of one particular finding. I therefore accept the finding of the learned Judge that the non-applicant's business was not of an offensive nature from the point of view of noise or smell. The second question turns on the interpretation of S. 133 (1) (e), Central Provinces Municipalities Act. There is a marginal note at the commencement of S. 133 to the effect that the section deals with the "power to regulate offensive or dangerous trades." The section then provides that > no place within the limits of a municipality shall be used for any of the following purposes . . . . except under a license obtained by the owner or occupier from the committee and renewable annually.

The purposes mentioned are :

> (a) melting tallow, (b) boiling bones, offal or blood, (c) as a soap-house, oil boiling house, dyeing house or tannery, (d) as a brick-kiln, pottery or lime-kiln, (e) as any other manufactory, engine-house or place of business from which offensive or unwholesome smells, noises or smoke arise, (f) as a yard or depot for trade in grain, hay, straw, cotton, oilseed, oilcake, thatching grass, wood, charcoal or coal or other dangerously inflammable material, (g) as a store-house for any explosive or for petroleum or any inflammable oil spirit.

Now it is obvious that all these trades or businesses specified by description in (a) to (g) above are either offensive or dangerous trades. When therefore in (e) the Legislature describes "as any other manufactory, engine-house or place of business from which offensive or unwholesome smells, noises or smoke arise" it means that the manufactory, engine-house or place of business must be capable of description as one from which offensive or unwholesome smells, noises or smoke arise. It is obviously not intended that any manufactory should require a license whether offensive or unwholesome smells, noises or smoke arise from it or not. That is the interpretation which the applicant committee desires to place on the section. Mr. Naik on behalf of the committee has spent a considerable time in arguing that the presence of a comma after "manufactory" and the absence of commas after "engine-house" and "place of business" means that the manufactory is excluded from those businesses which have to be of an offensive or unwholesome nature before they become liable to license. He has cited a number of cases where the language of other Acts and the punctuation therein have been considered and discussed and the effect of the punctuation in those Acts has been commented upon. It is useless, however, to argue from the wording of other Acts to the wording of this Act. In order to interpret the section one has to read it as a whole and if it is clear what the intention of the Legislature is, and that meaning is the plain meaning of the words used, then it is improper to strain the language so as to endeavour to make it mean something else. The marginal note can be taken into consideration showing that the section is only intended to regulate offensive or dangerous trades. When that fact is borne in mind it is absurd to suppose that any manufactory, whether it is offensive or dangerous or not, is intended to be subject to license. If that were so, there was no object in specifying a number of offensive or dangerous manufactories before mentioning in clause (e) "any other manufactory etc."

I have frequently observed that typists and printers in this country are in the habit, when giving a list of items, of putting a comma between each item except the last two which are usually separated by the words 'and' or 'or'. The idea is that the word 'and' or the word 'or' takes the place of a comma. I am aware that that is not strictly correct and that a comma should also appear before the word 'and' or the word 'or'. It seems however to have become a more or less usual practice and that is all that the printer appears to have done in the present instance. Another instance of the same thing is observable in the very same clause (e) of S. 133 (1), where the clause finishes with the words "unwholesome smells, noises or smoke arise" there is no comma after the word 'noises' because the word 'or' comes in between. It is obviously not intended that smells or noises or smoke should be divided into two groups, one consisting of the word 'smells' and the other 'noises and smoke'. Similarly as far as the manufactory, engine-house or place of business are concerned, it is not intended that they should have been in two groups one consisting of the manufactory and the other of engine-house and place of business. I entirely agree therefore with the interpretation which the learned Judge has placed on the section. I must not however be understood to say that no flour mill can be of a nature which requires a license under this section, but I do say that if a flour mill is to be licensable under this section it must be one from which offensive or unwholesome smells, noises or smoke arise. There is therefore no cause for interference. The application is dismissed with costs. I allow Rs. 20 as counsel's fee.

Civil Revn. No. 447 of 1939, Decided on 9th September 1940, for revision of order of 1st Sub-Judge, 2nd Class (Small Cause Jurisdiction), Nagpur, D/- 12th June 1939.

(a) Acknowledgment—No cause of action can be founded on acknowledgment.

No cause of action can be founded on an acknowledgment. All that an acknowledgment can do is to extend limitation. [P 294 C 2]

(b) Usurious Loans Act (1918)—Disapproval of extortionate claims is based on inherent inequity of transaction.

The disapproval with which extortionate claims are viewed in Courts is based on the inherent inequity of the transaction and not on the capacity in which a plaintiff seeks to enforce it. [P 294 C 2]

(c) Usurious Loans Act (1918 as amended by C. P. Act, 11 of 1934), S. 2 (3) (b)—Act makes no distinction between types of Court to which it is to apply.

As regards the jurisdiction of the Court, the Usurious Loans Act makes no distinction between the types of Court to which it is to apply. It is applied to all suits which fulfil the conditions set out in S. 2 (3) (b), irrespective of the kind of Court in which they are instituted. [P 295 C 2]

(d) Usurious Loans Act (1918 as amended by C. P. Act, 11 of 1934), S. 3 (1) (b) — Suit to enforce agreement by way of settlement of accounts is cognizable by Court of Small Causes —It can reopen accounts under S. 3 (1) (b).

A suit for the enforcement of an agreement by way of settlement of accounts is cognizable by a Court of Small Causes, and the mere fact that accounts have to be taken for the disposal of the suit does not turn the suit into one for an account and therefore does not prevent the Court from taking the accounts. The Usurious Loans Act of 1918 as amended by the Local Act, 11 of 1934, applies to such a suit and the Court of Small Causes can reopen accounts under S. 3 (1) (b). [P 295 C 2; P 296 C 1]

Section 3 is mandatory and the Court is bound to exercise the powers conferred the moment the facts bring the claim within the ambit of the Act. There is no question about payment of court-fees or anything else. [P 296 C 1]

Order. — This revision raises two interesting points. On 10th February 1931, the defendant executed a mortgage in favour of the plaintiff's father for Rs. 2000. Interest was at Re. 1-4-0 per cent. per month. Some years later the plaintiff's father died leaving a will under which the plaintiff was appointed executor to his estate. The plaintiff is acting, and has acted, in this matter, as his father's executor. On 22nd March 1936, there was a settlement of accounts between the plaintiff and the defendant. It is not clear from the plaint what form this settlement took. All that the plaint says is:

That on 22nd March 1936 the defendant named above made account and a sum of Rs. 125 was found due from him on account of interest on mortgage . . . . over and above the principal.

The plaint then continues:

The defendant paid off the principal and acknowledged the amount of Rs. 125 as due from him. The defendant promised to pay the sum of Rs. 125 within a year (by four instalments of Rs. 31-4-0 each).

No instalments were paid and the claim here is for this Rs. 125, which is treated in the plaint as the principal and for interest at 9 per cent. per annum on it. The date of the cause of action is stated to be 22nd March 1937. The only document relied on in the plaint is Ex. P-1 which the plaint describes, and rightly, as an acknowledgment. Now it is clear that no cause of action can be founded on an acknowledgment. All that an acknowledgment can do is to extend limitation. The cause of action here is therefore either the mortgage or a fresh contract which after discharging the mortgage constituted a fresh foundation of liability. No such contract has been pleaded, nor has Ex. P-2, on which reliance was placed in the arguments before me, been relied on or even referred to in the plaint. Therefore, strictly speaking, in the absence of an application for leave to amend, the plaint should have been thrown out in limine on the ground that it disclosed no cause of action. I am averse to technicalities but I see no reason why the law should be strained in favour of a pleader who is exacting his last pound of flesh in the most approved moneylender style. It is true he is acting as an executor but the disapproval with which extortionate claims are viewed in Courts is based on the inherent inequity of the transaction and not on the capacity in which a plaintiff seeks to enforce it. It will be seen that the unfortunate defendant had paid Rs. 1525 as interest on a secured debt in respect of a loan of Rs. 2000 in just over five years, and though he paid as much as Rs. 2000 when the accounts were made up he was not forgiven this paltry sum of Rs. 125. However, I do not think it will be in the interest of either side to throw out the claim on this technical ground though the objection was taken by the defendant in the lower Court. It will only mean further litigation of a much heavier character on the mortgage which will probably end in the same way. I will therefore treat this case, as I have been asked to treat it here by the plaintiff's learned counsel, as one based on a transaction dated 22nd March 1936, which resulted in an agreement settling the accounts on the mortgage and furnishing a fresh foundation of liability in respect of Rs. 125 and its interest.

The question then is whether the Usurious Loans Act of 1918, as amended locally by C. P. Act, 11 of 1934, applies in a case of this kind. The fundamental objection is that this results in a Small Cause Court reopening accounts on a mortgage when a Court of that nature is debarred from entertaining a suit on the mortgage itself. But of course if the Legislature permits this to be done its provisions must be given effect to. Section 2 (3) (b), Usurious Loans Act, states that 'suit to which this Act relates' means any suit—

(b) for the enforcement of . . . . any agreement, whether by way of settlement of account or otherwise, made after the commencement of this Act, in respect of any loan made either before or after the commencement of this Act.

The amended Act came into force on 15th June 1934. The loan on the mortgage was made before the Act came into force (on 10th February 1931), but the section quoted above states expressly that the Act is to apply in respect of any loan made either before or after the commencement of the Act. Therefore whether we take the date of the original Act of 1918 as the crucial date or that of the amended Act of 1934, the mortgage in question is covered by the provision of this sub-section. The sub-section also applies to any agreement whether by way of settlement of account or otherwise, 'made after the commencement of this Act.' The settlement of account in question here was effected on 22nd March 1936, that is to say after the amended Act came into force (and certainly after the original Act). Therefore, it applies to the transaction in suit so far as its date is concerned.

The section also applies to any agreement "whether by way of settlement of account or otherwise." This agreement is, according to the hypothesis on which we are proceeding, by way of settlement of account. If it is not, then as I have said the suit must fail. But if the agreement is not by way of settlement of account, then it is "otherwise" and so is still covered by the Act. That being so, the Act applies completely and all we have to see is whether the matter is beyond the competence of a Court of Small Causes. The various rulings cited in argument about retrospection and the like have no relevance here because there is no room for ambiguity in the language of the Act; nor is there any question about pending proceedings because the suit was instituted long after the Act of 1934 came into operation. It is quite clear, and is so stated in express terms, that the Act is to operate in respect of all suits for the enforcement of agreements made after the commencement of the Act in respect of loans made either before or after its commencement. Those conditions are fulfilled. As regards the jurisdiction of the Court, the Usurious Loans Act makes no distinction between the types of Court to which it is to apply. It is applied to all suits which fulfil the conditions set out above irrespective of the kind of Court in which they are instituted. And S. 3 empowers all Courts without restriction of any kind in which these suits are admitted to exercise the powers conferred by S. 3 (1) (b). These powers enable such Courts (without restriction) to reopen any account already taken between the debtor and the creditor within a limit of 12 years "notwithstanding any agreement purporting to close previous dealings and to create a new obligation." Therefore so far as the Usurious Loans Act is concerned the matter is completely covered.

Turning next to S. 15, Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, the prohibition there is in respect of "suits" excepted from the cognizance of a "Court of Small Causes" and the second schedule sets out the kind of suits excluded. Among them are suits for foreclosure or for redemption, and a suit for accounts. But the present suit is not a suit of that character. It is a suit for the enforcement of an agreement dated 22nd March 1936 and is cognizable by a Court of Small Causes. Once the suit is cognizable a Small Cause Court can exercise all the powers which any ordinary Court dealing with that type of suit can exercise. The Small Cause Courts Act contains no restriction about what the Court may or may not do once the suit is entertained except that in certain matters the procedure of the Court is simplified. It has for instance repeatedly been held that the mere fact that accounts have to be taken for the disposal of the suit does not turn the suit into one for an account and therefore does not prevent the Court from taking the accounts. The same principle applies here. I am therefore of opinion that the Usurious Loans Act of 1918 as amended by the local Act 11 of 1934 applies here.

Once that is accepted then no exception can be taken to what the lower Court has done in this case. But it is argued that it was wrong in ordering the defendant to refund anything when no claim for refund was made and no court-fees paid in respect of it. That however is not what the Act requires. The Act provides special protection to debtors against the extortions of greedy and grasping lenders of money. Its provisions are drastic but there is no need for any person to place himself within its reach. The remedy lies in his own hands and if he does not choose to avail himself of it by exercising the moderation which the Legislature expects of him in his demands he has only himself to thank when the law clamps down on him with a heavy hand. Section 3 is mandatory and the Court is bound to exercise the powers conferred the moment the facts bring the claim within the ambit of the Act. There is no question about payment of court-fees or anything else. The application fails and is dismissed with costs. No counsel's fee as no certificate has been filed.

Criminal Revn. No. 49 of 1941, Decided on 21st May 1941, Report made by Sessions Judge, Nagpur, in Criminal Revision No. 148 of 1940.

Arms Act (1878), S. 19 (f)—Family living jointly in same house — Head of family is presumed to be in possession of unlicensed arms found in house—Presumption is rebuttable—Weight to be attached to presumption varies with circumstances.

In the case of a family whether Hindu or non-Hindu living jointly in the same house the head of the family is presumed to be in possession of the unlicensed arms that may be found in the house. The presumption is rebuttable and the weight to be attached to the presumption must vary according to circumstances. It can easily be rebutted by showing that the room or receptacle in question was in the particular and exclusive possession of one member of the family. The strength of the presumption would also vary according to the improbability that the article owing to its size, etc., could have escaped the notice of the head of the family : ('37) 24 AIR 1937 Pesh 73 and ('29) 16 A I R 1929 Lah 872, Rel. on ; ('32) 19 AIR 1932 All 441 and ('34) 21 A I R 1934 All 548, Ref.

W. C. Dutt, Advocate-General — for the Crown.

Order. — One Harbans Singh, Sikh, has been convicted under S. 19 (f), Arms Act, of being in possession of seven live cartridges (.22 bore) and six caps without a license, and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 25. The question is whether possession has been legally proved against him. The learned Sessions Judge, Nagpur, thinks not and has referred the case under S. 438, Criminal P. C. The learned Advocate-General has argued in support of the conviction. The accused is absent and unrepresented. The facts found are that at the time when the house was searched both the accused Harbans Singh and his younger brother Jagjit Singh, who was accused 2, and their families were living in this house which had been taken on rent from Boodsing (P. W. 5). There is some difference in the evidence between Boodsing and his son Dr. Ramsing (P. W. 1) concerning whether accused took the house in his own name or in that of the younger brother. But that is not very material. The Magistrate finds that when accused 1 took the house on rent he was manager of the family and his younger brother Jagjit Singh joined him later to live there. The cartridges and caps were found in one box and a toy pistol, for which no license was required, was found in another. There is no proof that these boxes belonged to one of the brothers rather than the other. Harbans Singh's defence, which has been disbelieved, was that he never occupied or took on rent this house but lived in another one in circle No. 16 with his parents. The learned Sessions Juege thinks that as the ownership of the box has not been made out and as the two brothers are Sikhs and therefore do not form a joint Hindu family it is impossible to hold the applicant responsible simply because of his being elder. For the Crown it is argued that as the two brothers were living jointly in one house and the elder was managing affairs it does not matter that they were not a Hindu joint family ; in the circumstances there is a presumption that Harbans Singh must have known what was in the house, and he has not at all rebutted that presumption : on the contrary he denied entirely residing in the house, which has been disbelieved.

I am referred to the following cases: 54 ALL 411[1] was a case of a joint Hindu family. It was held that S. 19 (f), Arms Act, did not speak of "exclusive" possession and that there was a presumption that a gun in their house was in the possession and control of all the adult members of the family. The Judge indicated that so far as the section was concerned Hindus were in the same position as Mahomedans or Indian Christians, the point being that the accused was one of the persons who lived in the house and one of the adult male members of the family. In A I R 1934 ALL 548[2] Sulaiman C. J. and King J. said that every such case must be decided on its own facts. There the article was a twelve-inch pistol which was in a kothri occupied by the accused and his sons. It was held that the accused must have been aware of the presence of the pistol. In A I R 1929 Lah 872[3] the accused was presumably a Sikh as his name was Karam Singh. He occupied the house jointly with his wife and his father. It was laid down that in the case of a house occupied by a joint family there is an initial presumption that an article found therein is in the possession of the head of the family. In A I R 1937 Pesh 73[4] three possible inferences are considered which may be drawn when several persons jointly occupy a house. The Court accepted the third view that the head of the house is responsible for unlicensed arms recovered from it unless it is shown that one of the other occupants had exclusive possession of them. The case in 15 Pat 696[5] was relied on. In this last case there was a joint Hindu family. But I do not see why the same principle should not apply to other (non-Hindu) families living jointly in the same house. I agree with the view taken in the Peshawar case. The weight to be attached to the presumption must vary according to circumstances. It could easily be rebutted by showing that the room or receptacle in question was in the particular and exclusive possession of one member of the family. That is not the case here. The strength of the presumption would also vary according to the improbability that the article, owing to its size etc., could have escaped the notice of the head of the family. In the present case the articles are small, but I still think that there is a presumption against Harbans Singh, which he has attempted to rebut by a false plea altogether. I think that the conviction and sentence are proper and should be maintained. The reference is refused.

NIYOGI J.

Shamrao Bhaurao Marathe — Defendant — Appellant

v.

Krishnarao Bhaurao Marathe —
Plaintiff — Respondent.

Second Appeal No. 258 of 1940, Decided on 4th April 1941, from appellate decree of 2nd Addl. Dist. Judge, Nagpur, D/- 9th March 1940.

* Hindu law — Succession — Brothers — Self-acquired property of deceased brother — Brother living with deceased and brother living separate are both entitled to equal shares.

Under the Hindu law while the brothers are regarded as distinct individuals the father and son are regarded as constituting one entity which can be broken up only by a partition. The natural and necessary result of the distinction is that while the son's interest in his father's self-acquired property arises by birth, that of a person in the self-acquired property of his brother arises on the death of the propositus; the property passes by succession and becomes not the ancestral but the self-acquisition of the brother inheriting it. The principle of representation which applies in the case of the devolution of property from father to son does not operate in the case of a brother's succession to a brother. Consequently, the circumstance as to the inheriting brother being joint with or separate from the deceased brother whose property he inherits becomes wholly immaterial. Jointness in estate is a different thing from mere jointness in residence or even mess, for the former involves the conception of a coparcenary. [P 300 C 1, 2]

Consequently a brother by the fact of his mere living together with his deceased brother can be in no better position than the other brother who was living separately, and therefore the property of the deceased brother falls to be regulated entirely by the principle of succession so as to entitle both the brothers to take it in equal shares : ('40) 27 A I R 1940 Cal 157, Approved; Case law discussed. [P 300 C 2]

Judgment. — This is defendant's appeal from the reversing judgment of the second Additional District Judge, Nagpur in Civil Appeal No. 99-A of 1939 delivered on 9th

March 1940. The parties are brothers and the dispute relates to the nature of their right to succession to the moveable and immovable property left by their brother named Raoji who died on 15th April 1938. The respondent plaintiff claimed half share in the said property which is contested by the appellant defendant who claims it entirely for himself on the ground that he was joint with his brother Raoji, or at any rate living with him at his death, and that on that account he became the sole heir to it in preference to the plaintiff who was separate. The trial Court found that the portion of the house marked blue in the map filed with the plaint was Raoji's self-acquired property and that the other portion marked red was the joint property of Raoji and the defendant. As the defendant was partially joint with Raoji, it held that he was entitled to inherit his property entirely to the exclusion of the plaintiff. The lower appellate Court concurred in the trial Court's finding that the house in dispute was the self-acquired property but differed in respect of the site under the house marked red. It however differed from the trial Court in holding that the property being the self-acquired property of Raoji the surviving brothers were entitled to share it equally by inheritance.

On behalf of the appellant an attempt is made to show that the house in dispute was not the self-acquired property of Raoji but that it was the joint property of Raoji and the appellant. I am not much impressed with the contention in view of the clear and unequivocal statement made in the course of the pleadings on behalf of the appellant on 3rd July 1939. In that statement it was admitted that all the property in suit save a portion of the site purchased by the defendant-appellant was the self-acquired property of the deceased Raoji, but it was claimed that as they were joint the appellant was entitled to preference. That statement was made by the appellant's advocate and in the witness-box the defendant admitted that it was made under his instructions. He confirmed the correctness of the statement and stated that he claimed Raoji's estate because he lived with him and was fed by him. In the face of this clear statement made by the advocate the correctness of which was confirmed in the witness-box by the appellant there is no scope left for the contention that the property was joint property and that as such it passed by survivorship to the appellant. Much elaborate arguments were addressed on either side on the point of law involved in the case. Before discussing the law it is desirable to state the relevant facts. Raoji migrated to Nagpur and as he became settled his brothers (the parties to this appeal) followed him. Each of them separately earned his living by personal labour but they were evidently living together under the same roof. The plaintiff began to live separate from Raoji since 1933 or 1934, while the defendant continued to reside with him as before. There was no partition as such of any property.

It is common ground that the brothers had no ancestral property. It is however possible under the Hindu law to create a joint property with all the incidents of coparcenary in the absence of any ancestral nucleus, as for example where brothers living together acquire property by joint labour or with the aid of the funds thrown by them out of their separate acquisitions into the common stock. In the present case there is no evidence that the brothers pooled their resources and treated them as joint fund. To countenance any hypothesis that the property left by Raoji was the common property of the brothers, the defendant Shamrao stated in the witness-box that Raoji and himself were carrying on business of selling milk, firewood and kerosene oil but he was unable to state what the net profits per annum were. It is unnecessary to pursue this line of enquiry in view of the admission that the property in suit was the self-acquired property of the deceased Raoji. The situation was that Raoji and the defendant Shamrao, including or excluding the plaintiff, never intended to throw their acquisitions into the common stock. Raoji purchased one house in execution sale in 1911 and subsequently acquired adjoining land from the municipal committee for extension of his house. The defendant similarly had acquired an area of 440½ square feet on which a portion of the house stands but the evidence does not indicate that it was purchased out of the joint funds. Although Raoji and Shamrao were living together there is no evidence of any intention to pool their resources for the purpose of acquiring joint property. It is for this reason that the defendant was driven to admit that the house left by Raoji was his self-acquired property. Nor is there anything to show that apart from the property in dispute there was any property jointly acquired or possessed by Raoji and Shamrao. Beyond the fact that Shamrao was living with Raoji there is no circumstance to justify the assumption of their having formed themselves into a joint family owning joint property. The fact that the defendant does not claim any part of property left by Raoji on the ground of survivorship proves the absence of any joint property. Thus, the relations between Raoji and Shamrao were not such as to clothe them with rights of co-ownership in respect of any property. In the absence of co-ownership there could be no claim on the ground of survivorship. Consequently the rights of the parties fall to be decided only on the basis of the circumstance that while defendant Shamrao was living with Raoji, the plaintiff was living separate.

The real question therefore is whether the self-acquired property left by a deceased brother passes entirely to a brother living with him (as contradistinguished from being joint with him in property) to the exclusion of another brother who was living separate. In the course of the argument reference is made to 22 Bom 101,[1] 32 Mad 377,[2] 44 Mad 499,[3] 11 W R 308,[4] 17 A L J 151,[5] 5 Luck 649,[6] A I R 1940 Cal 157[7] and A I R 1926 Sind 42.[8] These cases do not all deal with the question of the succession to the self-acquired property of a brother. 13 C P L R 137,[9] 22 Bom 101,[1] 32 Mad 377,[2] 44 Mad 499,[3] 5 Luck 649,[6] 17 A L J 151[5] and 55 Mad 577,[10] are concerned with the question of succession to the self-acquired property of a father and not of succession to that of a brother. The considerations in the case of father's property are different from those arising in the case of property left by a brother. The property of the father which is held in common with his undivided or re-united son is in every sense a coparcenary property which on the death of the father would devolve not by inheritance but by survivorship. The self-acquired property of the father though capable of being alienated at the will of the father becomes ancestral when at his death it devolves on his son. In so far as the son is undivided or re-united or re-born after partition between the father and his other sons, his status vis-a-vis his father is that of a co-owner. Consequently, the self-acquired property left by the father would be in the nature of an accretion to his interest in the joint property and when it devolves on the undivided, the re-united or the son born after partition, it does so as if it were coparcenary property. Hence the preference accorded to the undivided son in respect of succession to the self-acquired property of the father. That is in accordance with the ancient authorities. The Mitakshara enunciates two modes of devolution of property, viz., survivorship and succession. The rule of survivorship applies to joint family property and that of succession applies to property held in absolute severalty. This is expressed in the Mitakshara as follows :

> It (i. e. heritage—Daya) is of two sorts : unobstructed (apratibandha) or liable to obstruction (sapratibandha). The wealth of the father or of the paternal grandfather becomes the property of his sons or grandsons; and that is an inheritance not liable to obstruction. But property devolves on parents (or uncles), brothers and the rest upon the demise of the owner if there be no male issue .... This is an inheritance subject to obstruction (Mitakshara Chap. 1, S. 1, para. 3). Therefore it is a settled point that the property in the paternal or ancestral estate is by birth although the father have independent power in the disposal of effects. .... but he is subject to the control of his sons, in regard to the moveable estate, whether acquired by himself or inherited from his father... (Mitakshara, Chap. 1, S. 1, para. 2).

But in Chap. 1, S. 5, paras. 9 and 10, the Mitakshara concedes that the father has a predominant interest in the property acquired by himself and that therefore the son must acquiesce in the father's disposal of his own acquired property. Sarkar in his work on the Hindu Law at p. 367, relying on the aforesaid passages in the Mitakshara, propounds the law to be that a son's right to the father's self-acquired property arises by birth and notes that the only difference in his rights to the self-acquired as opposed to ancestral property lies in the father's power of disposition in regard to his self-acquired property. Thus it is evident that the son has the same interest (by birth) in either kind of property. Consequently the father's self-acquired property devolves by survivorship on his son and becomes ancestral in his hands. The self-acquired property of the father is thus in its nature a coparcenary property vis-a-vis his son who therefore takes it on his father's death as a surviving coparcener. It must therefore follow that a son who does not fulfil the condition of being a coparcener with his father is not entitled to the father's self-acquired property. That accounts for the preference accorded to the undivided son. The decision of Ranade J. in 22 Bom 101[1] is based on the recognition of this principle. In 5 Luck 649[6] the contrary view was taken and that was apparently due to the misunderstanding of the effect of certain observations made in 17 A L J 151[5] with reference to the son merely living away from the father, as has been explained in 55 Mad 577.[10]

The question is whether the above principle is applicable in the case of brothers. The only distinction which the law recognizes in their case is that between full and half brothers, and that is based on the doctrine of propinquity (under the Mitakshara). A man's relationship to his brother is not so close and vital as that of father to his son. The son under the Vedic text is the alter ego of the father (आत्मा वै पुत्र नामासि) and the word पुत्र (son) is wide enough to embrace a grandson and great-grandson: see 37 ALL 604.[11] It will thus appear that while the brothers are regarded as distinct individuals the father and son are regarded as constituting one entity which can be broken up only by a partition. The natural and necessary result of the distinction is that while the son's interest in his father's self-acquired property arises by birth, that of a person in the self-acquired property of his brother arises on the death of the propositus; the property passes by succession and becomes not the ancestral but the self-acquisition of the brother inheriting it. The principle of representation which applies in the case of the devolution of property from father to son does not operate in the case of a brother's succession to a brother. In view of the fundamental points of difference indicated above the circumstance as to the inheriting brother being joint with or separate from the deceased brother whose property he inherits becomes in my opinion wholly immaterial.

I am aware that in 11 W R 308[4] it was held that a united brother takes in preference to a separated brother. A somewhat different view was taken in A I R 1940 Cal 157.[7] The former case was referred to in A I R 1926 Sind 42[8] on a point which was not of immediate interest in that case. In none of these cases is there any discussion of the principle involved. But whatever can be said in favour of an undivided or a re-united brother, there can be obviously no legal significance in the fact of a brother merely living with the propositus. Jointness in estate is a different thing from mere jointness in residence or even mess, for the former involves the conception of a coparcenary. In the present case the appellant by the fact of his mere living together with his deceased brother was in no better position than the respondent who was living separately. In 11 W R 308[4] the brother who was accorded preference was actually joint in estate with the propositus. The position is made clear in A I R 1940 Cal 157[7] in these words :

> The principle of law according to the Dayabhaga school seems to be that if a brother dies leaving another brother who was living jointly with him that would not entitle the joint brother to have preference over a separated brother unless the former could be said to have reunited.

It will be noticed that the observation draws a pointed distinction between the cases of brothers reunited and brothers merely living together. The conclusion must therefore be that the property of the deceased brother falls to be regulated entirely by the principle of succession so as to entitle the parties to this appeal to take it in equal shares. The lower appellate Court's decree is affirmed and the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Judgment. — This is an appeal from an order of remand passed by the Second Additional District Judge, Nagpur, in Civil Appeal No. 30-A of 1939 delivered on 25th July 1939. The Provincial Government filed the suit out of which this appeal arises for ejectment of the respondent from a piece of land marked by letters A B C D in the map filed with the plaint. It measures 23′ × 38′ and is situate at Nagpur. On 21st December 1914 certain plots including the one in suit were after due demarcation notified in the Government Gazette for being declared nazul. That notification was issued under S. 40, Central Provinces Land Revenue Act, (18 of 1881) then in force. It invited the claimants to submit their claims, if any, in writing within three months. Notification such as the one under S. 40 is deemed to be an advertisement under S. 1, Waste Lands Claims Act, 23 of 1863. No claim was received from any person within the three months time prescribed in the notification; nor was any claim made within three years under S. 18, Waste Lands Claims Act. In 1934 it was discovered that the respondent had encroached upon these lands whereon he was ordered to be ejected under S. 219, Central Provinces Land Revenue Act of 1917. The defendant thereupon filed Civil Suit No. 343-A of 1935 for a declaration of his title and an injunction prohibiting the Provincial Government from disturbing his possession. The Court rejected his claim for a declaration of his title but granted him the relief of injunction on the ground that under the proviso to S. 219, Central Provinces Land Revenue Act of 1917 the Deputy Commissioner could not eject the respondent as the encroachment had been made before the commencement of the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act of 1917. Consequently the appellant has filed the suit for ejectment as stated above.

The only point for determination is whether the respondent is precluded from offering his defence by S. 222, Central Provinces Land Revenue Act. The lower appellate Court relying on 12 Cal 279[1] held that the section did not debar the defence. In the Calcutta case the question was whether any provision of the Waste Lands Claims Act, 23 of 1863, deprived a person who has a good title and has been throughout in possession from defending his rights. That question was answered in the negative. Section 222 is in principle analogous to S. 18, Waste Lands Claims Act. That section runs as follows :

> If at any settlement before this Act came into force, waste lands have been demarcated as the property of the Crown, no claim of any person to, or in respect of, such lands shall be entertained by any civil Court after the expiry of three years from the date of such demarcation.

The contention put forward on behalf of the appellant is that the word 'claim' used in that section is comprehensive enough to include defence. The use of that word in cls. (g), (j), (m), (p) and (s) of S. 220, Central Provinces Land Revenue Act, indeed tends to support the contention. That section excepts certain matters altogether from the jurisdiction of the civil Courts. If it had been the intention of the Legislature to exclude such a claim as is under consideration from the jurisdiction of civil Courts the subject-matter of S. 222 would have been included in S. 220. As regards the matters which are excepted from the jurisdiction of the civil Courts under S. 220 exclusive jurisdiction has been given to the revenue authorities. The subject-matter of S. 222 is waste lands which are demarcated as the property of the Crown after some enquiry made by the revenue or settlement authorities. The lands are so declared and demarcated as the property of the Crown because of the presumption arising from the absence of any claim by any private individual to the lands within the time prescribed by the notification. The failure of the owner to assert his claim even when invited to do so cannot destroy his title to the property on any known principle of law or natural justice. Section 222, Central Provinces Land Revenue Act, debars the claim after the expiry of three years from the date of demarcation. The three years period laid down in that section is for making a claim for obtaining a particular remedy, namely the release of the land from the notification. It has therefore the effect of the rule of limitation. The rule of law is that there is no limitation against defence : see 20 C W N 957.[2]

It does not appear reasonable to assume that the three years period specified in S. 222, Central Provinces Land Revenue Act, was intended to have the effect of extinguishing the right to property. Even S. 28, Limitation Act, applies to persons out of possession and not to persons who are in possession. It does not prevent the persons in possession from making use of any legal defence available to them for maintaining their possession. I may for instance refer to 14 Bom 222.[3] In that case the plaintiffs induced the defendant by fraud to execute in their favour a deed of sale of the property in dispute. They neither paid the purchase money nor obtained possession of the property. More than 12 years after the transaction the plaintiffs sued for possession of the property on the basis of the sale deed. The defendant impeached the sale as fraudulent. The plaintiffs' contention was that as the defendant had not sued to set aside the deed on the ground of fraud within three years under Art. 91 or Art. 95, Limitation Act or within 12 years from the date of the sale his plea of fraud was barred by limitation. That plea was overruled on the ground that the rule of limitation does not apply to a defendant who relies on his actual possession which was never disturbed. Applying this principle, it is evident that the respondent's failure to lodge his claim within three years specified in S. 222, Central Provinces Land Revenue Act cannot deprive him of his right to defend his possession. Any view to the contrary would be repugnant to natural justice.

Section 222, Central Provinces Land Revenue Act, is indeed, capable of being viewed either as laying down a rule of limitation or prescription. In the former case, the failure to assert a claim within the period specified in that section would only bar the remedy. In the latter case, it would destroy the right but the one essential condition for the application of the rule of prescription is that the claimant must be out of possession. The rule of prescription cannot operate against a person in possession. Hence it is clear that that section cannot be interpreted as laying down a rule of prescription. This view derives support from the proviso to sub-s. (1) of S. 219, Central Provinces Land Revenue Act, which forbids the Deputy Commissioner from ejecting a person whose possession began before the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act of 1917 came into force. In such a case the Crown must institute a suit (as it has done in the present case) to recover possession. If the Legislature lays the onus on the Crown of proving its right, it cannot consistently debar the defence. For the foregoing reasons I agree with the view taken by the lower appellate Court that the effect of S. 222, Central Provinces Land Revenue Act, is only to preclude a suit and not to debar the defence based on title. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

POLLOCK AND GRUER JJ.

Emperor

v.

Mt. Gangoo — Accused.

Criminal Ref. No. 103 of 1941, Decided on 9th May 1941, made by Sessions Judge, Nagpur, D/- 4th February 1941.

Penal Code (1860), Ss. 307 and 328—Powdered glass administered—Intention to cause death present—Offence comes under S. 307 not Section 328.

Powdered glass is a mechanical irritant which may cause death. When it comes in contact with the lining of the stomach and the intestines it injures the mucous membrane and death may be the result of the congestion and shock so caused. If however, it is finely powdered and has not any sharp points or if it is well mixed with bulky food it need not cause any bad effects. The administration of powdered glass is therefore an act capable of causing death. The degree of probability should not enter into the question as it would be a very uncertain criterion to apply in deciding whether the act comes under S. 307 or S. 328. To bring the case under S. 307 it is sufficient if death is a possible result and if the intention is to cause death. [P 303 C 1, 2; P 304 C 1]

W. C. Dutt, Advocate-General — for the Crown.

N. B. Chandurkar — for Accused.

Order. — Mt. Gangoo Kunbin was tried with the aid of a jury for an offence under S. 307, Penal Code—attempt to murder her husband Dhanba by the administration of powdered glass in food. The jury brought in a unanimous verdict of not guilty stating that they could not decide that she had administered glass. This verdict has not been accepted by the Sessions Judge, Nagpur, who has referred the case to this Court under S. 307, Criminal P. C. We have heard learned counsel for the appellant and the learned Advocate-General for the Crown and are fully convinced that the verdict of the jury is perverse. There is clear evidence that powdered glass had been mixed in the flour out of which the bread was made which was served to Dhanba by his wife Mt. Gangoo and partly eaten by him. Powdered glass was detected by the chemical examiner in the flour, in pieces of chapati made out of it and in faecal matter passed by Dhanba after he had eaten the bread. In the committing Magistrate's Court Gangoo had admitted having cooked food on that Monday morning and having served bread to her husband. In the Sessions Court she changed and said that it was her husband's grand-mother who cooked and served the food. There is nothing to support that, and it has not been suggested in cross-examination to the witnesses. Some attempt is now made to argue that proof is lacking that the powdered glass was put into the bread by the accused. We consider that the prosecution evidence leads to no other conclusion. Dhanba (P. W. 1) deposes that Ramchandra Patel asked his wife why she had put in glass and she said it was because she wanted to kill him. Ramchandra himself had corroborated this in his statement in the lower Court which in the Sessions Court he admitted to be a true one. Nilkanth, P.W. 3, deposed that accused said nothing when asked by Ramchandra, but later on he stated that she admitted to Doma having administered powdered glass and being asked by him what happened if a man was given powdered glass she said that he died. Doma himself said :

> It is true when I asked her again at the house of Kashirao that she had admitted that she put the powdered glass in.

In addition to this we have the conduct of the accused who took the Sub-Inspector and witnesses to a field and pointed out two stones, (Arts. E and F) on which she said she had pounded her bangles. 10 to 20 pieces of glass were recovered from there (Art. G). The particles in the case are blue and green, corresponding to the colours of the bangles worn by the accused. This discovery made by the accused is strong corroboration of the truth of her confession to the witnesses. We find therefore without doubt that she did administer powdered glass in the bread and that according to her confession her intention was to kill her husband. The question still remains whether the offence is one under S. 307 or only one under S. 328, Penal Code. The standard text-books of medical jurisprudence show that though powdered glass is not strictly speaking a poison it is in India popularly believed to be actively poisonous, and it is in fact a mechanical irritant which may cause death. When it comes in contact with the lining of the stomach and the intestines it injures the mucous membrane and death may be the result of the congestion and shock so caused. If however it is finely powdered and has not any sharp points or if it is well mixed with bulky food it need not cause any bad effects. In the present case the particles were large enough to be easily detected and the amount was considerable, as three bangles had been ground down. The intended victim did not eat the whole of the bread and he was given a purgative at the dispensary: hence he did not really become ill. In these circumstances, does S. 307, Penal Code, apply? It says :

> Whoever does any act with such intention or knowledge, and under such circumstances that, if he by that act caused death, he would be guilty of murder, etc.

We need not consider cases in which the act could not possibly have caused death, for instance, the attempted firing of an unloaded gun. In the present case the administration of powdered glass could have caused death although of course it may be said that survival was more probable than otherwise. Does the section then apply where a fatal result was possible but not very probable? The learned Advocate-General referred us to three cases : 1 Rang 209[1] is distinguishable as there, although the trigger was pulled it was not proved that the gun was loaded, and it might have been that the appellant was merely trying to frighten the complainant. It was therefore held that the act of the appellant could not per se possibly cause death. In 14 ALL 38[2] the trigger of a loaded blunderbuss was pulled, but the cap did not explode and so the gun failed to go off. Straight J. laid down the principle that if a person who has an evil intent does an act which is the last possible act that he could do towards the accomplishment of a particular crime that he has in his mind he is not entitled to pray in his aid an obstacle intervening not known to himself. The appellant was therefore convicted under S. 307, Penal Code. In 56 Bom 434[3] two shots from a revolver were fired, but owing to defective ammunition or to their striking a leather wallet and currency notes in the pocket of the intended victim they did not take effect. The Judges there followed the reasoning of Straight J. in 14 ALL 38[2] in preference to that in the older case in 4 Bom H C R 17.[4] That case was also distinguished on the facts, and in the case before them it was pointed out that it had not been satisfactorily established that the act of the accused was not one capable of causing death in the ordinary course. The conviction under S. 307 was therefore upheld. 4 Bom H C R Cr 17[4] has been referred to in A I R 1935 Nag 177[5] in which incised wounds had been caused by an axe. Subhedar A. J. C. accepted the principle that in order to bring the case under S. 307 the act must be capable of causing death in the natural and ordinary course of things, or in other words, that death might be caused if the act took effect. Applying that principle we think that the administration of powdered glass was certainly an act capable of causing death. We do not think that the degree of probability should enter into the question. It would be a very uncertain criterion to apply. In our view it is sufficient if death was a possible result and if the intention was to cause death. Both these factors are present in the case before us. We therefore hold that S. 307 does apply. The point is of little practical importance so far as this reference is concerned as S. 328 certainly could be applied and we do not propose to inflict even the maximum penalty allowed by that section.

The accused in this case is a young woman, apparently not more than 17 or 18 years of age. She had been living unhappily with her husband and does not seem to have been well treated by him. No doubt such reactions by wives against their husbands must be met by substantial penalties, but taking into account the detention and suspense already undergone by the accused we now sentence her to two years' rigorous imprisonment under S. 307, Penal Code, to take effect from this date.

Misc. Appeal No. 22 of 1940, Decided on 4th April 1941, from order of 2nd Addl. Dist. Judge, Nagpur, D/- 9th January 1940.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 41, R. 23, O. 43, R. 1 (u) and O. 7, R. 11 — Preliminary point, explained — Words "disposed of the suit" in O. 41, R. 23 literally apply to rejection of plaint —Appeal from order rejecting plaint under O. 7, R. 11—Appellate Court setting aside order and remanding case — Order of remand falls under O. 41, R. 23 and is appealable under O. 43, Rule 1 (u).

A preliminary point is one which when determined in favour of the plaintiff permits the progress of the suit but when determined against him concludes the suit. The words "disposed of the suit" in O. 41, R. 23 literally apply to the case of rejection of a plaint. The order rejecting a plaint has the force of a decree under S. 2 (2), and the rejection of the plaint brings about the disposal of the suit. When an appeal is preferred against an order rejecting a plaint which has the force of a decree and the appellate Court sets aside that order and remands the case for the trial of the issues arising in the case, the order of remand must be treated as one under O. 41, R. 23 so as to give a right of appeal to the aggrieved party under O. 43, R. 1 (u): ('30) 17 A I R 1930 Nag 295, Rel. on; ('22) 9 A I R 1922 Mad 505 (FB), Approved; ('37) 24 A I R 1937 Lah 380, Dissent. Where in the course of the suit by the plaintiff for possession of his share in a house the defendant suddenly springs a surprise upon the plaintiff by raising the plea that the court-fee is not sufficient as the value of the house is much more than that described in the plaint, the plaintiff is entitled to an extension of time to make good the deficiency in court-fee. The refusal to extend time in such a case amounts to improper exercise of discretion. [P 305 C 2]

G. R. Pradhan and P. Lobo—for Respondent 1.

Judgment.—This is defendant 1's appeal from the order of remand made by the Second Additional District Judge, Nagpur, in Civil Appeal No. 43 of 1939 on 9th January 1940. Respondent 1 instituted the suit out of which this appeal arises for a declaration that the sale deed dated 4th March 1920 executed by his brother for himself and on his behalf was bogus and fraudulent and for possession of his half share in the house. At a somewhat advanced stage in the suit the appellant raised the pleas that the value of the house was Rs. 8000 and that the plaintiff was bound to pay court-fees on Rs. 4000, the value of his half share in the house. The trial Court found that the value of the house was Rs. 6000 and that the plaintiff was liable to pay court-fees on Rs. 3000. The plaintiff was allowed to make good the deficient court-fees which he was unable to do with the result that his plaint was rejected under O. 7, R. 11, Civil P. C. The plaintiff having appealed to the lower appellate Court, that Court concurred in the trial Court's finding that the value of the house is Rs. 6000 but was of opinion that the plaintiff was not liable to pay court-fees on the value of the improvements made by the purchaser (appellant) which enhanced the value of the house to Rs. 6000. It further held that the trial Court ought to have extended time to enable the plaintiff to make good the deficiency.

A preliminary point is raised on behalf of the plaintiff against the tenability of this appeal on the ground that the remand order was not one based under O. 41, R. 23, Civil P. C., liable to appeal under O. 43, R. 1 (u), Civil P. C. Reliance is placed on A I R 1937 Lah 380.[1] Although there is a discussion in that case as to whether the appellate Court's order remanding the suit after setting aside an order of rejection of the plaint was one made under O. 41, R. 23, the decision of the case actually rested on the view that rejection of the plaint for non-compliance of S. 80, Civil P. C., was not to be regarded as one falling under O. 7, R. 11. I fail to see why rejection of a plaint cannot be regarded as a preliminary point in an appeal from the rejection of a plaint. In 45 Mad 900[2] the Madras High Court defined the preliminary point as any point whether of fact or law the decision of which avoids the necessity for the full hearing of the suit. In 27 N L R 226[3] I held that a preliminary point is one which when determined in favour of the plaintiff permits the progress of the suit but when determined against him concludes the suit. In that case I had envisaged the possibility of the lower appellate Court's remanding the suit on setting aside the rejection of a plaint was an order falling under O. 41, R. 23, Civil P. C. I see no strong reason with due respect to the view taken in A I R 1937 Lah 380[1] to depart from the opinion expressed in the aforesaid case.

2. ('22) 9 AIR 1922 Mad 505 : 69 I C 828 : 45 Mad 900 : 43 M L J 354 (FB), Raman Nayar v. Krishnan Nambudripad.
3. ('30) 17 A I R 1930 Nag 295 : 128 I C 407 : 27 N L R 226, Govinda v. Baliram.

The preliminary points may arise before or after admission of the plaint. In either case if the decision on the preliminary point is against the plaintiff that would stop the further progress of the suit so as to compel the Court to dispose of the suit finally without deciding the merits of the controversy. The words "where the Court from whose decision" and the "decree is reversed in appeal" occurring in R. 23 of O. 41, are significant. The words used are "disposed of the suit" and not "decided the suit". Those words literally apply to a case of rejection of a plaint. The order rejecting a plaint has the force of a decree under S. 2 (2), Civil P. C., and the rejection of the plaint brings about the disposal of the suit. When an appeal is preferred against an order rejecting a plaint which has the force of a decree and the appellate Court sets aside that order it has to remand the case for the trial of the issues arising in the case. The order of remand could not be made under any other provision of law except under O. 41, R. 23, Civil P. C. Consequently the lower appellate Court's order remanding the suit must be treated as one under O. 41, R. 23, Civil P. C., so as to give a right of appeal to the aggrieved party under O. 43, R. 1 (u). I therefore do not see my way to accede to the contention raised on behalf of the plaintiff that an appeal does not lie.

The lower appellate Court was obviously wrong in its view that the plaintiff was liable to pay court-fees only on the value of the house as it stood at the time when it was sold in 1931. That view would indeed have been sound had the plaintiff only asked for possession of the house after dismantling the additions made by the purchaser but in the plaint he has clearly asked for possession of the house as it stood on the day of the institution of the suit including the improvements made by the purchaser. He cannot on the one hand get the benefit of the improvements and on the other hand refuse to pay court-fees on the value of the improvements. I therefore see no reason to depart from the lower appellate Court's view as to the granting of the extension of time.

It rightly held that the trial Court failed to exercise proper discretion in refusing to extend time. The trial Court failed to advert to the important circumstance that the plaintiff was taken by surprise when during the course of the suit it was suddenly sprung upon him. The plaintiff only wanted extension of time which could well have been granted. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Second Appeal No. 470 of 1938, Decided on 27th March 1941, from appellate decree of Dist. Judge, Raipur, D/- 5th April 1938.

(a) Lessor and Lessee — Finding that lease was genuine is one of fact.

A finding that the lease was a genuine transaction is a finding of fact. [P 306 C 2]

(b) Hindu law — Alienation — Legal necessity — Finding that there was no legal necessity is of fact.

The finding that there was no legal necessity for the alienation is one of fact and must be accepted in second appeal. [P 306 C 2]

(c) C. P. Tenancy Act (1 of 1920), Ss. 6 and 12 — Hindu widow cannot surrender her holding so as to defeat reversioner (Obiter)

A Hindu widow cannot surrender her holdings so as to defeat the reversioner, the reason being that the Tenancy Act secures the devolution of the tenure to the heirs specified in the Act and the limited owner cannot defeat the expectations of those heirs by surrender. [P 306 C 2]

(d) C. P. Land Revenue Act (2 of 1917), S. 188 — Permanent lease of khudkast land by Hindu widow granted in course of village management — Lease is binding on reversioner — Burden of proof.

The moment a landlord grants a permanent lease of his khudkast land, the lessee becomes an occupancy tenant and once that position is reached his tenure is governed by the C. P. Tenancy Act. Consequently, a permanent lease of her khudkast land granted by a Hindu widow in the course of village management in the capacity of a lambardar is binding on the reversioner and the tenant is entitled to the protection of the C. P. Tenancy Act : ('34) 21 A I R 1934 Nag 103, Approved : ('17) 4 A I R 1917 P C 33, Disting. [P 307 C 2]

C. P. Tenancy law does permit the leasing of lands and therefore the burden of displacing the tenancy created by a limited owner would lie on the person who pleaded that the act was not done in the ordinary course of village management. It does not lie on the tenant to show that there was legal necessity, though of course if that is established it would secure his tenure : ('18) 5 A I R 1918 Nag 218, Expl. [P 307 C 1]

Judgment. — This is a case of first impression or so I am told, and in any case I know of no authority which covers the point at issue except A I R 1934 Nag 103,[1] which has been cited in the Courts below, nor have counsel on either side been able to show me any ruling which is directly in point. The suit is by a reversioner for a declaration that an alienation in the shape of a permanent lease of khudkast land by a Hindu widow is not binding after her life time. Defendant 1 is the widow. On 31st October 1935 she leased the khudkast lands in suit to defendant 2 in perpetuity for a consideration of Rs. 1000. The defendant's case is that he (defendant 2) thereupon became an occupancy tenant and so is entitled to the protection afforded to such tenants by the Tenancy Act. The plaintiff's case, as set out in the plaint, is that this lease was for a fictitious consideration. Defendant 1 denied this and also went out of her way, in my opinion, wholly unnecessarily, to set up a plea of legal necessity. But, in addition, she pleaded in the alternative that in any event defendant 2 became a tenant. In reply the plaintiff reiterated his allegation about the fictitious nature of the consideration. The lower appellate Court finds that the consideration pleaded, namely Rs. 1000 was paid. It also finds that possession was delivered and upholds the lease as a genuine transaction. It also finds that there was no legal necessity. All these findings must of course be accepted as they are all findings of fact. The question is whether this is enough to enable the reversioner to succeed. His case is that the Hindu law applies to all tenancies and that under that law there can be no alienation by a limited owner except for necessity. This alienation was not for necessity and therefore does not enure beyond the lifetime of the widow.

It can be accepted at once that the Hindu law applies to tenancies in the Central Province up to a point but in my opinion not beyond that. It applies, for instance, in all matters of devolution and for that reason it has been held, after a considerable difference of opinion, that a Hindu widow cannot surrender her holdings so as to defeat the reversioner. But the reason, in my opinion, is that the Tenancy Act secures devolution of the tenure to the heirs specified in the Act. Therefore no limited holder can defeat the expectation of those heirs by a surrender. That however is an entirely different matter from the one under consideration because what we are dealing with here is a matter of village management. It is, in my opinion, beyond dispute that a widow has the right of village management and can give leases in the exercise of that right, and the question in every such case resolves itself into, not whether there was legal necessity for the lease, though that might be relevant in some cases, but whether the act was done in the ordinary course of village management. The burden of displacing the tenancy would lie on the person who pleaded that the act was not done in the ordinary course of village management. It does not lie on the tenant to show that there was legal necessity, though of course if that is established it would secure his tenure. The difference between a case of that kind and a case of ordinary alienation is that under the Tenancy Act a widow is entitled to manage the estate and is entitled in the exercise of that management to give out leases. It cannot be presumed in such circumstances that she has abused the rights. In the case of alienations, the widow has no right to alienate the family estate except for the purposes permitted by the Hindu law and the burden then is on the person seeking to justify an act which the Hindu law does not permit. The tenancy law does permit the leasing of lands. Therefore the burden is on the person who sets out to establish that something has been done which the law does not allow.

1. ('34) 21 A I R 1934 Nag 103 : 149 I C 687, Imrat Bai v. Mt. Phula.

I cannot see that a reversioner is in any better or stronger position than a cosharer whose rights are vested. If a Hindu widow happens to be a cosharer in a village and happens to be appointed as lambardar, then no cosharer can challenge a lease of khudkast lands by her unless he is able to allege and prove that it was not an act of ordinary village management. I cannot see how a reversioner whose interests are not vested can be in a better position. It would lead to very anomalous results if that were so, for, whereas the cosharers would be bound by the tenancy so created, the reversioner would be entitled to set it aside. It would also lead to other inconveniences, for, a tenant would have to prove each time a widow died that his tenancy was given in the ordinary course of village management, and that I do not think would be a desirable view to take.

14 N L R 133[2] at p. 135 was cited by the learned counsel for the appellant for the proposition that a lease is a transfer and therefore when given lis pendens the usual rule applies and that therefore if a party to a litigation is affected by the transfer it cannot affect his rights. A decision of the Privy Council in 40 Mad 709[3] was also cited for the proposition that a permanent lease amounts to a transfer and that a limited owner cannot make a transfer of this kind except for necessity. But the Privy Council case was not dealing with an agricultural tenancy. So far as the Nagpur case is concerned, Batten A. J. C. recognized that a lease given in the ordinary course of village management would hold good even though given lis pendens, but he did not decide where the burden of proof lay. He held that on the facts before him, (that was also the decision of the lower Court), the circumstances disclosed that the real intention of the lessor was to save some of the property in suit for a member of his family and that therefore the lease in that case had not been given in the ordinary course of village management. That however does not assist us in determining where the burden of proof should lie, though with the principle of the decision I of course entirely agree.

A I R 1934 Nag 103[1] is in point here. There a Hindu widow executed a permanent lease of khudkast and sir lands. Pollock J. (A. J. C. as he then was) held, following the Privy Council decision to which I have just referred, that a permanent lease was a transfer which a widow could not make without necessity. But he held that, so far as the khudkast lands were concerned, the permanency of the tenure was derived not from the lease but from the Tenancy law and he held that the lessee who became first an ordinary and then an occupancy tenant was protected. That, in my opinion, is the exact position which arises here. The moment the lease was given, the defendant became an occupancy tenant, and once that position is reached, his tenure is governed by the usual conditions obtaining under the Act. Great stress was laid in argument upon S. 25, C. P. Tenancy Act, and it was argued that the wording of the section, which is that "an occupancy tenant shall not be ejected from his holding by his landlord except . . . . " indicates that it is only the landlord who lets the tenant into possession and those who derive title through this landlord cannot eject the tenant, and that this affords him no protection as against the reversioner. That is an argument with which

2. ('18) 5 A I R 1918 Nag 218 : 46 I C 762 : 14 N L R 133, Shri Ganesh v. Pandurang.

3. ('17) 4 A I R 1917 P C 33 : 39 I C 722 : 40 Mad 709 : 44 I A 147 (P C), Palaniappa Chetty v. Devasikamony Pandara Sannadhi.

I am not able to agree. It is true the reversioner does not derive title through the widow, but it is equally true that the tenure devolves under the ordinary law and that the moment the reversioner succeeds after the widow, he becomes the landlord of the village and therefore of all the tenants in that village. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Civil Revn. No. 23 of 1940, Decided on 29th November 1940, to revise order of District Judge, Amraoti, D/- 24th August 1939.

(a) Limitation Act (1908), S. 5 — Revision application—Delay due to doubt raised by conflicting decisions as to whether appeal or revision lay—Court is justified in condoning delay.

Where the reason assigned for the delay in filing a revision application was the doubt which conflicting decisions had raised as to whether an appeal or a revision lay :

Held that delay could be condoned. [P 308 C 2]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 105 and O. 47, R. 7—Scope—Order previous to judgment and decree — Application for review of order — Review rejected — Appeal against judgment and decree —Matters in review raised in appeal—Appellant can do so under S. 105 but attack against review order will be limited to O. 47, R. 7.

An application for review of the previous order was filed on the date of judgment in the case. The application for review was rejected and the judgment in the case was delivered. In appeal against the judgment and decree the matters raised in petition for review were again raised :

Held, that this could be done under S. 105 but attack against review order would be limited to Order 47, R. 7. [P 309 C 2; P 310 C 1]

(c) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 151—Scope—Remand —Trial of lower Court not radically defective—Case should not be remanded under S. 151.

Before S. 151 can be resorted to for remanding a case, the trial of case by lower Court ought to be so radically defective as not to amount to trial at all; and where this is not the case provisions of S. 151 cannot be availed of : ('40) 27 A I R 1940 Nag 349, Rel. on. [P 310 C 2]

(d) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 41, Rr. 25, 26 —Remand for recording evidence and findings on issues not previously determined by trial Court —Judgment and decree by lower Court after compliance of remand order — Decree should be set aside and judgment should be regarded as findings contemplated by O. 41, Rr. 25 and 26, and proceedings after decree as proceedings contemplated by these rules.

If the remand is not under O. 41, R. 23, then no appeal lies against the remand order. The proper course to be followed by the appellate Court in remanding case for recording of evidence and findings on issues not previously determined is to retain seisin and send the case back for the recording of evidence and findings on the issues which the trial Court had not determined. The appellate Court then should hear objections to these findings and pass its own decree. Where this is not done and a decree is passed by the trial Court after remand then that decree should be set aside but all its proceedings up to that decree, including its judgment after remand should remain, with this difference that the judgment will be regarded as the findings contemplated by O. 41, Rr. 25 and 26 and the proceedings will be treated as proceedings contemplated by these rules. [P 310 C 2]

Order. — This revision was filed beyond time. The application was originally filed as an appeal and as an appeal it was within time, but Grille J., decided that the matter should be dealt with as a revision, so I have now to decide whether the delay should be condoned. The reason assigned for the delay is the doubt which conflicting decisions have raised as to whether an appeal lies or a revision. I think there is enough doubt on the point to justify this contention and so condone the delay. Next a preliminary objection is raised. The application is against a remand order. It is said that trial Court proceeded with the case after the order of remand and a decree has now been passed and that therefore the only remedy left is an appeal against the decree. I need not enter into this because I am of opinion that the application must fail on other grounds. The revision is against an order of remand made in the following circumstances. On 23rd June 1938 the case had been fixed for evidence in the first Court. The plaintiff had no witnesses present and an application which he made for the admission of two documents was dismissed. The trial Court recorded the fact that the plaintiff had not summoned any witnesses and that he had none present and so closed the plaintiff's case. The defendants naturally did not call any evidence either and also closed their case. The case was therefore closed all'round on 27th June 1938 as fixed for judgment. On that day the plaintiff filed an application for review of the previous order. The trial Court decided to hear it and so postponed delivery of judgment. On 17th December 1938 the application for review was rejected and judgment in the case was delivered. The plaintiff then appealed to the appellate Court against the judgment and decree and among other points pressed again the matters which he had raised in his petition for review. The appellate Court held that the application for review was not really one for review but an application for revival of the proceedings and that the order of 17th December 1938 was an interlocutory order which merged in the final decree. Therefore the learned Judge held that he had power to enquire into these questions under S. 105, Civil P. C. This is attacked in revision.

It is admitted that if no application for review had been filed the order of 27th June 1938 could have been questioned in the appellate Court under S. 105. But it is contended, the moment there was a review against that order it merged in the order passed on the application for review and as no appeal lay against it it became final and so the matters decided by it could not be reagitated in the appellate Court. It was argued that S. 105 is controlled by O. 47, R. 7. I was referred to Chitaley's Civil Procedure Code, volume II, p. 826 where it is stated that an order granting a review is only appealable on the grounds mentioned in O. 47, R. 7, and therefore if the order is challenged on an appeal from the final decree it can only be challenged on the grounds specified under O. 47, R. 7. This it is said shows that S. 105 is controlled by O. 47, R. 7. I think there is some misunderstanding in the argument which can be cleared up if the matter is viewed algebraically. There are really three stages to consider. First of all, there is the original order (and perhaps decree). We will call that X. Then follows an application for review. But before that application can be entertained the provisions of O. 47, R. 1, must be attracted and the Court has to decide whether new and important matter has been discovered, or whether there is some mistake or error apparent on the face of the record, etc. If the Court comes to the conclusion that one or other of these grounds exist, then it decides that the review can be entertained. That decision it embodies in an order Y. The third stage is the final decree or order Z. The Court for example admits the fresh evidence, reconsiders its original order X and makes a fresh order Z. In many cases the second and third stages may be indistinguishable for the reason that the Court does not pass two separate orders but decides for example that there is an error on the face of the record and then and there alters its original order X and at once passes its final order Z. But technically the two stages are distinct however much they may be merged in one order. The decision that there is an error apparent on the face of the record, or whatever else the decision is, must always be there, and so also the decision that affects the original order X in such a way that it must be changed to Z. The distinction between the two is clearly brought out in the latter part of Order 47, Rule 7 (1) :

> Such objection may be taken at once by an appeal from the order granting the application or in any appeal from the final order or decree passed or made in the suit.

Once this is appreciated then it is possible to follow what O. 47, R. 7, and the cases referred to by Chitaley mean. O. 47, R. 7, states that when there is an appeal against Y, then the appeal only lies on the grounds set out in R. 7. It does not prevent an appeal against X in the ordinary way if the stage Z has not been reached, that is to say, if X is not altered. But once the stage Z is reached, then X disappears and is replaced by Z and thereafter the aggrieved party has two remedies. He can either appeal against Y or against Z. If he does the former and succeeds, Z goes and is replaced by X. If he does the latter, then Y remains and the matter resolves itself into an ordinary appeal against Z. If however in attacking Z the appellant also wishes to attack Y, then he is limited to the grounds set out in O. 47, R. 7, so far as his attack on Y is concerned.

A more concrete example will illustrate what I mean. A sues B on a loan. The defence is taken that the suit is out of time. B succeeds and the suit is dismissed. (This is what I have termed X). A is aggrieved and applies for review on the ground that he has discovered a document which operates as an acknowledgment and so brings his claim within time. The Court decides that this is now an important matter and entertains the review. (This is the order Y). It thereupon rehears the case and in spite of the defendant's opposition holds that the document is an acknowledgment which saves limitation and then decrees the claim. (This is the final decree which I have termed Z). This time B is aggrieved and he can do one of two things. He can appeal against Y, but if he does so he is limited to the narrow grounds set out in O. 47, R. 7. He cannot attack either X or Z. If he succeeds in his appeal, then Y is set aside and that means that Z goes too, and that results in a restoration of X without modification. But B is not limited to this position. He can also appeal against the fresh decree Z on all the usual grounds. Consider what any other rule would mean. Take a large claim for over a lac on a promissory note. If the acknowledgment in the case put had been produced in the first instance and the claim had been decreed on the strength of it B would have been entitled to appeal to the High Court and possibly from there to the Privy Council. He could have attacked this acknowledgment on its merits. He could have contended that it did not amount in law to an acknowledgment, or that it was a forgery, or that it did not bear his signature. But if the present contention is sound, and if A, instead of producing the document at the trial, was allowed to do so in review, then B would be completely shut out from attacking the document on its merits. He would be confined to the plea that it was not new matter and that it was within his opponent's knowledge and could have been produced before the decree was passed, etc. It may well be that he is not in a position to do this though he is able to attack the document on its merits. It would, in my opinion, be absurd to hold that he is shut out from doing so and that he cannot attack the new and altered decree Z except upon the narrow grounds permitted by O. 47, R. 7. I am quite clear that he can and that O. 47, R. 7, has no reference to Z. It only refers to Y. I repeat, however, that if B chooses to attack Y in an appeal against Z, then in so far as the attack on Y is concerned he is still limited as aforesaid.

But all this does not really concern the present case because the argument raised and the authorities cited refer to cases in which the application for review is allowed and not to one in which it is rejected. In the present case the application was rejected and, therefore, we have never reached the further stage with which the authorities cited were dealing. If the application is rejected then the original order remains and it can be dealt with just as if there had never been an application for review. There can be no doubt that if the review proceedings are ignored, then the order complained of could have been attacked in the appeal against the decree under S. 105. The lower Court, therefore, had jurisdiction to entertain the appeal. The next question is whether the case was rightly remanded. It is contended on the strength of I L R (1940) Nag 538[1] that the lower Court had no power to remand and that it should have dealt with the case itself after re-settling the issues and after taking such further evidence as it thought fit. It is contended that the first Court's decision was not on a preliminary point and that, therefore, none of the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code permitting remand applied. I think there is substance in this contention. Section 151 can very seldom be resorted to. The trial would have to be so radically defective as not to amount to a trial at all before its provision could be availed of and that in my opinion was not the case here. The difficulty of holding otherwise will be seen at once in this case.

If the remand is not one under O. 41, R. 23, then no appeal lies against the remand order and this Court's powers in revision are very limited. It would not for example be able to entertain questions relating to the correctness of the decision of the appellate Court on the merits of its order of remand. This might result—I do not decide the question here and say that it would—but it might result in the remand order being final, whereas had the appellate Court retained seisin and passed the decree itself it is possible that the point on which the first Court's decision was reversed could have been contested in second appeal. Again, I do not say it can be, but it might. At the same time the practical difference, except as regards appeal is not very different. Had the proper course been followed the appellate Court would have retained seisin and sent the case back for the recording of evidence and findings on the issues which the trial Court had not determined. The appellate Court would then have heard objections to those findings and have passed its own decree. I will, therefore, place all the proceedings up to this point on the same footing as if the proper procedure had been followed. The result is as follows. The decree of the trial Court after remand is set aside but all its proceedings up to that decree, including its judgment after remand, will remain, with this difference that that judgment will be regarded as the findings contemplated by O. 41, Rr. 25 and 26, and the proceedings will be treated as the proceedings contemplated by these rules. I allow 14 days from the date of my order to file objections to the appellate Court, and direct the appellate Court to hear those objections and then pass its own decree. The costs of this revision will abide the event. Counsel's fee Rs. 40 for applicant and Rs. 17

Although the weight of the presumption is impaired to some extent by the existence of a structure on the site still the landlord may well be presumed to be the owner of the site. [P 312 C 1]

(b) Deed — Construction — Discrepancy between dimensions and boundaries—Description as to boundaries must prevail.

In the case of a discrepancy in a deed between the dimensions and boundaries of certain property, the description as to boundaries must prevail. [P 312 C 2]

(c) Adverse possession—Possession need not be brought to notice of owner—Possession overt and without any attempt at concealment is sufficient — Acts, such as tethering of cattle on site, using it for sitting in open or sleeping during hot weather or for depositing cow-dung cakes and firewood by themselves are not adverse—But they become adverse when they are so overt and exclusive as to be referable to title asserted by adverse possessor by virtue of sale deed in his favour.

Possession to be adverse need not be shown to have been brought to the knowledge of the person against whom it is claimed. It is sufficient that the possession be overt and without any attempt at concealment so that the person against whom time is running ought if he exercises due vigilance to be aware of what is happening : ('34) 21 A I R 1934 P C 23, Rel. on. [P 313 C 1]

Acts such as the tethering of cattle on a site, using it for sitting in the open and for sleeping during hot weather and also for depositing cow-dung cakes and firewood standing by themselves may not be such as could be regarded as adverse but they become adverse and cease to be mere acts of casual possession without any idea of claiming title where they were so overt and exclusive as to be referable to the title which the adverse possessor asserts by virtue of a sale deed in his favour : 16 Bom 338 and ('16) 3 A I R 1916 Nag 90, Disting. [P 312 C 1, 2]

Judgment. — This is plaintiff's appeal from the reversing judgment of the Extra Additional District Judge, Saugor, in Civil Appeal No. 14-A of 1938 delivered on 25th July 1938. The appellant and the respondents owned houses adjoining each other in the town of Saugor and the dispute relates to a site designated in the map attached to the plaint by the letters ABCDEFG which is described throughout the litigation as a chabutra (platform). That piece of land is contiguous to the respondents' house. The appellant came to own the house by purchase in 1934. On the date of the institution of the suit that house was in the actual occupation of his tenant Kanhaiyalal. The dispute between the parties originated with Kanhaiyalal's insistence on his right to use the chabutra. The respondents protested by giving him a notice to desist from using it. Whereon the plaintiff as Kanhaiyalal's landlord sent a reply denying his right to the chabutra which he declared had been set apart for public Nistar (use). Thereafter he got the site of the chabutra transferred to him from the malguzar of Saugar under a sale deed dated 22nd February 1935 for Rs. 30 and attempted to take possession of it. In consequence of the resistance offered by the respondents there ensued criminal proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., which resulted in the confirmation of the defendants' possession. The appellant thereon instituted the suit out of which this appeal arises for ejectment of the respondents on the ground that the land belonged to him. The respondents resisted the suit on the ground of their title and continuous acts of possession under colour of their title. The trial Court held that in view of the wajib-ul-arz of the town of Saugor in so far as it applied to the site in dispute there was a presumption that landlord was the owner of the site and that such acts of possession as the defendants were able to establish were not effective to displace the presumption of ownership in favour of the landlord from whom the appellant derived his title. It therefore decreed the suit. The lower appellate Court while conceding that the initial presumption of ownership was in favour of the landlord found that the site in dispute had been included in the premises purchased by the defendants in the year 1895 and that the various acts of possession proved by him were such as were consistent with his claim of title to the site. It therefore reversed the decree of the trial Court and dismissed the suit.

A very vigorous argument was addressed on behalf of the appellant to show that the lower appellate Court was in error on the point of presumption as to the ownership of the site as also the legal effect of the various acts of possession exercised by the defendants. The effect of the lower appellate Court's finding of fact is sought to be neutralized on the contention that the lower appellate Court drew upon his imagination and indulged in a good deal of speculation in a manner not justified by the actual evidence on record. There can be no doubt that the malguzar of Saugor, as pointed in Ex. P-6, the copy of a letter from the third Secretary to Government, Central Provinces, to the Commissioner of Settlement, Central Provinces, that in respect of the abadi in which the site in dispute is situated, has the same right as that of a malguzar of any village, but the presumption in favour of the landlord being the owner of any land forming part of the abadi would arise only in respect of a vacant site. It is common ground however that the site is not quite in its natural condition but has some sort of structure standing on it. There is no evidence that the landlord had built the structure however loose or temporary it may be. Although the existence of the chabutra impairs to some extent the weight of the presumption in favour of the landlord it may well be presumed that he was the owner of the site. But even starting with this initial presumption the appellant cannot succeed in the face of the finding that the site in dispute was included in the sale deed dated 12th June 1895 under which the respondents claimed and that the respondents had a shed on it which they had been using for tethering their cattle, and that they were using it for sitting in the open and sleeping on it during hot weather and also for depositing cow-dung cakes and fire-wood. The lower appellate Court also finds that besides the respondents none else occupied the site except some persons who obtained special permission of the defendants to use it.

The lower appellate Court's view that the site was included in the sale deed of 1895 is subjected to much criticism on the ground that it wrongly identified the chabutra marked in the rough sketch given in that sale deed with the site in dispute. It is said that the word chabutra noted in the sketch is the chabutra in front of the door and not the one in dispute. The contention is specious but not sound. It is true that the word chabutra is written so as to suggest that it was in front of the door but it must be borne in mind that the sketch shows a projection of the site beyond the limits of the courtyard. The word chabutra is so written in the sketch that it might as well refer to the site in suit which bulges out of the courtyard as it may refer to something in front of the door. There is however no plea that there was any chabutra in front of the door and the suggestion made for the first time in this Court on behalf of the appellant as to the existence of such a chabutra cannot be entertained at this late stage. On the pleadings in the case, there was only one chabutra and that was the one in suit. It would therefore not be wrong to regard the word chabutra noted in the sketch as referring to the one in dispute. Moreover, the sale deed purports to transfer "the house together with the ground within the boundary limits as shown in the map given below." Now, the western boundary of the house and the site sold is shown as the public road. The dimensions given are not consistent with the boundaries but it is a well-recognised rule of construction that when there is a discrepancy between the dimensions and the boundaries the description as to the boundaries will prevail. Viewing the sketch rough as it is in conjunction with the recitals in the sale deed there does not appear any doubt that the vendor intended to sell that piece of land including the house which lay within boundaries noted therein. It must therefore follow that the chabutra which abuts on the public road fell within the ambit of the sale deed.

The various acts of possession standing by themselves may not be such as could be regarded as adverse, but they cannot be considered divorced from the defendants' sale deed of 1895. They were not mere acts of casual possession without any idea of claiming title as those in 16 Bom 338[1] or 13 N L R 25[2] since they were so overt and exclusive as to be referable to the title which the respondents asserted by virtue of their sale deed of 1895. The appellant's contention that the respondents' possession was not to the knowledge of the landlord has not much force. In 61 Cal 262[3] a pertinent observation occurs as follows :

1. ('92) 16 Bom 338, Framji Cursetji v. Goculdas Madhowji.
2. ('16) 3 A I R 1916 Nag 90 : 39 I C 54 : 13 N L R 25, Radhikadas v. Harmohanlal.
3. ('34) 21 AIR 1934 P C 23 : 147 I C 545 : 61 Cal 262 : 61 I A 78 (P C), Secretary of State v. Debendralal Khan.

The classical requirement is that the possession should be nec vinec claim nec precario. Mr. Dunne for the Crown appeared to desiderate that the adverse possession should be shown to have been brought to the knowledge of the Crown, but in their Lordships' opinion there is no authority for this requirement. It is sufficient that the possession be overt and without any attempt at concealment so that the person against whom time is running ought if he exercises due vigilance to be aware of what is happening. If the rights of the Crown have been openly usurped, it cannot be heard to plead that the fact was not brought to its notice.

It is pertinent to notice that in the cited case the defendant's right was founded only on adverse possession unlike the present case where the respondents have been able to prove their possession as being incidental to their ownership of it. The landlord himself admitted in the witness-box that there was a stone lining towards the south of the chabutra about two feet in height and that he had never made use of it. He was unable to give any special reason for selling the site to the plaintiff and he was reticent when the defendants by a notice challenged his right to transfer the site. Although there is no evidence to show who constructed the chabutra there it is clear from the drainage map Ex. D-3 that the chabutra had been in existence since 1892, that is three years prior to the defendants' sale deed. During all the time that the respondents had been using the site as appurtenant to their house the malguzar did not protest against its use by the respondents. It appears clear that for reasons best known to himself he has transferred the land to the plaintiff with a view to enable him to harass the respondents with no honest belief in his own right to it. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

ORDER OF REFERENCE

Vivian Bose J. — The facts are given in the taxing officer's order. The first question is whether the order under appeal has the force of a decree. The order is in two parts. The first part is to be found in what I might term the order proper which was delivered on 30th November 1940. The other part is in the order sheet of the same date. As both orders were delivered on the same day I think they should be read together and treated as one order. The portion of the order which is to be found in the part which I have termed the order proper decides that the respondents are entitled to restitution and orders the plaintiff to account. The other part of the order which is in the order sheet orders the plaintiff to deposit certain specified sums (which I take it were found due from the plaintiff on the accounting) in Court together with interest on them "for payment to the successful party" (that is the defendants), and further orders that in case of non-compliance within the time allowed the defendant shall be entitled to recover these sums by way of execution. I have no doubt that this is a decree within the meaning of S. 2 (2), Civil P. C. The order conclusively decides, so far as the lower Court is concerned, certain of the matters in controversy between the parties and orders one of them as a consequence, first, to account, and then, the account presumably having been given and accepted by the Court, to pay certain sums of money together with interest to the other side. The order therefore fulfils all the requirements of the first part of the definition in S. 2 (2) except that the matter in controversy is not in controversy in the suit but in a collateral proceeding. But S. 2 (2) states unequivocally that the determination of any question under S. 144 of the Code shall be deemed to be a decree. This is an order under S. 144. Therefore it must be treated as a decree.

I may state incidentally that unless it is so treated the present appeal cannot lie.

That of course is not a matter with which the taxing authorities are concerned, but if a party insists that he has a right of appeal and insists on putting in a memorandum of appeal he must stamp it accordingly. The next question is whether an order under S. 144 is to be considered as one under S. 47 for court-fee purposes. That depends upon whether the order relates to the "execution, discharge or satisfaction" of the decree in the suit out of which the proceedings in question was passed arise. The High Courts are divided on this point. Bombay and Madras have consistently taken the view that it does, Allahabad and Rangoon that it does not. Calcutta, Lahore and Patna have differed among themselves, the latest Calcutta and Lahore decisions agreeing with Allahabad and Rangoon. A Patna Full Bench also agrees with them. Nagpur has only one decision on the point and that ruling, while agreeing that logically "it seems no longer possible to hold that an application for restitution is one for the execution of the appellate decree which forms its basis" nevertheless goes on to hold that it does. This decision is reported in 18 N L R 15[1] at p. 20. The question is whether in the face of the large preponderance of authority on the other side 18 N L R 15[1] can still be treated as good law. I may remark that the question is not only of importance in matters relating to court-fees but also in questions arising out of articles 181 and 182, Limitation Act. The grounds on which the majority proceed can be summarized as follows :

(1) Orders under S. 144 are expressly declared to be "decrees" under S. 2 (2) of the Code. Under the Court-fees Act, all appeals must be stamped ad valorem unless there is provision to the contrary. There is provision to the contrary in the case of appeals under S. 47. It is to be found in a notification of the Governor-General in Council. There is no such provision covering appeals under S. 47. Whether this was accidental or deliberate hardly matters, but two High Courts, Allahabad and Calcutta, have thought that it was probably deliberate. In any event the learned Judge who decided 47 ALL 98[2] directed that a copy of his judgment, together with his recommendation that the exemption granted to appeals under S. 47 be also extended to appeals under S. 144, should be forwarded to Government. This was in 1924. No change has been made since then in spite of the recommendation. (2) The balance of authority under the old Code of 1882 was to the effect that an application for restitution under the old S. 583 (which corresponds to s. 144) was an application for execution within the meaning of old S. 244 (which corresponds to S. 47 in the present Code). The basis for those decisions was (a) that the old Code placed S. 583 under Chap. 41 which related to appeals and under that portion of it which was headed "the decree in appeal"; (b) that S. 583 expressly referred to restitution "under a decree passed in appeal under this chapter" and had the words > when a party entitled to any benefit (by way of restitution or otherwise) under a decree passed in an appeal under this chapter desires to obtain execution of the same etc. . . . . and such Court shall proceed to execute the decree passed in appeal.

The present Code alters this radically : (a) it has removed the section from the chapter dealing with appeals and has placed it in Part 11 which is headed "Miscellaneous;" (b) the words about execution have been removed altogether. So also under the old Code S. 583 provided how the decree on appeal was to be executed. "In the new Code Ss. 37 and 38 provide how appellate Court decrees are to be executed and are placed in the chapter dealing with execution." It is considered that these alterations were deliberate and were intended to alter the old law. (3) By virtue of the definition in S. 2 (2) an order under S. 144 is itself a decree, or at any rate has the force of a decree, and so is capable of execution as such, and consequently it cannot be an order in execution. (4) Section 2 (2) states that the definition of a decree shall be deemed to include "the determination of any question within S. 47 or S. 144." If orders under S. 144 fall under S. 47 in any event then it would not have been necessary to separate them here. (5) Under S. 144 the Court ordering restitution is empowered to award interest. No Court could make such an order in execution when the decree did not provide for interest. Therefore an order under S. 144 cannot be an order in execution. (6) If an application for restitution is in reality an application for execution, then there was no need for S. 144 because such matters have already been provided for in S. 47. (7) The power to order restitution is really an inherent right which the Court exercises in order that no party should suffer by reason of an order of the Court itself, the order causing injury being of course the decree which is reversed. It is only by doing violence to language that one can speak of the judgment of reversal as having made an additional decree by implication to the effect that the successful party will get from the other side what the latter had obtained meanwhile by execution of the original decree, and if such an order is already present by implication in the reversing decree, then clearly there would be no need for an additional order under Sec. 144 and so no need for Section 144. (8) That the Privy Council placed the right to direct restitution, and particularly the right to award interest, on the above grounds in a Hong Kong case and not on the ground that such an order is implicit in the decree of the appellate Court: (1871) L R 3 P C 465.[3]

These views are to be found in one form or another in the following cases: ILR (1937) 1 Cal 637[4] at p. 642, 47 ALL 98,[2] 8 Rang 271,[5] 3 Pat 371[6] and A I R 1930 Lah 24.[7] The arguments on the other side may be summarized as follows: (1) The right to restitution is inherent in the decree of reversal and is to be read into it by implication. Hence the order for restitution is an order in execution of the decree of reversal. (2) It would be anomalous to hold that while the application for restitution can be made on a Rs. 2 stamp (or a Rs. 3 as the case may be) the appeal from an order on such an application must be stamped ad valorem. (3) It would be unjust to require a party to pay ad valorem court-fees in a miscellaneous proceeding of this kind. (4) Under the old Code, it was clear that such orders were to be regarded as orders in execution and the new Code has not made any substantial change. (5) That in a sense an order directing restitution does relate to the execution of the first Court's decree as well as to that of the appellate Court reversing it. These views appear in 18 N L R 15,[1] A I R 1923 Mad 270,[8] A I R 1928 Lah 143,[9] 21 C W N 544,[10] 40 Mad 780,[11] 41 Bom 625[12] at p. 629, 45 Bom 1137[13] at p. 1140 and 4 Pat 294.[14] As regards these cases, it is to be observed that in spite of the Madras decisions the Madras Legislature considered it necessary to amend Art. 11 to Sch. 2, Court-fees Act, in the year 1922 so as to bring the article into line with the Madras decisions. The Madras decisions since the amendment are consequently not of assistance to those outside the Province of Madras. As regards the 21 C W N 544[10] case that ruling followed the old Calcutta decisions which dealt with the position under the old Code. The trend of decisions in that Court under the new Code are the other way round as was pointed out in I L R (1937) 1 Cal 637[4] at page 642. The Lahore case has not been followed in the later Lahore decisions, and 4 Pat 294[14] ignores the Full Bench in 3 Pat 371[6] and merely states that in a taxing matter the Taxing Judge should follow the rule laid down by his predecessor.

My own view, as at present advised, is that 18 N L R 15[1] was wrongly decided and should be overruled. This is particularly so in reference to the present case. The suit is for a declaration that the plaintiff has the right to collect the income from a shrine and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from doing so. The first Court granted the decree. Such a decree was incapable of execution (except as to costs) and the present matter arises out of collateral receiver's proceedings. The appellate Court reversed the first Court's decree and dismissed the claim. This decree is also incapable of execution (except of course as to costs). I cannot see how by any stretch of imagination an implied order to the plaintiff to refund money he has obtained from the receiver (or as receiver, whichever way one cares to view it, he himself being the receiver) can be read into the appellate Court's decree. I therefore refer the matter to my Lord the Chief Justice for the constitution of a Bench of two or more Judges (18 N L R 15[1] is a single Judge decision) to consider the following question :

"Was 18 N L R 15[1] rightly decided in that it decides : (1) that an order under S. 144, Civil P. C., is an order in execution under S. 47, and (2) that the court-fees payable on an appeal from such an order is Rs. 2 (now Rs. 3)?"

Order of the Division Bench

The question referred has been introduced by an order which so fully examines the question that it is only necessary for us to indicate which current of authority we feel should be followed. We are of the opinion that that represented by ILR (1937) 1 Cal 637,[4] 1938 R L R 635,[15] 47 ALL 98[2] and A I R 1930 Lah 24[7] represents the better view as matters now stand under the Code of 1908 and the rules of 1921. We are not prepared to say that 18 N L R 15[1] was wrong. The rules were different then. They had been made at a time when the Code of 1882 was in force and under the provisions of S. 583 the position was different and perhaps justified what might be called the old view.

As the provisions and rules now stand, we are of the opinion that an order under S. 144 is essentially different from an order under S. 47. Such an order could not be obtained by proceedings under S. 47. A clear distinction is drawn between the two cases by S. 2 and although these two kinds of procedure are, so to speak, the two sides of the same coin that does not make a head the same as a tail. Already in 1924 one High Court recommended in a judgment that the Rules issued under the Court-fees Act (for the Central Provinces we are informed the relevant rules relating to reduction and remissions are contained in No. 79-292-XI and for Berar No. 97-292-XI Cl. (6)) might fairly be altered. This is a matter for Government. If Government is minded to make this concession after S. 47 in Cl. (6) would be added the words "or S. 144." The recommendation made in another Province in 1924 does not appear to have been accepted. There seems, however, no reason to charge different, essentially different, court-fees according as the appeal is against an order passed in execution or against an order passed in restitution proceedings. In the first case one side is making the other pay and in the second case the side who has paid under a decree subsequently set aside is getting his money back. If anything the second procedure should be cheaper than the first. Our answer is that an order under S. 144 is not for court-fee purposes the same as an order under S. 47. We stopped Mr. Kulkarni arguing the particular question : 'Was this an order under S. 144?' That does not arise out of the reference which is concerned with the general not with the particular. The matter will now go back for disposal in the light of the above and when the matter is disposed of, this judgment will be considered administratively for any action which may be thought necessary.

ORDER OF REFERENCE

Pollock J. — This is an application for revision of the order of a criminal Court passed in appeal. In Criminal Revision No. 122 of 1941 (Guruprasad v. King-Emperor) Bose J. held that such an application must be made to the Sessions Court in the first instance. In Criminal Revision No. 398 of 1939 (Gaya Prasad v. King-Emperor) Gruer J. remarked :

This does not appear necessary in the case of revision of appellate orders, in accordance with the rules and practice of the High Court.

Rule 15 of Chap. 4 of the High Court Rules provides :

No petition for revision of an original order of a Magistrate shall be entertained unless it is accompanied by a copy of the order of the District Magistrate or Sessions Judge concerned refusing to refer the case to the High Court ;

but there appears to be no such provision for applications for revision of appellate orders. As it is desirable that this point should be settled, the case may, subject to the approval of the Chief Justice, be placed before the Division Bench during the vacation after the issue of notice to the Advocate-General.

Opinion. — In our opinion it is clear from R. 15 of Chap. 4 of the High Court Rules that an application for revision of an order passed by a criminal Court of appeal may be made direct to the High Court, and that the applicant need not first apply to the Sessions Court. This rule appears to be based on the practice of the Judicial Commissioner's Court, laid down in the office order of 19th April 1929. We do not propose to recommend that the order should be altered so as to make it necessary that the applicant should first apply to the Sessions Court, because such a practice would throw an extra burden on the Sessions Court without effecting any appreciable saving of work in this Court.

STONE C. J. AND VIVIAN BOSE J.

Byankat Paikaji Lonari Kunbi and another — Plaintiffs — Appellants

v.

Ramchandra Mahadeo Mule and another — Defendants — Respondents.

First Appeal No. 56 of 1937, Decided on 17th February 1941, from decree of Addl. Sub-Judge, First Class, Amraoti, D/- 24th November 1936.

(a) Religious endowment — Private or public —Property dedicated to idol — Owner disclaiming all interest and admitting that it belonged to idol — Temple built with money collected as also with dedicator's money—All transfer deeds to idol made in favour of idol — Dedicator mentioned and acting as one of panchas—Trust held one of public religious character.

Plaintiff who dedicated some property to an idol disclaimed all interest in the property and admitted that the property belonged to the idol. The temple was built with money contributed by the villagers and the plaintiff. Several properties were gifted to the idol by other people and all the deeds were made out in favour of the idol. Plaintiff was mentioned as one of the panchas and he was acting in that capacity. He filed a suit for a declaration that the temple and property owned by it did not constitute a public religious and charitable trust:

Held that there was a trust and that it was of a public religious character. [P 319 C 2]

(b) Religious endowment—Dedication of property to idol can be without registered instrument (Obiter).

A dedication of property to an idol is not a gift and consequently can be accomplished without a registered instrument: ('27) 14 A I R 1927 Mad 636 (FB); 37 Cal 128 and ('22) 9 A I R 1922 P C 123, Rel. on. [P 319 C 1]

(c) Charitable and Religious Trusts Act (1920), S. 3 — Dedication of property to idol is case of trust and is covered by S. 3.

Dedications of property to an idol are impressed with a trust of a religious nature and such a trust though of a special and peculiar kind is one which the Charitable and Religious Trusts Act is intended to cover: Case law referred. [P 321 C 1]

Judgment. — This claim is the offshoot of a petition under the Charitable and Religious Trusts Act of 1920. The plaintiffs undertook to institute a suit for the declaration contemplated by S. 5 (3) of the Act and this is that suit. The institution in question is a temple and deity known as the Shri Mahadeo Sansthan. It was founded by the first plaintiffs' grandfather Ganuji, though whether solely or in conjunction with others is a matter of dispute. The institution owns certain property which is described in the plaint. The plaintiffs disclaim all interest in this property except as regards the temple itself together with the site on which it stands, including its compound, and the portion of the field S. No. 94 known as S. No. 94 (1) on which, according to the plaintiffs, the temple stands. The exact nature of the interest which they claim is not clear but they ask for a declaration that the Sansthan and the property owned by it forms a private Sansthan and does not constitute a public religious and charitable trust. It is enough for their purpose if they can show that. There is no dispute as to what must be established in order to bring the matter within the purview of the Charitable and Religious Trusts Act. That is set out in S. 3 of the Act, and the points are also enumerated in a decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in almost identical language in 57 ALL 330[1] at pp. 342 and 343.

So far as the present suit is concerned they are the same as the requirements under S. 92, Civil P. C. Put shortly there must be a trust. It must be either express or constructive. It must have been either created, or it must be existing, for a public purpose. (We stress the alternative.) And that public purpose must be of a charitable or a religious nature. It is not denied here that if there was a trust then it was either express or constructive, nor is it denied that that trust would be of a religious nature. What is said is that there was no trust at all, and that in any event, if there was one, it was of a private character. It was argued that before a Court can reach the conclusion that there was a trust it must be clear about the following matters. It must first ascertain whether there was an author or authors, and if so who. Next it must be clear that there was an intention to create a trust and bear in mind that such intention must be indicated with reasonable certainty by the words or acts of the author. It must also find that there are trust properties and that there are beneficiaries. Unless all these elements are present there can be no trust. 57 ALL 330[1] at page 342 was again relied on.

There is no difficulty about finding an author in this case. If there was a trust at all then the author clearly was Ganuji, the grandfather of plaintiff 1, and possibly certain other members of the public, though their exact position is not clear. But certainly Ganuji's is. So also there is no difficulty about ascertaining the trust properties. It is clear from the plaint itself that the original property with which the institution was founded was the temple building and the site on which it stands, together with its compound, and a portion of the field S. No. 94. The remaining properties were subsequent accretions and are set out in para. 1 (b) of the plaint. As we say, there is no difficulty about these two points. Therefore all we have to see is whether Ganuji, either solely or in conjunction with others, had any intention of creating a trust, and if so, who are the beneficiaries.

As regards the first of these two points the lower Court finds that Ganuji did create a public trust. The plaintiffs' case as placed before us in argument was that there was no trust at all, and in any case that there was no public trust. They stated that the temple is a purely private institution, and though the public are allowed to worship there they are allowed to do so on sufferance as all the property is private property. But though they said that it is private property they made it clear that they do not claim any interest in it. They admitted that the property belongs to the idol which is installed in the temple and admitted that this idol is a juristic entity. But they contended nevertheless that the endowment is a private and not a public one. As regards the question of trust the plaintiffs expressly admitted on 6th November 1935 that there was a trust but said that they had the right to manage because "such right to manage the property goes by inheritance as the trust is a private one." We need not therefore trouble any further as to whether Ganuji, and possibly others with him, intended to create a trust or not. That is admitted, though it was at one time denied, and was again denied here. All we are now concerned to see is whether this trust was of a public or a private nature. That there can be a private religious endowment something along the above lines appears from Mayne's Hindu Law, Edition 10, page 915. The learned author says there :

> Religious endowments are of two kinds, public and private. In a public endowment the dedication is for the use or benefit of the public. But when property is set apart for the worship of a family god, in which the public are not interested, the endowment is a private one. The family idols are not however chattels or the property of the family. They are legal entities having, within limits, independent rights.

The question is whether the endowment in question was of that character. As to whether there was an endowment at all we do not think there can be any doubt. In the first place, as we have said, the plaintiffs disclaim all interest in the property and admit that it belongs to the idol. This could hardly have come about without an endowment of some kind, especially when the plaintiffs admit that there is a trust. In the next place, the plaintiffs have indicated in their plaint, and indicate this even more clearly in the witness box, that Ganuji had gifted or dedicated the properties about which we are now speaking to the idol. (We refer to the properties transferred at the time of installation and not to the subsequent accretions). This is also clear from the entries in the mutation register Ex. D-1. It is true the plaintiffs insist that nevertheless the whole institution was Ganuji's private property and that it is now their private property, but they seemed somewhat confused as to exactly what they meant by this and in the end they seemed to consider that this was so only in the sense that Ganuji retained the right of management and that later that right descended to them.

The lower Court finds against this. It holds that only part of the site now occupied by the temple and its premises was supplied by Ganuji and that the other part was given by one Ghasiram. The part which came from Ganuji was purchased by him in the plaintiffs' name on 20th October 1901 by the sale deed Ex. P-4. The material part of this deed is missing but the plaintiffs admit in the plaint that Ganuji only had a half share in the field, and the figure "1/2" is still legible in the document. The plaintiffs' case is that the temple was erected wholly on the half of the field which was dedicated by Ganuji. But the defendants denied this and stated that a portion of the temple stands on the other half of the field, which according to them, was gifted by Ghasiram. They filed a map in support of their statement. Ghasiram himself entered the box as D. W. 7. He swears that he purchased the other half of this field (S. No. 94) from one Rasulkhan and he filed the sale deed Ex. P-20. He also swears that he orally gifted the site to the institution and that the temple partly stands on this site. We see no reason to disbelieve him, especially as the plaintiffs have offered no explanation as to how the other half of the field was acquired by the temple.

Whether an oral gift was sufficient to pass title is another matter. There is authority for the proposition that a dedication of property to an idol is not a gift and consequently can be accomplished without a registered instrument. See for example the Full Bench decision of the Madras High Court reported in 50 Mad 687,[2] also 37 Cal 128[3] at pp 142 and 153 and 155, 157, 161 and also that of the Privy Council in 44 Mad 831[4] at p. 843. But these are matters which do not concern us here because admittedly the institution has been in possession for over 12 years and so has now acquired a good title. The point is that half of the land on which the temple stands was donated by an outsider. There is also much evidence which has been believed in the Court below to show that the temple was built with the aid of funds collected from persons in the locality. It may well be that Ganuji contributed the bulk of the money but the witnesses who say that the hat was set round and that they were asked to contribute and did contribute are borne out in a remarkable way by actual evidence. It is proved that there are slabs on the floor of the temple containing the names of persons other than Ganuji. It is true that the slab bearing Ganuji's name has the word "malik" or "malak" (it is not clear which but they both mean the same thing—owner) appended to the name while the others do not, but that fact in itself is not enough in our opinion to displace the rest of the evidence. It is possible that the term was used in an honorific sense by the mason who inscribed the name, he having been engaged and paid by Ganuji, and Ganuji having been the principal donor. But whatever the reason we do not think that this in itself displaces the other evidence.

The conduct of the plaintiffs has also to be considered. After this installation of the idol other persons also made gifts or transfers to it. The deeds are all made out in favour of the idol and a number of panchas are named among them plaintiff 1. These deeds are Exs. P-1, P-2, P-3 and D-18. It is admitted by the plaintiffs that the institution owns the fields mentioned in these deeds, and it is clear that plaintiff 1 accepted these gifts or transfers on behalf of the idol along with others and allowed himself to be described as one of several panchas, and allowed those who were transferring the property to the idol to believe that he was acting in that capacity. That is powerful evidence in the defendants' favour. Looking at the evidence as a whole, and bearing in mind that we are an appellate Court, we see no reason to differ from the lower Court's finding that there was a trust and that it was of a public religious character. That leaves outstanding an argument to the effect that in the case of dedication of property to an idol there can be no trust. Who, it is asked, are the trustees? and who the beneficiary? Is the idol the trustee? Or is it the beneficiary? and if so where do the general public for whose use and convenience the institution was created and endowed with property come in? It must be remembered that in all trusts the legal estate resides in the trustees, while the beneficiary has only an equitable estate. Here, and in many other cases of this class, the legal estate to the property vests directly in the idol. The transfers are all in its name and not in the name of trustees. Their Lordships of the Privy Council insist that all the requirements of a trust must be rigidly fulfilled before action can be taken under the Charitable and Religious Trusts Act of 1920 : 57 ALL 330.[1] It is therefore argued that until one can say with definiteness who the beneficiaries are and who the trustees no proceedings can be taken under the Act.

The question is difficult when viewed like that but we do not feel ourselves called upon to solve it because we think the matter has been settled by their Lordships of the Privy Council. Whether dedications of this nature are trusts properly so called, or whether they form a special kind of trust peculiar to Hindu law, hardly matters, because we think that their Lordships have placed it beyond doubt that such dedications are impressed with a trust of a religious nature, and the question before their Lordships has usually been whether the trust was a public or a private one. In 23 W R 253[5] their Lordships decided that when property is dedicated to the religious service of an idol the property so dedicated and its rents are the property of the idol and not of the shebait. In 18 W R 226[6] their Lordships stated that the dedications which they were considering there, (endowments for the support and worship of certain idols) were "in the nature of trusts impressed on the property to be performed by the donee." It is true this case is not exactly in point because the gift there was not to the idol itself but to a third party and what their Lordships held was that the donee became a trustee in these circumstances, but the point is that they regarded such endowments as impressed with a trust. 14 M I A 289[7] is more to the point, as in that case the property appears to have been dedicated directly to the religious service of the idol. Again, their Lordships held that this established a religious trust. In 8 M I A 66[8] and in 5 Cal 438[9] also the properties were dedicated to the idols direct and were not assigned to trustees. The dedications there were of a complex nature, and their Lordships held that they did not constitute absolute dedications to the idols. But they held that the expenses of the upkeep and daily worship of the idols were to be charges on the properties and that only the balances which remained could be utilised by the sons of the testators and their offspring, (both cases were of wills) for their own benefit. Their Lordships did not use the word "trust" in either judgment, but as the legal estate in the properties in each case vested in the idol, the family of the testator could only have claimed a beneficial and not a legal interest in such moneys as their Lordships held they were entitled to, and that could only have been on the assumption that these wills constituted some kind of a trust. This question was considered by the Calcutta High Court in 23 Cal 645[10] at p. 655 and the learned Judges, after referring the decisions which hold that an idol in Hindu law is capable of holding property, and that property dedicated to an idol belongs to the idol and not the shebait, said :

> If it were necessary to give reasons in favour of a view so amply supported by authority, we should add that the opinion of Jagannath goes merely to show that an idol can be the owner of property only in a figurative sense, possession being held by a manager or trustee and that dedication of property to an idol is only a mode of creating a trust for religious purposes in perpetuity which is allowed by law. See 14 M I A 289.[7]

In 39 ALL 553[11] there was a gift out and out to an idol but the donor stipulated that members of his family should be the managers of the idol and he earmarked a certain part of the money to remunerate them as managers as long as they should so continue. Their Lordships of the Privy Council held at p. 560 that there was no reason why this should not be done, and so upheld the gift and the condition. Their Lordships did not indicate whether such a disposition of property would create a trust, but it is difficult to see in what other way the sons, to whom no direct gift was made, could claim an interest. 44 Mad 831,[4] another decision of the Judicial Committee, raises many doubts. Their Lordships held there at p. 839 that a trust is unknown to the Hindu system, pure and simple, in the sense in which the expression is used in English law, and their Lordships appeared to indicate at p. 843 that properties vested in an idol are not vested as specific trusts within the meaning of S. 10, Limitation Act. Nevertheless they stated at p. 844 that for all that they are in a sense trust properties. But their Lordships again stressed the distinction between the English law of trust and the legal relationships which spring out of a dedication, at pp. 849 and 854. In 8 Luck 351[12] their Lordships again spoke of a trustee in a case in which property had been dedicated to and had vested in an idol direct.

It would appear from these decisions that though the trust which arises in such cases is not the exact kind of trust which the English law contemplates, nevertheless, they are trusts, though of a special and peculiar kind. The question accordingly arises, are these special trusts the sort of trust which the Charitable and Religious Trusts Act of 1920 is intended to cover. We think they are. We have already noted that the language used in S. 3, Charitable and Religious Trusts Act of 1920, is the same as that used in S. 92, Civil P. C., 1908. Their Lordships of the Privy Council have twice permitted cases to be brought under this and the section in the old Code which corresponded to it, for a scheme. The first of these cases was under the old Code and is reported in 24 Bom 50.[13] The institution there was over 700 years old and it owned considerable properties. The second case was under S. 92 and is reported in 58 Mad 91.[14] It will be noticed that in some of their Lordships' cases, and in particular in the case last cited, their Lordships speak of "temples" and "institutions" as owning the property in suit. On the other hand, it would appear from their Lordships' decision in 52 Cal 809[15] at p. 815 that Hindu deities are juristic persons because idols are regarded in many ways as sentient beings. There are vivification ceremonies, etc. They are bathed and washed and clothed and fed as carefully and scrupulously as a living person.

The deity is, in short, conceived as a living being and is treated in the same way as the master of the house would be treated by his humble servant. The daily routine of life is gone through with minute accuracy; the vivified image is regaled with the necessaries and luxuries of life in due succession, even to the changing of clothes, the offering of cooked and uncooked food, and the retirement to rest.

These considerations would not apply to temples or to institutions. But in 44 Mad 831[4] at p. 839 their Lordships were definite that religious institutions known under different names are regarded as possessing juristic capacity, as well as idols. Anyway this appears to have resulted in many cases of a slurring of the distinction between the idol proper and the temple or institution of which it forms a part. This slurring is evident in the present case and will be seen in our judgment. The reason is that the plaintiffs and the witnesses sometimes refer to the deity, sometimes to the institution ("sansthan") and sometimes to the "temple," using them all however as interchangeable terms for the purpose of showing where the property is vested. We have been obliged to do so also in order to reflect the evidence and pleadings accurately. But we wish it to be understood that in our opinion what is meant throughout is that the property in this case was all dedicated to the idol and that it is the idol which owns it. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Kamdar mahars have certain obligations one of which is to render assistance to Government servants. Where therefore a person poses as a Government servant (C. I. D Officer) and by so doing obtains the services of the kamdar mahar, services which he would not otherwise have obtained and which the kamdar mahar was bound to give on demand by a Government officer, he does an act under the colour of the office which he had assumed and is guilty under S. 170: ('18) 5 A I R 1918 Pat 653, Expl., and Disting.; 27 All 294 and ('35) 22 A I R 1935 Lah 92, Rel. on. [P 322 C 2]

B. L. Gupta — for Applicant.

W. R. Puranik, Advocate-General — for the Crown.

Order. — The applicant has been convicted under S. 170, Penal Code, and was sentenced to four months rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 50. In appeal the conviction was upheld but in lieu of the sentence of imprisonment and fine he was directed, in view of his antecedents (he is a college student), to execute a bond under S. 562, Criminal P. C., for Rs. 200 with one surety in like amount for a period of six months, on which he would be released on probation. In this revision application the facts found are not challenged but it is contended that the facts found do not constitute an offence.

The applicant was travelling towards a village called Akhatwada by night. On the way he passed through the villages of Lehegaon and Ner. At Lehegaon he went to the patel's baithak. The patel was absent. He then asked the kamdar mahar to give him a cart on bigar, representing that he was an officer of the Criminal Investigation Department. The mahar failed to provide a cart, alleging that none was available. He then attempted to get a cart on payment, but the cartman did not agree to his terms. He then left a chit written on a cigarette carton with the mahar, stating that 8 annas had been paid to a certain mahar, which was untrue, and that the patel was absent, and signed it with a designation purporting to be that of a C. I. D. officer. He then proceeded to Ner on foot in the company of a schoolmaster and others. On the way he met the patel of Lehegaon, again repeated that he was a C. I. D. officer and told him to arrange for a cart for his superior officer. On arriving at Ner he made similar representations, and on his representation that he was a C. I. D. officer and going to Akhatwada to investigate a gambling case he asked for and obtained the services of the kamdar mahar to accompany him from there to Akhatwada.

It is contended that this act, which is the most material act inasmuch as services were demanded and obtained, is not an act done under colour of the office which he assumed, and reliance is placed on the decision of a Divisional Bench of the Patna High Court in A I R 1918 Pat 653.[1] It is contended that as this is a decision of two Judges it should take precedence over decisions of single Judges in other Courts although one of them is reported in an authorized law report, 27 ALL 294,[2] and the other, A I R 1935 Lah 92,[3] reported at a later date. In the Patna case a man was convicted under S. 170 for obtaining admission to the platform of a railway station without a platform ticket by pretending to be a C. I. D. officer. It was held in revision that no offence had been committed as the courtesy which the railway extended to members of the police might equally have been extended to other persons of high social position. For the Crown it is contended that this decision is incorrect and should not be followed, and reliance is placed on 27 ALL 294[2] and A I R 1935 Lah 92.[3] I do not think it is necessary to express an opinion as to the correctness of the Patna ruling as it can easily be distinguished from the facts of the case before me. The concession there obtained by the man posing as an officer was one that might have been obtained by other people. Kamdar mahars have certain obligations one of which is to render assistance to Government servants. The applicant posed as a Government servant and by so doing obtained the services of the kamdar mahar, services which he would not otherwise have obtained and which the kamdar mahar was bound to give on demand by a Government officer. He therefore did an act under the colour of the office which he had assumed. The case is certainly stronger than the one in 27 ALL 294,[2] in which the conviction was upheld, where a person posing as a head constable bullied a vegetable seller into selling him goods at a quarter of their actual value. The learned Additional District Magistrate has very correctly altered the sentence into an order under S. 562, Criminal P. C., and it is to be hoped that this will be a sufficient warning to the applicant. The application is dismissed.

If he does so, he must do so within 30 days from the time of such resistance under Art. 167, Limitation Act; but if he fails to do so that does not take away his right to apply again under R. 95 for delivery of the property, in which case he must apply within three years from the date when the sale became absolute under Art. 181. An article in the Limitation Act allowing 30 days in which to apply under R. 97 cannot take away the right to apply under R. 95, to which a different article applies: ('19) 6 A I R 1919 Pat 425 (F B); 13 Mad 504; ('21) 8 AIR 1921 Mad 559 and 13 C W N 724, Rel. on. [P 323 C 2]

When an auction purchaser, whose possession under O. 21, R. 95, Civil P. C., is successfully resisted, does not apply under O. 21, R. 97 within 30 days but applies for a fresh warrant of possession under R. 95, it is doubtful whether the purchaser's fresh application under R. 97 complaining about the resistance of possession is not governed by Art. 167 and whether the obstruction is a fresh obstruction within Art. 167 : 11 Bom 473 ; 26 All 365 ; ('33) 20 A I R 1933 Bom 457 (FB) and 18 All 233, Ref.

(c) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 50 and O. 21, R. 97 — Auction purchaser applying for warrant of possession — Representatives of decree-holder need not be brought on record under S. 50 — Obstructor not claiming through judgment-debtor — His representatives also need not be brought.

A warrant of possession can be issued without bringing the legal representatives of the deceased decree-holder on the record under S. 50 when the decree has been fully satisfied. The proceedings under Rr. 95 and 97 are between the auction purchaser and persons who are presumably claiming to be in possession of the property; and if they are claiming not as the legal representatives of the judgment-debtor but on their own behalf, it is not necessary to bring any legal representatives on the record. Order.—In execution of the decree obtained by Fakirchand and Abirchand against Ramchandra Singh a house was sold in execution and purchased by Ramgopal. The sale was confirmed on 29th January 1938. In 1938 Ramgopal applied to be placed in possession under O. 21, R. 95, Civil P. C., but he was successfully resisted and he made no application under R. 97 complaining of such resistance. It appears that Ramchandra Singh died in 1939, and on 1st February 1940 Ramgopal applied once again under O. 21, R. 95 to be placed in possession. This application has been opposed by the sons of Ramchandra Singh who claimed that they successfully resisted the claim on a previous occasion and that any complaint of resistance now is barred by Art. 167, Limitation Act.

The applicant in this Court, one of Ramchandra Singh's sons, relies on the decisions in 11 Bom 473[1] and 26 ALL 365.[2] 11 Bom 473[1] has been overruled in 35 Bom L R 1033[3] and the decision in 26 ALL 365[2] loses much of its force in view of the fact that one of the Judges, Knox J., had some doubt about the correctness of the conclusion and said he adhered to the opinion expressed in a previous decision, 18 ALL 233,[4] where it was held that the period of limitation for a second application under what is now R. 97 ran from the second resistance of which the complaint was being made. On the other hand, we have the decisions in 13 Mad 504[5] and 49 I C 150.[6] In the latter case the judgment of Coutts J., contains an exhaustive discussion of the case law on the point, and with his conclusions I respectfully agree. Rule 97, in my opinion, merely gives the auction purchaser the right to complain to the Court of the resistance offered to him. If he does so, he must do so within 30 days from the time of such resistance under Art. 167, Limitation Act; but if he fails to do so that does not, in my opinion, take away his right to apply again under R. 95 for delivery of the property, in which case he must apply within three years from the date when the sale became absolute, under Art. 181. An article in the Limitation Act allowing 30 days in which to apply under R. 97 cannot take away the right to apply under R. 95, to which a different article applies. This view is to be found in 66 I C 722[7] and 13 C W N 724.[8] It will be seen therefore that there is very little real difference of opinion between the various High Courts. I am therefore of opinion that the lower Court was correct in holding that a warrant of possesssion should be issued in favour of the auction purchaser. If that warrant is resisted and the auction purchaser complains of such resistance under R. 97, then it may have to be considered whether his complaint is within time. In 35 Bom L R 1033[3] at p. 1038 Beaumont C. J., stated :

If under the fresh warrant possession is obstructed and the decree-holder then applies under R. 97 complaining of the obstruction, and if the execution Judge then starts an inquiry under R. 98, in my opinion, it will be open to the party obstructing to show that his obstruction is by the same person and in the same character as the former obstruction in respect of which no proceedings were taken, and if he succeeds in proving that, Art. 167 will then be a bar to the decree-holder's application. The mere fact that the application is made in respect of a fresh warrant for possession does not, in my view, involve that the obstruction is a fresh obstruction.

That is a point that may have to be considered. The applicant has also contended that there can be no issue of a warrant of possession without bringing the legal representatives of the deceased decree-holder on the record. I am informed that the decree has been fully satisfied, in which case there would be no need to bring the legal representatives on the record under S. 50, Civil P. C. These proceedings are between the auction purchaser and persons who are presumably claiming to be in possession of the property not as the legal representatives of the judgment debtor but on their own behalf. It is not necessary to bring any legal representatives on the record. The application for revision is dismissed with costs.

POLLOCK J.

In re Harakchand Ghiwarmal Marwadi and another — Appellants.

Criminal Appeal No. 54 of 1941, Decided on 14th July 1941, from order of Sess. Judge, Nagpur, D/- 17th February 1941.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 298 — Misdirection—Rape case — Telling jury that accusation is itself matter of significance amounts to serious misdirection.

As false accusations of rape are brought the Sessions Judge should ask the jury to consider whether the motive alleged by the defence for the making of a false charge was adequate in view of the stigma attaching to the person bringing such a charge but he ought not to tell the jury that the mere accusation is in itself a matter of significance. That amounts to a serious misdirection.

(b) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 298—Misdirection—Hostile witness.

Where witnesses have been declared hostile the Sessions Judge should clearly tell the jury that as the witness has told a lie on one occasion they should receive his evidence with caution. [P 326 C 1]

(c) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 298—Misdirection—Rape case.

The Sessions Judge in a rape case should warn the jury that it is the ordinary rule not to convict on the uncorroborated evidence of the prosecutrix.

[P 326 C 1]

(d) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 423 — Jury trial —Verdict must be accepted unless erroneous.

The verdict of the jury must be accepted unless the appellate Court considers it erroneous.

(e) Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 537 (d) and 298— On examination of evidence appellate Court of opinion that verdict would be same even in absence of misdirection, Court should not interfere.

If the Court after examining the evidence finds that, even if the misdirection had not occurred, the jury could not reasonably have come to any other decision it will not interfere: 21 Cal 955 and ('17) 4 A I R 1917 All 173, Expl., and doubted; ('40) 27 A I R 1940 Lah 87, Foll.; Case law discussed. [P 327 C 1]

(f) Criminal trial—Witness—Witness changing — If he intended to give false evidence but subsequently changes, he must say so.

It would be natural to expect that if the original intention of a witness was to give false evidence and he was persuaded to abandon this idea, he should say so. If this he has not done, there is no reason to suppose that he originally intended to give false evidence in support of a false charge.

[P 327 C 1]

W. C. Dutt and P. L. Bhargava—for Appellants.

R. F. Rustamji — for the Crown.

Judgment. — The appellants were tried before the Sessions Judge, Nagpur, with a jury. Accused 1, Harakchand, was charged under S. 376, Penal Code, with rape, under S. 214, Penal Code, with offering gratifications to witnesses and other persons connected with the case in consideration of their screening him from legal punishment for the offence of rape. Accused 2, Govinda, who was a servant of Harakchand, was charged with abetment of rape under S. 376/114, Penal Code. By the unanimous verdict of the jury, which was accepted by the Sessions Judge, Harakchand has been convicted under S. 376/511, Penal Code, of an attempt to commit rape and under S. 214/116 of instigating the subornation of evidence. Govinda has been convicted under S. 376/114, Penal Code, of abetting the rape.

The prosecutrix is Mt. Anjani (P. W. 2), whose age has been variously given as 15 and 17 though she was probably nearer 15 than 17 when the incident occurred on 9th September 1940. She was married and had lived with her husband as his wife, but at the time of this incident she was living in her parents' house at Bela. Her husband's house is only two houses away and she had left it because she was ill and part of the house had fallen down. Her story is as follows. At about 2 P. M., on Monday, 9th September, Siti, the mother of the accused Govinda, came to her parents' house, in which there was no one except herself and her small nephew aged 2. Siti, on hearing that Anjani was not well, offered to give her some medicine, and some time in the afternoon she went to Siti's house to get that medicine. She called out to Siti and looked through the door and saw Harakchand and Govinda sitting in the verandah. Harakchand caught her left wrist with so much force that her bangles were broken and her forearm was cut and dragged her into the inner room. There Harakchand threw her on the ground, loosened her sari, sat on her, and had connexion with her. Meanwhile Govinda held her mouth. After she was released, she went out crying and outside she saw Sitaram (P. W. 10) without speaking to him. She returned home and when her brother came back in the evening she told him what had happened. On Tuesday morning they went to Bela out-post to make a report but found no one there. On returning they met the mukaddam and told him what had occurred. On Wednesday morning they again went but found nobody there; in the afternoon at about 2 P. M. they made a report. Her sari was seized the same day. This witness was cross-examined at very great length and in the course of that cross-examination she admitted that she did not know whether the accused had inserted his penis into her vagina.

A letter written by the accused Harakchand Ex. P. 8, to his brother, which was sent by a private messenger, was seized by the police on 18th September. In this letter Harakchand asked his brother to bribe the witnesses in the case and mentioned among others Sitaram (P. W. 10) and Radhabai (P. W. 14). In the committing Magistrate's Court Sitaram gave evidence corroborating Anjani's story. In the Sessions Court he stated that he saw Anjani enter Govinda's house, heard a cry from there, went to the spot, and saw somebody shut the door from inside. Later Radhabai came and he asked her to go and see what was happening. She went and returned saying that there were three persons in the lane adjoining Govinda's house, Siti, Anjani, and Anjani's husband. The public prosecutor obtained permission to cross-examine this witness, who then admitted that what he had said in the committing Magistrate's Court was true and that he had told Radhabai that there was something wrong in Govinda's house and she should go and see and that when she came back she said she had seen Anjani inside with Govinda gagging her and Harakchand sitting on her. Later he saw Anjani coming out of Govinda's house, weeping and with her sari not tucked up behind. He added that Anjani's husband came through the lane after Anjani had left.

Radhabai (P. W. 14) in the committing Magistrate's Court gave evidence in favour of the accused. In the Sessions Court she was merely tendered for cross-examination. She stated that she was asked by Sitaram to go to Govinda's house and see what was the matter and that there she saw Siti, Anjani, and Anjani's husband Mahadeo. She added that Mahadeo told Anjani to come with him and beat her and dragged her away. The learned Sessions Judge's summing up has been criticised on the ground of misdirection and non-direction. He started by properly pointing out that the burden lies upon the prosecution to prove its own case conclusively and that the accused cannot be convicted on the falseness of their own case. Harakchand and Govinda denied that there was any sort of incident on the afternoon of 9th September and Harakchand took the alternative plea that, if there was anything, it was merely adultery with Anjani's consent. The learned Sessions Judge pointed out that there could be only three possibilities: either the prosecution case was true, or it was false, or there was adultery, and he went on to say :

> Even though the burden always lies upon the prosecution to prove its case, I think you will have to consider that if you find these last two alternatives false or very improbable, the prosecution version of the case must be correspondingly strengthened.

That merely amounts to saying that if there are only three possibilities and you rule out two of them you will probably accept the third, and I do not think it should have misled the jury. The next remark however is, in my opinion, open to serious objection. The learned Sessions Judge says :

> It is an old saying that there is no smoke without fire, and the very fact that accusation of such a serious crime has been made against the accused is in itself a matter of significance.

It is generally unfair and always unjudicial to say that there is no smoke without fire, and the jury might be seriously misled by such a statement. False accusations of rape are brought. It would have been open to the Sessions Judge to ask the jury to consider whether the motive alleged by the defence for the making of a false charge was adequate in view of the stigma attaching to the person bringing such a charge, but he ought not to tell the jury that the mere accusation is in itself a matter of significance. That, in my opinion, amounts to a serious misdirection. The non-direction complained of is that the learned Sessions Judge failed to tell the jury that it is only in exceptional cases that a person ought to be convicted of rape upon the uncorroborated evidence of the prosecutrix. In the present case there is the evidence of Sitaram (P. W. 10) to corroborate Anjani. It has however been said that Sitaram has told two conflicting stories and that the jury ought to have been warned not to accept his evidence except with great caution. The learned Sessions Judge told the jury that they did not necessarily have to reject his evidence because part of it was false or because he had attempted to change his evidence and that they would have to decide whether what he had said in support of the prosecution could be safely accepted or not. I think that the learned Sessions Judge should have clearly told the jury that as Sitaram had told a lie on one occasion they should receive his evidence with caution. I also think that he should certainly have warned the jury that it is the ordinary rule not to convict on the uncorroborated evidence of the prosecutrix, but that there was the evidence of Sitaram, if they believed it, to corroborate her.

Section 423 (2), Criminal P. C., provides that nothing shall authorize the Court to alter or reverse the verdict of a jury, unless it is of opinion that such verdict is erroneous owing to a misdirection by the Judge, or to a misunderstanding on the part of the jury of the law as laid down by him. It is to be noted that the verdict of the jury must be accepted unless the appellate Court considers it erroneous, and S. 537 (d) of the Code provides that no finding or sentence shall be reversed or altered on appeal on account of any misdirection in any charge to a jury unless such misdirection has in fact occasioned a failure of justice. In 5 W R Cr 80[1] a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court decided, under the Code as it then stood, that the verdict and conviction in a jury case ought not to be set aside if the Court was of opinion that the verdict was warranted by the evidence and that upon that evidence they would have upheld the conviction on appeal if the trial had been by the Judge with the aid of assessors instead of by jury. Sir Barnes Peacock C. J. remarked :

> It would lead to defeat and not promote justice, if a verdict were set aside and a new trial granted for a defective summing up with reference to the weight of evidence in a case in which the High Court would, upon evidence given in a trial, have affirmed a conviction if, instead of a trial by jury, the trial had been before a Judge and assessors. It appears to us that the question to be considered is not whether, upon a proper summing up of the whole evidence, a jury might possibly have given a different verdict, but whether the legitimate effect of the evidence would require a different verdict.

In 21 Cal 955[2] however it was held that where a verdict is vitiated owing to misdirection by the Judge, the appellate Court has no option but to set aside the verdict and direct a retrial. This makes it difficult to see what meaning is to be attached to S. 537 (d), Criminal P. C. The judgment made no reference to the decision in 5 W R Cr 80[1] and it was dissented from in 25 Cal 711[3] where it was held that once the verdict is out of the way there is no restriction on the powers of the Court to deal with the case, of which it has complete seisin, in any of the manners provided in S. 423, Criminal P. C. The dictum of Sir Barnes Peacock was cited with approval in 29 Cal 782[4] and that seems to be the view that now prevails in the Calcutta High Court: see 58 Cal 96[5] and A I R 1932 Cal 474.[6] A discussion of the case law on the point is to be found in the judgment of Blacker J. in A I R 1940 Lah 87.[7] The view taken in 21 Cal 955[2] was followed by Walsh J. in 39 ALL 348[8] without reference to any other case. With all due respect I can see nothing in the words of S. 423 (2), Criminal P. C., to suggest that an erroneous verdict against the accused but not one in his favour can be set aside. The contrary view has been taken by the High Courts of Madras and Bombay and the Judicial Commissioner's Courts of Sind and Nagpur : see 26 Mad 1,[9] 27 Bom 626,[10] A I R 1933 Bom 153,[11] A I R 1925 Sind 116[12] and A I R 1926 Nag 53.[13] The conclusion reached by Blacker J. was that if the Court after examining the evidence finds that, even if the misdirection had not occurred, the jury could not reasonably have come to any other decision it will not interfere. I respectfully agree that in such cases the Court should not interfere.

I now turn to consider the evidence. The medical evidence shows that Anjani had a lacerated wound on the back of the left forearm caused by the breaking of her bangle, an abrasion on the back of the lower 1/3rd of the outer part of the left thigh, an irregular mark of discolouration 4″ in length and 2″ at the widest part on the outer part of the back lower third of the left thigh, an irregular mark of discolouration $1'' \times \frac{1}{2}''$ on the back of the right thigh, and an irregular mark of discolouration $3'' \times 1''$ on the outer side of the upper third of the right leg. There were also four scattered small abrasions on the right ankle. There were no signs of injuries on the private parts. The doctor who examined Anjani stated that these injuries could be caused in the course of the struggle between an unwilling woman and a man raping her. Harakchand was found to be suffering from gonorrhœa, but there is no evidence to show that Anjani was infected. It is clear that Sitaram and Radhabai were originally expected to give evidence in favour of the prosecution, and in the letter (Ex. p. 8) the accused Harakchand asked his brother to bribe them so that they would not give evidence against him. Either these two witnesses had been originally persuaded to give evidence in support of a false charge and were subsequently induced by friends of the accused to abandon that idea or they originally intended to give evidence in support of a true charge and were induced by friends of the accused to lie. As the learned Sessions Judge has pointed out, it would be natural to expect that, if their original intention was to give false evidence and they were persuaded to abandon this idea, they should say so. This they have not done, and there is, in my opinion, no reason to suppose that they originally intended to give false evidence in support of a false charge. I consider that Sitaram's evidence should therefore be accepted.

The accused has offered no evidence of any motive for the bringing of a false case against them, and the fact that there was some delay in the reporting of the case suggests that the whole thing was not a concocted affair. It is obvious that there was some sort of assault on Anjani at the house of Govinda that afternoon, and this has been conceded in this Court. The learned counsel for the accused, however, has contended that it was merely an indecent assault and did not amount to rape, and that the Sessions Judge ought to have put this possibility before the jury. It was not a possibility that seems to have occurred to anyone in the Sessions Court and it is obviously incompatible with most of the evidence in the case. I think that Harakchand was perhaps fortunate not to be convicted of rape ; but, in view of Anjani's admission, which may have been due to confusion and was not necessarily a true admission, that there was no penetration and the fact that she was not infected with gonorrhœa, it was natural enough for the jury to convict him of an attempt to rape rather than rape. The defence tried to explain the injuries on Anjani by saying that they were caused by a beating by her husband, and on that point there is the evidence of Radhabai. That evidence is obviously false, and if Anjani really had been beaten by her husband there would have been probably some other evidence forthcoming on that point. The injuries on her were not such as one would expect from a beating, nor were the injuries such as one would expect to find as the result of an indecent assault. On Anjani's lungra, which was seized on 11th September, marks of spermatozoa, not identified as human, and human blood-stains were found. There has been a certain amount of confusion about her clothes and why they were not washed and when they were seized, but there is, in my opinion, no good reason to doubt her story that the lungra which was seized by the police on the 11th was the one she was wearing at the time of the incident. If that is so, the marks of spermatozoa are further proof of an attempt to rape.

The convictions of Harakchand under S. 376/511 and of Govinda under S. 376/114, Penal Code, are, therefore, upheld. It is admitted that if Harakchand's conviction of an attempt to rape is upheld, then his conviction under S. 214/116, Penal Code, must also be upheld. The learned Sessions Judge stated that he took an extremely serious view of the case, not only because of the circumstances in which the offence was committed but also because of the physical condition of the accused and the disparity of the position of the accused and the victim, and that he was imposing the maximum sentences permissible. I agree that the fact that Harakchand was suffering from gonorrhœa at the time increases the heinousness of the offence, but I do not see that the disparity between the positions, apparently social positions, of the accused and his victim makes much difference; I should not regard it as a palliation of this offence of rape if the victim had been of an equal or higher social position. For an attempt to commit rape I think that the sentence is somewhat high and I reduce it to four years' rigorous imprisonment. I also think that the sentence of three years imposed on Govinda is unnecessarily high as he was acting under Harakchand's orders, and I reduce this sentence to two years' rigorous imprisonment.

Where the offence which the accused is seeking to have screened is an attempt to commit rape, the offence under S. 214, Penal Code, is punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to one fourth part of the longest term of imprisonment provided for an attempt to commit rape, i. e., one-fourth part of 5 years or 15 months. The maximum punishment for the abetment of such an offence is under S. 116, Penal Code, one-fourth of that term. The sentence imposed on Harakchand under S. 214/116, Penal Code, is, therefore, reduced from nine months to three months' rigorous imprisonment, and it will run concurrently with his other sentence. The sentences of fine will stand.

(b) C. P. Tenancy Act (1of 1920), Ss. 35, 12— Registered surrender by tenant of occupancy holding to stranger — Surrender is invalid — If transaction amounts to abandonment lambardar's remedy is under S. 35—If it is transfer in violation of S. 12 lambardar must proceed before revenue authorities — Suit for possession in civil Court should be dismissed.

Two occupancy fields were surrendered by tenants to one B, who posed himself as sadar lambardar in January 1920. The lambardar in January 1932 brought a suit against B in the civil Court for possession. The surrender was registered:

Held (1) that the document was not a surrender as B was neither lambardar, cosharer nor landlord;

(2) that if the tenants did not validly surrender the holding, they could effectively get rid of their tenant rights only by abandonment. In that case the remedy of the lambardar was to proceed under S. 35, Tenancy Act; [P 330 C 1,2]

(3) that if the transaction amounted to a transfer in violation of S. 12, the proper course for the lambardar to pursue was to proceed before the revenue authorities. Hence the suit for possession must be dismissed: ('40) 27 A I R 1940 Nag 49 (F B), Ref.

Judgment. — This is a second appeal by defendant 1 to a suit for possession. The plaintiff is the lambardar of patti No. 1 in the village Ambada. The subject-matter of the suit was ordinary fields in patti No. 1 which were held by two tenants, Chichkoo and Chanu in 1919-20. The suit was filed on 13th January 1932. Defendant 1 is closely connected with Baji Patel. Baji Patel is the person from whom the defendants derive the interest they have, and Baji Patel on 13th January 1920 purported, as sadar lambardar, to take a surrender from the tenants, Chichkoo and Chanu. In point of fact it has been found that at that time Baji Patel was not a lambardar and he was not a cosharer of patti No. 1 and this judgment proceeds on that basis. In other words, this is a case of a tenant purporting to surrender to a stranger his tenancy by a deed in January 1920, just 12 years before this suit was filed. That deed was registered. The plaintiff took a number of points. In the first place he said that the conveyance was not a surrender at all. Secondly he said that it was not properly or lawfully registered and that registration should have been refused because of the provision of S. 12 (4), Tenancy Act, which reproduces, with certain important alterations, S. 46 (5), of the Act of 1898. The sub-section provides as follows :

> Notwithstanding anything contained in the Indian Registration Act, 1908, no officer empowered to register documents thereunder shall admit to registration any document which purports to contravene the provisions of this section.

'This section' is the section which permits an occupancy tenant to transfer to certain persons and for certain purposes only. Nobody doubts that had the tenants in this case transferred to Baji Patel, that transfer would have been an infraction of S. 12. But they did not purport to transfer. As we have observed, they purported to surrender, and they purported to surrender to him as lambardar which he was not. It is said that that is a fraud on the registration officer, that the registration is wholly void, and that consequently we cannot even look at the document. If we do not look at the document the defendants can show no title in themselves and it is said therefore that the landlord can eject them as trespassers within a time limit of 12 years.

The learned lower appellate Judge has come to the conclusion that there has been no surrender. He has, however, come to the conclusion that what purported to be a surrender deed is in point of fact an unauthorised transfer. That finding of the lower appellate Court has not been adopted by the counsel for the respondents before us for reasons that are apparent from what we say hereafter. He has been very careful to deny that this is a transfer struck at by S. 12. On the contrary he says that it has no legal content at all : it is not a surrender and it is not a transfer ; it is just another thing. The lower appellate Judge, however, holding that the registration was in contravention of S. 12 (4) basing his opinion on 22 N L R 128[1] has held the registration to be void. Therefore no transfer could be proved and there was therefore no transfer within the meaning of S. 54, T. P. Act. Thus he arrived at the conclusion that the landlord was in a position to treat these persons as trespassers and accordingly this was a case of an illegal transfer under S. 12, and the jurisdiction of the civil Court was not barred.

If the cases are referred to in the judgment which went up to the Privy Council (First Appeal No. 22 of 1930) whose judgment is reported in I L R (1936) Nag 104,[2] it will be found that it was based, so far as the registration point is concerned, on a long line of authorities. The case that is reported that is, cited in the judgment is 13 N L R 165[3] and there were two unreported decisions doubtless relied on as being the latest decisions before the Judicial Commissioner's Court, First Appeal No. 13 of 1924[4] and Second Appeal No. 34 of 1923[5] which were decided in July and August 1924. If the case relied on by the learned lower appellate Court is referred to, 22 N L R 128,[1] it will be found that that also is based on 13 N L R 165[3] and on earlier decisions referred to in 13 N L R 165[3] and in the two above mentioned unreported appeals. That series laid down the broad proposition that where a document was presented to the registration officer which contained as a subject-matter of the conveyance a subject which the law said must not be transferred the resulting registration was of no effect, a view that the lower appellate Court has adopted, and properly adopted on the law as it stood at the time the learned Judge delivered his judgment which was 22nd January 1936, because it was not until July 1936 that the Privy Council had to consider this matter and reversed the decision which, as we have seen, followed a whole line of authorities above referred to. In our opinion, what the Privy Council decided in that case was this, that where, in point of fact, the registering authority receives a document > his function was to peruse the instrument and to see whether it purported to make a prohibited transfer, and, if he thought that it did not embody any such transfer, he was bound to admit it to registration.

As their Lordships observe, when he admitted it to registration he did so with jurisdiction. Consequently the resulting registration cannot be regarded as void though at the same time the fact that the document is registered does not in the least cure the defects in the conveyance so that if when you look at that document you find that it is dealing wholly or partly with a prohibited subject you apply the ordinary law and according to the ordinary law, which includes the statutory provisions as contained in S. 12, you conclude that the conveyance is either good or bad. From that, in our opinion, it follows that this case cannot be disposed of on the registration point, but one must treat this registration as effective and must look at the document and consider its effect. The argument having reached that stage counsel for the respondents finds himself in a very great difficulty because his case throughout has been that this is not a surrender, and it appears to us that it clearly is not for the very good reason that Baji Patel was neither lambardar, cosharer, nor landlord of the patti in question. In other words, he was not a person to whom a surrender can be made. Counsel for the respondents could not take up the position that it was a transfer, an illegal transfer, because if that were the case, then S. 12 would be attracted, and if this is an illegal transfer because of S. 12 S. 13 comes in. Stopping there we may observe that the provision about registration is one which disempowers the registering authority from registering a document which purports to contravene the provisions of S. 12. Either this document did so purport or it did not. If it did not then sub-s. (4) has no application. If it did then the attack that can be levied against the transaction would be the attack that it was contrary to the provisions of S. 12.

In our opinion there is a still further difficulty in the way of the plaintiff. This is a case in which when the story begins we have on the one hand a landlord and on the other hand two tenants. At all material times the attack is by the landlord against a stranger and it is founded on the right of a person entitled to immediate possession to evict a trespasser. The fundamental allegation in any such case is one which raises the right to present possession. But it has been certainly before us the case for the landlord that the tenants never effectively got rid of their tenant rights unless it were by abandonment. If it was a case of abandonment then S. 35, Tenancy Act, is attracted. That section creates a simple, inexpensive machinery highly suitable to this kind of case. It says that where it appears that an occupancy tenant has abandoned his holding, has for one year left the rent in arrear and has left the village the landlord can bring to an end that tenancy by filing a notice in the prescribed way and then he is entitled to enter. In other words, the Act provides a summary, inexpensive procedure for determining the possessory rights of an occupancy tenant. That procedure has admittedly not been followed in this case. We have searched in vain for any other special provision which brings this tenancy to an end. It has been said that it is brought to an end as a consequence of the operation of the law of prescription because Sch. 2 provides that a tenant who is dispossessed after two years loses his right of suit to evict a dispossessor. Founding on that it is said (an argument based on certain observations to be found in I L R (1940), Nag 348[6]) that at the end of the two years there has been, in the eye of the law, a notional transfer of the tenant's rights to the dispossessor, the term "transfer" within the Tenancy Act being wider than in the ordinary law. It is not necessary for the decision of this case to express any view on that broad proposition because if it be accepted it results in this, that there has been a transfer from the tenant to the stranger and that transfer is admittedly in violation of S. 12. If it be not accepted then there has been no transfer from the tenant to the stranger and the tenant is still the tenant. The right of possession is still in the tenant and the lambardar, before he can seek to evict the stranger, must determine the tenancy. If the first view is taken the proper course for the plaintiff to have pursued in this case was to proceed before the revenue authorities. If the second view is taken the right course for the plaintiff to take in this case is to operate under S. 35. In either event the suit as framed should have been dismissed. The result is that the appeal succeeds with costs here and below.

Civil Revn. Appln. No. 248 of 1940, Decided on 16th December 1940, for revision of order of Court of Addl. Dist. Judge, Jubbulpore, D/- 30th January 1940.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 33, R. 5 (d)—O. 33, R. 5 (d) contemplates subsisting cause of action not barred by limitation—Point of limitation or other law raised in pauper proceedings not complicated or open to doubt can be made ground of rejecting application under O. 33, R. 5 (d) — Whether point is simple is to be decided by Judge.

Order 33, Rule 5 (d), contemplates a subsisting cause of action which is not barred by limitation. Where the point of limitation or other law which is raised in the pauper proceedings is not complicated or open to doubt it can be made the ground of rejecting the application under O. 33, R. 5 (d). It is for the Judge dealing with the pauper application to decide whether the point raised is simple or difficult. If he considers it to be a simple point and decides it against the pauper it is not for the High Court in revision to say that it is a difficult point and that he should not have decided it : ('34) 21 A I R 1934 Rang 111 and ('32) 19 A I R 1932 Rang 107 (F B), Rel. on; ('32) 19 A I R 1932 All 543, Dissent.; Case law discussed. [P 333 C 1, 2]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 33, R. 7—Up to time of orders under R. 7 Court cannot take evidence except as to applicants' pauperism.

Up to the time of passing orders under R. 7 the Court cannot take evidence except as to the pauperism of the applicant. In cases where Court takes evidence before arriving at its decision, its findings can be set aside in revision. [P 334 C 1]

D. T. Mangalmurti and C. B. Parakh — for Non-applicants 1 and 2, and 3 to 7, respectively.

Order.—This is an application for revision of an order dismissing the applicants' application for permission to sue as paupers on the ground that their allegations do not disclose a cause of action, i. e., under cl. (d) of O. 33, R. 5. The fact that the applicants are paupers has been found in their favour. The lower Court has given several reasons for holding the view that the allegations do not disclose a cause of action. One is because the claim is barred by limitation and another is because the dealings of their predecessors in title would operate as estoppel against them. The third reason is that they are not shown to have been appointed trustees of the trust, to recover the property of which they seek to bring this action, and unless they are trustees they cannot sue. The fourth reason given is because the action ought to have been brought according to the procedure provided by S. 92, Civil P. C.

The applicants contend that all these contentions are complicated questions of fact and law which ought not to be decided in a summary manner at the time of considering the right of the applicants to sue as paupers but were most proper for consideration after the plaint had been admitted. In support of their contentions they have relied on 41 Mad 620,[1] A I R 1924 Mad 80,[2] 54 ALL 525,[3] A I R 1937 Cal 516,[4] 10 Rang 357,[5] A I R 1926 Mad 135[6] and A I R 1929 Lah 498.[7] Against this view and in support of the lower Court's order the non-applicants have relied on 7 ALL 661,[8] 13 Bom 126,[9] 20 ALL 299,[10] 19 Mad 197[11] and 27 Mad 37.[12] I shall therefore deal with these cases along with certain others which deal with the point.

In 4 Mad 323[13] it was held that the Court should not, in an application to sue in forma pauperis, go into the merits of the claim. This decision was not followed in 19 Mad 197[11] where it was held that on hearing a petition for leave to sue in forma pauperis the Court must decide whether the petitioner has at the date of the petition a subsisting cause of action capable of enforcement and where the cause of action is barred by res judicata or limitation, the petition must fail. In coming to this conclusion the Court followed the Full Bench ruling in 7 ALL 661,[8] with which I shall deal presently after finishing the Madras rulings. In 19 Mad 197[11] it was also held that the Court could take evidence and hear the parties for the purpose of deciding whether the application was subject to any of the prohibitions in S. 407 of the old Civil Procedure Code, corresponding to O. 33, R. 5 of the present Code. It was this latter aspect of the ruling which was overruled by the Full Bench of the Madras High Court in 13 M L J 292.[14] That decision does not purport to interfere with the statement of the law given in the headnote of 19 Mad 197[11] which cannot therefore be considered to have been overruled on that point. In 27 Mad 37[12] the same view was taken as in the headnote of 19 Mad 197.[11] All these cases were under the old Civil Procedure Code. Under the new Code the first Madras case to which I wish to refer is 41 Mad 620[1] relied on by the applicants. This case has been referred to in a large number of later rulings of various High Courts. There it was held that the Court is not justified in holding at the stage contemplated by O. 33, R. 5 an elaborate enquiry into doubtful and complicated questions of law and that O. 33, R. 5 (d) applies only to cases where the allegations of the petitioner clearly on the face of the petition do not show a cause of action. The reason given for this view is that the pauper has no right of appeal if the decision on the question of law is wrong. This ruling was followed in A I R 1919 Mad 218,[15] A I R 1924 Mad 80[2] and 69 M L J 816,[16] whilst A I R 1919 Mad 218[15] was itself followed in A I R 1926 Mad 135.[5] These decisions can be accepted as embodying the Madras view.

Turning next to Allahabad the leading case is the Full Bench decision in 7 ALL 661.[8] The question for determination there was whether the High Court had power to revise an order under S. 407, corresponding to O. 33, R. 5 of the present Code, rejecting an application for permission to sue in forma pauperis. The Court referred to the pronouncement by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 11 Cal 6,[17] in which it was laid down that the test to be adopted in determining the High Court's revisional powers was whether the lower Court had acted illegally or with material irregularity in the exercise of its jurisdiction. If it had not, then it is equally immaterial whether it decided the question rightly or wrongly. They then examined the sections of the Code which deal with pauper applications and held that it was necessary for pauper applicants to make out a good subsisting cause of action capable of enforcement in Court calling for an answer and not barred by the law of limitation or any other law. They then held that the lower Court was acting within its power in deciding the point of limitation in the pauper proceedings and had not therefore exercised its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity and hence they held that the High Court had no power to revise the lower Court's order. This ruling was followed in 20 ALL 299.[10]

When the new Civil Procedure Code came into force the effect of the alteration in the language of the corresponding provision was considered in 54 ALL 525,[3] which is the strongest case in favour of the applicants of all that I have looked into. In that case the High Court went to the length of saying that a point of limitation ought not to be gone into during the pauper proceedings since the words "cause of action" in O. 33, R. 5 do not mean or require a claim to be still enforceable under the law of limitation. In that case the Court did not consider itself to be bound by the Full Bench decision in 7 ALL 661,[8] because of the alteration in the wording of the Civil Procedure Code since the date of the earlier decision. Whereas the old Code used the words : "His allegations do not show a right to sue in such Court," the present Code says "where his allegations do not show a cause of action." They did not consider that the alteration of the language was merely intended to give effect to the decision in 7 ALL 661.[8] They agreed with the Madras view that it was unfair to a pauper suitor to deprive him of appeal by deciding a point of limitation in the pauper proceedings, but, whereas the Madras Court think that if the limitation point is simple and straightforward, the Court can decide it in pauper proceedings, the Allahabad High Court has held in this case that the Court cannot consider it at all, since it is difficult to draw a line between cases in which the point of limitation is simple and cases in which it is difficult, because one Judge might consider the point simple which another Judge might consider complicated. They then make a distinction between the existence of a cause of action and the enforcibility of that cause of action. They say that the Limitation Act does no more than make the cause of action unenforceable after a certain time. At page 528 they say :

> There is nothing in the explanation to S. 3 of the said Act (Limitation Act), which enjoins upon the Court a duty to dismiss the application to sue as a pauper merely because in its opinion the suit itself would be barred by time. It merely lays down the date on which the suit is to be deemed to have been instituted.

With respect I am unable to agree with this observation. It is true that the explanation to S. 3 does not enjoin upon a Court a duty to dismiss his application to sue as a pauper because the suit would be barred by limitation, but if we read the explanation along with the section itself, there can be no doubt that that is the intention of the Legislature. The section says that, subject to the provisions of Ss. 4 to 25, every suit instituted, appeal preferred and application made after the period of limitation prescribed therefor by Sch. 1 shall be dismissed, and then the explanation makes it clear that in the case of a pauper a suit is instituted when his application for leave to sue as a pauper is made. Accordingly, if we read the section along with the explanation, then the Court must dismiss the application to sue as a pauper if it is made after the period of limitation prescribed for the suit has expired. In the face of this direct provision in the law of limitation, it is useless to my mind to draw inferences from the decision of the Privy Council on other points as the learned Judges have done in quoting certain observations of their Lordships in 21 Cal 8[18] and 33 ALL 356.[19] With great respect therefore I am unable to accept 54 ALL 525[3] as good law. I am fortified in this view by the opinion in 12 Rang 124[20] of Leach J. who has also dissented from 54 ALL 525[3] and who is of the opinion that O. 33, R. 5 (d) contemplates a subsisting cause of action which is not barred by limitation. This was also the view of a Full Bench of the Rangoon High Court in 10 Rang 357[5] in which Page C. J. has said in the course of his judgment :

> The scheme of O. 33 is that before an applicant is granted the privilege of suing in forma pauperis it is incumbent upon him to satisfy the Court that his application is in proper form, that he has a good and subsisting cause of action, and that he is bona fide and in fact a pauper.

In A I R 1937 Cal 516[4] the learned Judge observed :

> Although I do not hold that it is not permissible for the Courts to enter into the question of limitation for the purpose of satisfying (themselves) as to whether the application for leave to sue as a pauper does or does not disclose any existing cause of action, yet the enquiry must be limited to the facts of the case apparent on the face of the plaint and any complicated question of law upon which a difference of opinion is possible should be avoided at this stage.

This is also the view of the Bombay High Court. In 13 Bom 126[9] the learned Judge, after referring to 7 ALL 661,[8] observed :

> I have frequently followed this ruling in hearing pauper petitions, where the facts were clear and the law evident; where, therefore, no injustice was likely to occur from disposing of the case in the inquiry under Chap 26 of the Code (the old Code).

Lahore and Patna High Courts appear to take the view that limitation points ought not to be considered in pauper proceedings at all : vide 3 Pat 275,[21] A I R 1924 Lah 659[22] and A I R 1929 Lah 498.[7] The view of the majority of the High Courts appears to be however that provided the point of limitation or other law which is raised in the pauper proceedings is not complicated or open to doubt it can be made the ground of rejecting the application under O. 33, R. 5 (d). This brings me up again the difficulty which was felt in 54 ALL 525[3] as to when a point is to be taken as simple and when difficult. Where is the line to be drawn? In my view it is a matter for the individual Judge who has dealt with the pauper application. If he considers it to be a simple point and decides it against the pauper I do not think that it is for the High Court in revision to say that it is a difficult point and that he should not have decided it.

The scheme of O. 33 is quite clear. Rule 1 allows paupers to sue and defines what is meant by a "pauper," R. 2 lays down what his application should contain; R. 3 states how it is to be presented; R. 4 provides for an examination of the pauper regarding the merits of his claim and about his means. Rule 5 provides that the Court shall reject the application for five reasons, the fourth of which is where his allegations do not show a cause of action Up to this point the rejection of the application does not prevent the applicant from making another application, if he removes the objection, and all that the Court has to go on is the application itself and the examination, if any of the applicant under R. 4. If the Judge decides that the application does not require to be rejected at this stage, he issues notices to the opposite party and the Government under R. 6 and takes evidence as to the pauperism of the applicant, and thereafter under R. 7 either allows or refuses to allow the applicant to sue as a pauper. This refusal is final under R. 15 and the applicant cannot apply again to sue as a pauper. Thereafter if he wants to continue the litigation, he must pay the court-fees and proceed as an ordinary litigant. Rule 7 however allows arguments to be advanced on any of the prohibitions contained in R. 5 before the Court passes an order. It is clear that the order in the present case is one under R. 7 because arguments were heard after notice to the opposite party had been issued.

Now it has been frequently pointed out that up to the time of passing orders under R. 7 the Court cannot take evidence except as to the pauperism of the applicant, and in those cases, where Courts have taken evidence before arriving at their decision, their findings have been set aside in revision. In the case before me the lower Court has been careful to confine itself to the contents of the application itself and arguments of counsel on either side were heard. The Court then proceeded to pass the order under revision. It considered the question of limitation to be a simple one and it has decided it against the applicants. I am therefore unable to see how the learned Judge can be considered to have exercised his jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity. It is not necessary to consider whether the Court has exceeded its jurisdiction in deciding the other points, which I have referred to at the commencement of this order, since, if the point of limitation is decided against the applicants, the order rejecting the pauper application must stand. I hold therefore that I am precluded from interfering in revision. The application therefore fails and is dismissed with costs. I allow Rs. 25 as counsel's fee.

Raje Shriniwasrao Raje Janardhanrao Nemiwant — Defendant — Respondent.

Second Appeal No. 259 of 1938, and Civil Revn. No. 870 of 1937, Decided on 16th December 1940, from appellate decree of Dist. Judge, Akola, D/- 11th March 1938.

(a) Berar Inam Rules, R. 3 — Estate is restricted though not life estate—After collateral heirs of two removes, estate is disallowed in absence of special orders.

Rule 3 declares that the estate that is certified as having been granted is a restricted estate though it is larger than a life estate. It has to be continued after the death of the first certificate-holder unto his widow, lineal heirs, undivided brothers, etc. When one comes to collateral heirs of two removes one reaches the end of the relationships to which this estate may pass and further degrees of relationship are disallowed except under special orders. That makes the estate a restricted tenure. The tenure is further restricted and differentiated from a fee simple tenure in that on each devolution a sum of money, called legacy duty or succession fee, has to be paid, the amount depending on the nearness of the relationship : 3 Bom 186 (PC); ('18) 5 A I R 1918 P C 203; ('26) 13 A I R 1926 Mad 1167 and ('17) 4 A I R 1917 P C 190, Ref.; 23 All 194 (P C); ('26) 13 A I R 1926 Oudh 561; 17 Bom 431 (P C); ('25) 12 A I R 1925 Bom 197; 6 N L R 72; ('16) 3 A I R 1916 Nag 55 and ('40) 27 A I R 1940 Nag 108, Disting. [P 335 C 1, 2]

(b) Berar Inam Rules, R. 3—Hyderabad Jagir is not personal but continues to relations mentioned in R. 3—Each holder is not grantee but holds only certificate—Certificate should show proper persons — If one of two persons is through mistake left out it should be corrected and both should be entitled to jagir.

A Hyderabad jagir is not personal to the grantee but continues to his descendants and R. 3 limits who those descendants are and declares that any one outside the degree of relationship above mentioned will not take unless special orders are passed. Each holder does not hold only for life and on his death there is no new grant but each successive holder is granted a certificate. In those certificates there should be put the proper persons i. e., lineal descendants of the original grantee. If the name of one of two persons entitled has apparently been left out the matter should be put right by issuing certificates to both and both would be equally entitled to the estate subject to R. 3 : ('25) 12 A I R 1925 P C 184, Rel. on. [P 336 C 2; P 337 C 1]

Judgment. — This raises a short point under the Berar Inam Rules. The point appeared to us at the very threshold of the case to be one simple and susceptible of only one answer, and accordingly we stopped counsel for the appellant after he had done little more than develop what the point was. In order to understand it and realize why, although we are disagreeing with the lower Courts, we still regard the point as a simple one it is necessary to state a few facts. The plaintiff sues his brother, the defendant, for the payment of a sum of money which represents what he says is his share in the income of certain villages in Berar. These brothers are the sons of the great-grandson of Raja Govind Narayan Bahadur. He was granted sanads in respect of these villages and at the time of the settlement in Berar these sanads were considered by the settlement officer who reported in the usual way.

Finally the matter came before the Governor-General in Council. The relevant part of the resulting decision is contained in a quotation to be found in the order of Mr. Parmanand who was the Record of Rights Officer in Amraoti in 1937 and who enquired into this case for revenue purposes. It is to be found at p. 159 of the paper book. It is not disputed that it is correct. It runs as follows :

> After full consideration of the circumstances represented, the Governor-General in Council concurs with your opinion that the sunnuds produced by the petitioners having been pronounced valid, the further disposal of their claims should in the case of inams A, B, D, E, be governed by R. 3, Inam Rules, and in the case of inam C by R. 4, the order imposing one-fourth assessment being cancelled.

That being the state in which the matter was left by the highest authority in 1877 it is the plaintiff's case that these villages have been granted by sanads before the cession of Berar in 1853, that the British authorities subsequently examined into the rights of the grantee under the sanads, pronounced the sanads valid and the holder under the sanads entitled to a certificate. It is, therefore, said that the certificate, if it does not define the succession, must be treated as recording that the succession is as stated in R. 3, Inam Rules, or R. 4, Inam Rules, as the case may be, and that so far as R. 3 is concerned, both plaintiff and defendant fall within the class of lineal heirs and that so far as R. 4 is concerned both are equally successors. Rule 3 is as follows :

> Personal jagirs to be continued, subject to a legacy duty or succession fees, graduated on a scale according to the degree of relationship of heir as follows :
> Widows, lineal heirs, or undivided brothers 2 per cent., on the real value of the property estimated at 10 years' annual rental.
>
> Heirs by adoption ... 3 per cent.
> Collateral heirs of one remove ... 5 per cent.
> ,, ,, two removes ... 8 per cent.
> And further degrees of relationship disallowed except under special orders.

Rule 4 provides for the continuation of the estate to the grantee and his successors. We construe R. 3 as declaring that the estate that is certified as having been granted is a restricted estate, but that it is larger than a life estate, and has to be continued, after the death of the first certificate-holder (who in turn is not the original grantee but the person enjoying the estate at the time of the inquiry into the original sanad or grant), unto his widow, lineal heirs, undivided brothers, etc. When one comes to collateral heirs of two removes one reaches the end of the relationships to which this estate may pass and, as the rule states, further degrees of relationship are disallowed except under special orders. That makes this a restricted tenure, and the tenure is further restricted and differentiated from a fee simple tenure in that on each devolution a sum of money, called legacy duty or succession fee, has to be paid, the amount depending on the nearness of the relationship. There are also in this particular grant imported certain conditions as to loyalty and good behaviour, and the grant is terminable on the pleasure of the British Government as appears from Mr. Parmanand's report at p. 161 of the paper book. None of those conditions affects the present case.

On the other hand it was strenuously urged that rule 3 gives a life estate only. That argument was founded on a number of decisions, three of them of the Judicial Committee, which it is said show that a jagir means a grant for life or lives for services and when you find a personal jagir you find a grant to a person for life even though there are words within the grant which would suggest a larger estate. Those cases are 3 Bom 186,[1] 46 Cal 683[2] at p. 692, 50 Mad 10[3] at p. 18 and 22 C W N 457.[4] We have not examined those cases for this reason: There is a broad distinction between jagirs originating in the Hyderabad State and other jagirs for as is observed in the letter from the Government of India Foreign Department No. 25-R, dated 23rd February 1877 :

> The Governor-General in Council also accepts the view that these inams are held in accordance with the custom of the Hyderabad State, which permits the continuance of such jagheers to posterity, notwithstanding the absence of specific provision on the point, but at the same time reserves to the state the right of resuming such grants at pleasure.

This also distinguishes such cases as 23 ALL 194[5] and 2 Luck 335.[6] In such matters Government has the right to determine the tenure so far as we can see although that is a matter that is not before us. Accordingly cases such as 17 Bom 431[7] and 49 Bom 126[8] have, in our opinion, no bearing on the present case; nor have cases such as 6 N L R 72[9] and 12 N L R 150[10] which were quoted to show that estates granted under R. 3 are of a restricted nature. See also ILR (1940) Nag 89.[11] No one doubts that these are of a restricted nature. The question is of the nature of the restriction.

It was further argued that R. 3 relates to the position of the original certificate-holder and that when it goes on to refer to such persons as widows, lineal heirs or undivided brothers it is concerned with the widow, lineal heir, or undivided brother of the person who at the time of the inquiry was enjoying the estate. It was not put exactly that way, it was said that one has to consider the widow, etc. of the original grantee. But the original grantee, in many of these cases, held under a grant centuries before the inquiry. In this particular case, if we accept the statement made in Mr. Parmanand's report which is to be found at p. 157 of the paper book and which is quoted from the remarks of the inam investigating officer, the particular grants in this case were two, one dated 1793 and the other dated 1811. These grants were to Raja Govind Narayan Bahadur and it is accordingly said that he was the first grantee. Raja Govind Narayan Bahadur had two sons Janardan and Harihar. It is said that there are other villages contained in other certificates in favour of Janardan. It is unnecessary however to go into that matter as at the time of the inquiry relating to the villages with which we are concerned Janardan was dead and accordingly we find Harihar granted the certificate. It is said that the authorities who made the inquiry and the authorities who concurred in the report of that officer and the Government of India when applying R. 3 were in effect saying:

"This is a grant to Raja Govind which should be continued to his, inter alia, lineal heirs. His lineal heir is Harihar. Therefore we continue it to Harihar."

It is also said that R. 3 stops there and prevents the title going on after Haribar's death to Kesho, his son, and that this list of persons—widows, lineal heirs, undivided brothers, so forth — are merely put in to show how much ought to be paid on the death of a grantee. In our opinion, as was indicated in I L R (1940) Nag 244[12], the grant in such cases is made for the benefit of the grantee's family within the restrictions indicated in Rule 3. We are dealing with a Hyderabad jagir. By custom that jagir is not personal to the grantee but continues to his descendants and R. 3, in our opinion, limits who those descendants are and declares that any one outside the degree of relationship above mentioned will not take unless special orders are passed. That being so the rest directly follows because R. 3 indicates that the property will pass to the lineal heirs of the grantee inter alia. No one else is suggested here and it appears to us plain that Shrinivasa and Vinayak, the defendant and the plaintiff respectively, are alike lineal heirs. Their relationship is as follows :

RAJA GOVIND NARAYAN BAHADUR
Haribar
|
Kesho = Kashi
|
Janardhan (adopted)
Shrinivasa (defendant) — Vinayak (plaintiff)

It was strenuously urged that the only person here entitled was the defendant because he is the only person shown in the certificate that was granted to the defendant in 1914. That argument proceeds on the basis that each holder holds for life and on his death there is a new grant and that new grant takes the form of a certificate. In our opinion that is not the correct way of describing what happens. The grants in this case, as we have above said, were made by the Nizam of Hyderabad, the one in 1793 and the other in 1811. Thereafter there has been no other grant but there has been a series of certificates. In those certificates there should be put the proper person and that that has not been done in this case has been recognized by the officer who inquired into this matter and whose order is to be found as Ex. P-17 in this case. That order is still under appeal; it is after the institution of this suit and cannot of course have any effect on this suit. We mention it only because it contains a number of extracts from documents that have not been stated to be wrongly extracted and it indicates that Government is minded to put right what would appear to be wrong. That is to say, they intend to grant to both these persons a certificate, as in 21 N L R 117[13] as one of two persons entitled has apparently been left out.

The facts in that case have been condensed in Second Appeal No. 115 of 1937 where a number of tables have been given which show what happened. The person in the position of Govind was there, Muzhar Ali who had two sons, Munawar and Amjad Ali. Munawar had three daughters and Munawar obtained the first certificate. That was, as their Lordships thought, by inadvertance because Amjad Ali was also the son of Mushar Ali and the half brother of Munawar and he was omitted, and the omission was corrected. After the correction they became two certificate-holders and the contest was between a descendant of Munawar and a descendant of Amjad Ali. The Privy Council did not regard either of those two persons as forming the root of title but regarded their father, Muzhar Ali, as the person from whom the lineal heirs should be traced, or as it was in that case, the male descendants. Here what one has to do is to trace the lineal heirs of Raja Govind; and as we have above observed, the plaintiff and the defendant are equal lineal heirs. Accordingly the certificate that has been granted to the defendant alone could only have been granted through some slip and the matter should, in our opinion, be put right as suggested by Mr. Parmanand by granting a certificate to both. With that however, we are not properly concerned our function being to construe the legal position here. That position we regard as plain and results in the conclusion that plaintiff and defendant are equally entitled to the villages subject to R. 3.

It is next necessary to consider the village subject to R. 4. That is an even plainer case because although the term "successors" is not of equal import to the term "lineal heirs" it is of a wider import and no reason has been suggested to us whatsoever why the defendant is any more a successor than the plaintiff excepting the reason that he has been given the certificate. That is no better reason in this case than in the case considered under R. 3. If there is a dispute as to the amount that will have to be further considered. Issue 12 (c) before the trial Court raises the question of the profits as regards the village of Kamardipur. Issue 11 (c) raises the question of the profits of Deodhaba village. The lower Court has found that the profits of the first were Rs. 261-8-9 and the profits of the second Rs. 4511-7-3. So far as we can see from the judgment of the lower appellate Court there was no dispute as to these findings and accordingly the matter stands as though those findings were accepted and the plaintiff will be entitled to a half of that sum and proportionate costs throughout. As however we cut the appellant short before this question was touched upon, should we be wrong in concluding that there is no dispute as to the amount, the matter can be spoken to. It is argued that the plaintiff is entitled to Rs. 2386-8-0 with interest at 4 per cent. from date of appeal to date of payment. There is a revision application. It relates to a sum of money that was payable by a descendant of Janardan, the senior branch, to the certificate-holder of Harihar branch. The plaintiff says that he is entitled, along with his brother, to half that sum which amounts to Rs. 250 per annum. Therefore he is claiming Rs. 125. It is a small cause suit and accordingly comes before us by way of revision. It raises precisely the same point as the major suit and it also succeeds. This judgment disposes of Second Appeal No. 259 of 1938 and Civil Revision No. 870 of 1937.

Emperor.

Criminal Revn. Appln. No. 422 of 1940, Decided on 29th January 1941, for revision of order of Addl. Sess. Judge, Chhindwara, D/- 9th September 1940.

Factories Act (1911), S. 5—C. P. Notification dated 17th January 1939, No. 202-2644-VII is intra vires.

The Government Notification No. 202-2644-VII, dated 17th January 1939 is not ultra vires of the Act. [P 338 C 2]

W. Dutt — for Applicants.

W. R. Puranik, Advocate-General — for the Crown.

Order. — The applicants who are respectively the proprietor and the manager of the Electric Supply Company at Chhindwara were prosecuted in respect of various breaches of the Factories Act. They were convicted and appealed. The Additional Sessions Judge, Chhindwara, remanded the case for a retrial on the ground that it had not been established that on any specified day there were more than ten workers in the factory. One of the grounds taken in appeal which had unsuccessfully been urged in the trial and which is the only point urged here in revision was that the Power House in respect of which the prosecution was lodged was not a factory within the meaning of the Act inasmuch the Government Notification No. 202-2644-VII, dated Nagpur 17th January 1939, was ultra vires of the Act. This point was not touched on in the remand order. The definition of a factory in S. 2 (j), Factories Act, runs as follows:

'Factory' means any premises including the precincts thereof whereon twenty or more workers are working, or were working on any day of the preceding twelve months, and in any part of which a manufacturing process is being carried on with the aid of power, or is ordinarily so carried on.

Section 5, Factories Act, runs:

(1) Notwithstanding anything contained in cl. (j) of S. 2, the Provincial Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, declare any place wherein a manufacturing process is carried on, whether with or without the aid of power, and wherein on anyone day of the twelve months preceding the notification, ten or more workers were employed, to be a factory for all or any of the purposes of this Act.

(2) A notification under sub-s. (1) may be made in respect of any specified place or class of places.

It is argued that, whether or no it is established that more than ten persons were working in the Power House on any particular day — and this is the point on which the case has been remanded — in any case the number employed did not amount to 20, and that if the contention that the notification purporting to be under S. 5 of the Act is ultra vires is correct, then there is no case against the applicants. The notification in question declares all places in the Central Provinces, wherein manufacturing process is carried on with the aid of power and wherein on any one day of the twelve months preceding the date of the notification ten or more workers were employed, to be factories under the Act. It is contended that the wholesale inclusion of all places worked with power where ten persons are employed renders S. 2 (j), Factories Act, nugatory and that the effect of the notification is to alter completely a clause in the Act itself and that the notification is not in respect of any class or places but is in respect of all places.

This contention cannot be upheld. The notification is not universal but selective inasmuch as S. 5 of the Act gives powers to the Provincial Government to make a declaration by a notification either in respect of places wherein a manufacturing process is carried on with the aid of power or without it. This particular notification is only in respect of places where the process is carried on with the aid of power. Again the notification does not render S. 2 (j) of the Act nugatory since the Act applies to the whole of British India, and a notification by the Provincial Government can only affect places in the Central Provinces. Places where manufacture is carried on with the aid of power is certainly comprised in a class of places, since the Provincial Government has also power to declare a place to be a factory, provided ten or more workers are employed, if the manufacturing process is carried on without the aid of power. It follows, then, that the notification is certainly intra vires of the power given to the Provincial Government by S. 5 (1), Factories Act.

It is then contended that as this is in the nature of a test case, in the event of this point being decided against the applicants the order of remand should nevertheless be cancelled as this was the real point sought to be elucidated. I cannot agree that the question of punishment of admitted breaches should not be considered because the principal ground taken has failed. There has been no suggestion that the remand order should be cancelled and that the fines would nevertheless be paid. Neither has it been urged, although possibly it might have been, that the remand order was an unnecessary one on the point whether it had been established that ten or more workers were engaged on any particular day. The application fails and is dismissed.

In re Nagarmal Jankiram Agarwale — Accused.

Criminal Ref. No. 219 of 1941, Decided on 7th July 1941, referred by Sess. Judge, Akola, in Criminal Revn. No. 15 of 1941.

(a) Public Gambling Act (1867) — Offences under—Criminal Procedure Code applies.

The ordinary provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code will regulate the investigation and trial of offences under the Public Gambling Act : ('23) 10 A I R 1923 Mad 339 ; ('29) 16 AIR 1929 Mad 604 and ('33) 20 A I R 1933 Sind 325, Expl., and Disting. [P 339 C 2]

(b) Public Gambling Act (1867), S. 5—Offence under S. 5 is cognizable.

In order that an offence may be a cognizable offence it is not necessary that every police officer should have the power to arrest without warrant. As the District Superintendent of Police has such power under S. 5, the offence is a cognizable offence: 27 Cal 144; ('30) 17 AIR 1930 Bom 49 and ('39) 26 AIR 1939 Nag 95, Rel. on. [P 339 C 2]

(c) Criminal trial — Arrest illegal, does not affect question of accused's guilt.

Even if the arrest is illegal, the Court would still have jurisdiction under S. 190, Criminal P. C., to take cognizance of the offence, and the question whether the arrest was valid or not would not affect the question whether the accused was guilty or not : 26 Mad 124 and 31 Cal 557, Rel. on. [P 339 C 2]

W. R. Puranik, Advocate-General — for the Crown.

T. B. Pendharkar and W. B. Pendharkar — for Accused.

Order. — This is a reference by the Sessions Judge, Akola, under S. 438, Criminal P. C. The Sub-Inspector of Police in Akola town, on the receipt of information that the accused Nagarmal habitually gambled on cotton futures by the road side, sent a man with marked coins to wager on a difference of figures and after the wager had been made searched the applicant, seized the coins, and arrested him. The accused was then prosecuted on a chalan presented by the City Police of Akola. The trial Court held that in the absence of any warrant under S. 5, Public Gambling Act, the proceedings were irregular and discharged the accused under S. 249, Criminal P. C. Section 5 (2), Criminal P. C., provides that all offences other than under the Penal Code shall be investigated, inquired into, and tried and otherwise dealt with in accordance with the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code but subject to any enactment for the time being in force, regulating the manner or place of investigating, inquiring into, trying or otherwise dealing with such offences. The Public Gambling Act contains no provisions regulating the investigating, inquiring into, or trying of offences under that Act. Section 5 deals with the power to search and arrest; S. 10 gives power to examine certain persons as witnesses; and S. 13 gives power to arrest without warrant in certain cases. The ordinary provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code will therefore regulate the investigation and trial of such offences and the decisions in AIR 1923 Mad 339,[1] 52 Mad 613[2] and AIR 1933 Sind 325[3] are not in point because they are decisions under Acts of which the provisions are widely different.

Section 4 (f), Criminal P. C., defines "cognizable offence" as one for which a police-officer may arrest without warrant. Under S. 5, Public Gambling Act, the District Superintendent of Police may arrest without warrant. I agree with the view expressed in 27 Cal 144,[4] 54 Bom 146[5] and I L R (1939) Nag 488[6] that in order that an offence may be a cognizable offence it is not necessary that every police officer should have the power to arrest without warrant. The fact that the District Superintendent of Police has such power makes it a cognizable offence, and the procedure adopted by the City Police was therefore correct. Even if the arrest were illegal, the Court would still have jurisdiction under S. 190, Criminal P. C., to take cognizance of the offence, and the question whether the arrest was valid or not would not affect the question whether the accused was guilty or not : see 26 Mad 124[7] and 31 Cal 557.[8] I therefore accept the reference, set aside the Magistrate's order under S. 249, Criminal P. C., and direct him to proceed with the case.

It is in the interest of the suitors that the Court is to act, that is to say the suitors in the case and not the suitors in some other case. They have their remedy in that case or by a separate suit.

In a small cause case A obtained a decree against B, and in execution attached a motor lorry belonging to B and made it over to C as custodian. B then paid up the full decretal amount to A and on the same day C, without waiting for a release order from the Court, returned the lorry to B. Meanwhile one D lodged an objection to the attachment of the lorry under O. 21, R. 58, C.P.C., but on the date of hearing he withdrew it as the lorry had been released. While these proceedings were going on two other persons G and I brought a suit against the same B in the Court of the same Judge before whom the first suit had been filed, but in this case the Judge was sitting on the regular side. G and I applied for an attachment before judgment during the course of which proceedings D was ordered to be put in possession of the lorry as a supurtdar. When the matter as to C's liability for his having released the lorry without a release order from the Court, was being argued D who was present in Court on that date explained that although he had been appointed supurtdar of the lorry in the case filed by G and I he had not been placed in possession of it. On this the Judge directed C to return the lorry or its value since he ought not to have returned it to B without a release order from the Court :

Held that since the parties to the small cause case were satisfied, and the objector D, had withdrawn his objection, he was no longer an interested party. The persons interested in the order against the applicant were the parties in another case and the objector D in his capacity as custodian in that case and not in his capacity as objector in the small cause case. The order applied against could not be passed. The remedy of the party aggrieved in the suit on the regular side was by an application in that case or by a separate suit : ('19) 6 AIR 1919 Lah 108 and (1871) L R 3 P C 465, Ref.; ('24) 11 AIR 1924 Nag 258, Disting.; ('34) 21 AIR 1934 All 357, Expl.; ('24) 11 AIR 1924 All 64, Rel. on.

R. S. Dabir — for Applicant.

Y. V. Jakatdar and D. G. Deshpande — for Non-applicants 2 and 3, respectively.

Order. — In Civil Suit No. 810 of 1938 of the Court of Small Causes, Khandwa, Seth Hardyal Singh, non-applicant 3, obtained a decree for Rs. 83-12-0 including costs against Anup Singh, non-applicant 1. In execution of this decree he attached a motor lorry belonging to Anup Singh on 20th November 1939, and it was made over to the decree-holder's brother Hemraj Singh, who is the applicant before me, as custodian. On 28th November 1939, Anup Singh paid up the full decretal amount to the decree-holder, and on the same day the applicant, without waiting for a release order from the Court, returned the lorry to Anup Singh. Meanwhile one Balraj, a garage proprietor, from whose garage the lorry was attached during his absence, and who had a claim for Rs. 100 against Anup Singh for repairs done to the lorry, claimed to be entitled to retain the lorry in his custody as security for his repair bill. He lodged an objection to the attachment of the lorry under O. 21, R. 58, Civil P. C., on 27th November 1939. The objection was put down for hearing on 29th January 1940, on which date he withdrew his objection as the lorry had been released. This Balraj is non-applicant 2 before me. While these proceedings were going on two other persons, Goduram and Ibadat Ali, brought a suit on 27th November 1939 against the same Anup Singh in the Court of the second Subordinate Judge, first class, Khandwa. This Court was presided over by the same Judge, before whom the other suit had been filed, but in this suit he was sitting on the regular side, while in the other he was sitting on the Small Cause Court side. This second suit (by Goduram and Ibadat Ali) was Suit No. 170-B of 1939. On 28th November 1939, i. e., on the same day that Anup Singh paid off his decretal debt to Hardyal Singh and recovered possession of his lorry, Goduram and Ibadat Ali applied to the Court to attach before judgment Anup Singh's lorry, and accordingly on the same day the Court ordered that a prohibitory order restraining the defendant from disposing of the lorry should issue, as also a notice to himself as the Small Cause Court Judge and to the applicant Seth Hemraj Singh not to hand over the lorry to Anup Singh without further orders from himself as Judge sitting on the regular side. This order did not reach Hemraj Singh until after he had returned the lorry to Anup Singh. This was brought to the notice of the Second Subordinate Judge first class next day on which he passed the following order :

29-11-39. Mr. De appears for Balraj who wants to file an objection for the attachment of the motor lorry. It was under attachment in Suit No. 810 of 1938 of Small Cause Court. But it has been released. The motor lorry shall be put in possession of Balraj as supurtdar. Balraj shall not take the motor bus outside Khandwa District and the supurtdar says that he shall not run the lorry on hire. A warrant for the attachment of the motor lorry before judgment to issue.

On the same day the learned Judge, sitting on the Small Cause Court side in the other case No. 810 of 1938, passed the following order:

Decree-holder makes an application saying that the decree has been fully satisfied. The execution case has been dismissed as fully satisfied. The supratdar shall hand over the property to Balraj who agrees to be the supratdar in another case No. 170-B of 1939 of the Court of Second Sub-Judge first class. It shall be treated as released in this case.

On 19th December 1939 the learned Judge in Civil Suit No. 810 of 1938 ordered a notice to issue to Hemraj Singh, custodian to show cause as to why he handed over the attached property to the judgment-debtor without the permission of the Court. Case for 29th January 1940.

On that date the applicant appeared by pleader and explained that he had made over the property to Anup Singh before he knew that any prohibitory order had been issued in respect of the lorry and he disclaimed liability. On the same date Balraj withdrew his objection to the attachment of the lorry in that case. The matter of the applicant's liability was then argued on 31st January 1940. The Court ordered the applicant to adduce formal proof of the receipt which he had filed and which purported to have been passed by Anup Singh in respect of the lorry and fixed 29th March 1940 as the date for proving this document. Balraj was also present in Court on that date and explained that although he had been appointed supratdar of the lorry in the other case filed by Goduram and Ibadat Ali, he had not been placed in possession of it. The Court ordered that that was not a matter with which he was concerned in Suit No. 810 of 1938, but it was a matter which arises in Civil Suit No. 170-B of 1939. Before the next date, 29th March 1940, the learned Judge was transferred and another Judge, Mr. Elahi Buksh took over charge of both Courts. When he came to deal with the case on 29th March 1940, he reconsidered his predecessor's order and directed the applicant to return the lorry or its value Rs. 500 by 12th April 1940 since he ought not to have returned it to Anup Singh without a release order from the Court. It is against this order that the present application for revision has been filed. In the meanwhile Civil Suit No. 170-B of 1939 terminated in an ex parte decree against Anup Singh for Rs. 261-7-0 including costs. From the above statements of the facts it is clear that none of the parties to Civil Suit No. 810 of 1938 is aggrieved by the action of the applicant; the decree-holder has received his money, the judgment-debtor has got back his lorry, and the objector Balraj has withdrawn his objection. Therefore the Court in passing the order of 29th March 1940 was not acting for the benefit of any of the parties to this case; it was acting for the benefit of the plaintiffs Goduram and Ibadat Ali in Civil Suit No. 170-B of 1939 and also for the benefit of Balraj who had been appointed custodian in that case. To the revision application the decree-holder Hardyal Singh and the judgment-debtor Anup Singh and the objector Balraj have been made parties but not the interested decree-holders in Civil Suit No. 170-B of 1939, so that the only party to this application who is interested in opposing it is Balraj. His contention is that, as the applicant had bound himself to produce the lorry or its value Rs. 500, when called upon by the Court to do so, and to obey any further order of the Court in respect thereof, he had no authority to hand it over to Anup Singh without a release order from the Court. He was an agent of the Court under O. 21, R. 43, Civil P. C., and the Court had to take action against its own agent when it received a prohibitory order from the regular Court under O. 21, R. 52. The case in 51 I C 653[1] is relied on. That case lays down that :

A sapurddar of attached property has no warrant or justification in making over the property to the judgment-debtor upon an attachment of the property coming to an end by virtue of O. 21, R. 57, Civil P. C. Inasmuch as the property is made over to his care by the Court, he is responsible to the Court for its production and if he is unable to produce it when called upon to do so, he is liable to pay its value.

But that does not touch the point which I have to decide, that is whether it is the Small Cause Court or the regular Court or neither which should take action against the defaulting custodian. Another case, in which the facts were somewhat similar to the facts before me and which has been relied on by the non-applicant-objector, is A I R 1934 ALL 357,[2] but that case also does not decide that it is the custody Court which should take action against the defaulting custodian. There, as here a motor vehicle was attached in a Small Cause Court suit and was handed over for custody to a custodian and on satisfaction of the decree in the Small Cause Court suit the custodian returned the vehicle to the judgment-debtor without waiting for an order from the Court to do so. The only difference between the facts of the two cases is that in that case notice of the second attachment of the vehicle by the regular Court, in which another suit was pending was served on the Amin of the Small Cause Court who had handed over the vehicle to the custodian for custody, whereas in the case before me it was the Small Cause Court itself which was notified by an order under O. 21, R. 52. In that case the Amin did not inform the custodian of the second attachment with the result that the vehicle was handed back to the judgment-debtor. The difference between the two cases is of no importance except that as it was the Amin and not the Court who was notified no question arose of the Small Cause Court proceeding against the defaulting custodian. There the regular Court, which issued the second order of attachment, proceeded against the custodian, and therefore the case supports the applicant rather than the objector.

The third case relied on by the objector is 20 N L R 93.[3] In that case the custodian was the decree-holder. He was ordered to return certain crops, which had been placed in his custody, to the judgment-debtor when the latter deposited the full claim into Court. Instead of doing so he only returned a portion of the crops to the judgment-debtor, who consequently applied to the Court for an order to the custodian decree-holder to pay him the value of the crops withheld. The question was whether the executing Court could make such an order or whether it was necessary for the judgment-debtor to bring a separate suit against the defaulting custodian: it was held that the executing Court could recover the amount from the custodian. That case is easily distinguishable from the case before me because there it was a party to the execution proceedings, in which the property was entrusted to the custodian, that applied for an order against him, whereas in the case before me the parties to the execution proceedings are satisfied, and the objector, having withdrawn his objection, is no longer an interested party. The persons interested in the order against the applicant are the decree-holders in Civil Suit No. 170-B of 1939 and the objector in his capacity as custodian in that case and not in his capacity as objector in Civil Suit No. 810 of 1938. The decision in 20 N L R 93[3] is founded on certain remarks of the Privy Council in (1871) L R 3 P C 465[4] at p. 475 from which the following passages have been quoted at p. 99. The first passage is:

> One of the first and highest duties of all Courts is to take care that the act of the Court does no injury to any of the suitors and when the expression 'the act of the Court' is used, it does not mean merely the act of the primary Court, or of any intermediate Court of Appeal, but the act of the Court as a whole, from the lowest Court which entertains jurisdiction over the matter up to the highest Court which finally disposes of the case.

The second passage is:

> It is the duty of the Court, under S. 144, Civil P. C., 'to place the parties in the position which they would have occupied, but for such decree or such part thereof as has been varied or reversed'. Nor indeed does this duty or jurisdiction arise merely under the said section, it is inherent in the general jurisdiction of the Court to act rightly and fairly according to the circumstances towards all parties involved.

These passages from their Lordships' judgment show that it is in the interest of the suitors that the Court is to act, that is to say the suitors in the case and not the suitors, in some other case, as in the present instance. They have their remedy in that case or by a separate suit, and it is not for me in this revision application to indicate which it is. A case which appears to me to be very similar in its facts to the case before me is A I R 1924 ALL 64.[5] There Jwala Prasad in a suit against one Sewa Singh caused the attachment of certain crops. Sheikh Chhuttan brought a suit against Jwala Prasad and others for a declaration that the crops were not liable to sale under Jwala Prasad's decree but were the property of himself and his tenants. While Sheikh Chhuttan's suit was being tried, the execution of Jwala Prasad's decree was kept pending, and in Sheikh Chhuttan's suit the crops were entrusted to a custodian. When Sheikh Chhuttan was successful in the trial Court, the custodian handed over the crops without any release order from the Court to Sheikh Chhuttan and his tenants, but subsequently Sheikh Chhuttan lost his case in the appellate Court. Jwala Prasad therefore applied that the crops be brought to sale in execution of his decree and a notice was issued to the custodian to produce the property. He objected that he was not the custodian in Jwala Prasad's suit but in Sheikh Chuttan's suit. It was held that:

> His (custodian's) position being substantially that of a receiver under Chapter 40 of the Code the Court might in that suit have called on him to produce the crops or their value. It could not do so in a suit to which he was an entire stranger .... Whatever remedy the respondent (Jwala Prasad) had against the appellants (Sheikh Chhuttan etc.) was either by application in Sheikh Chhuttan's suit, to which the respondent was a party or by a separate suit.

It is clear that the case is slightly different from the case before me but mutatis mutandis the reasoning can be applied with full force to the case before me. I agree with the observations there expressed and therefore this application must be allowed. The lower Court's order to the custodian is set aside and the paper in Civil Suit No. 810 of 1938 will be filed. Counsel's fee Rs. 20.

Mohamad Aminuddin Qayamuddin Musalman — Defendant — Appellant

v.

Mohammad Abdur Rahman Azimuddin and another — Plaintiffs — Respondents.

Second Appeal No. 391 of 1938, Decided on 14th March 1941, from appellate decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Chanda, D/- 15th January 1938.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 100 — Adverse possession — It is question of fact and cannot be interfered with if law is properly appreciated — If lower Court has not understood law properly, High Court can consider point.

Whether a right to a property has been lost by reason of adverse possession is a question of fact, and if the law has been appreciated aright in the lower Court and if the necessary evidence has been there, the point cannot be agitated in second appeal. But if the Judge of the lower appellate Court has not understood the law aright, the High Court in second appeal can consider the point.

(b) Mahomedan law — Cosharers — Brother and sisters taking father's property are co-owners — Brother taking possession of whole — To deprive sisters of their rights, brother must prove ouster — Strong proof is necessary —Actual exclusion to knowledge of sisters must be proved.

Under the Mahomedan law, a brother and his sisters become co-owners in the estate of their father when the latter dies and if one of those co-owners (e. g., the brother) enters upon possession of the whole, the law presumes in such circumstances that he has entered upon possession for and on behalf of all. It is then necessary for him to prove ouster before he can succeed in depriving the others of their interests in the estate. The proof of ouster in these circumstances has to be extremely strong and ordinarily can only be sustained by actual exclusion of rights to the knowledge of the person excluded. Circumstances may exist in which an inference of knowledge can be drawn, or in which the laches or negligence of the co-owners is so great that knowledge will be presumed, but a case of that type would have to be very exceptional. The law does not penalise a co-owner who relies on the honesty of his cosharer and therefore ordinarily the mere fact that he does not take the trouble to assert as many of his rights as he may be entitled to would not justify an inference of ouster : ('37) 24 A I R 1937 All 696, Dissent.; ('34) 21 A I R 1934 P C 23; ('35) 22 A I R 1935 P C 36 and ('37) 24 A I R 1937 Lah 890, Disting.; ('30) 17 A I R 1930 Cal 466 ; ('27) 14 A I R 1927 All 454 ; ('21) 8 A I R 1921 Cal 647 and ('36) 23 A I R 1936 Nag 282, Ref.

(c) Mahomedan law—Cosharers — Ouster — Sisters taking maintenance from brothers — Partition between males without reference to sisters does not amount to ouster.

In the case of Mahomedan families it is unusual for Mahomedan ladies to insist on their unquestioned rights. They often prefer being maintained by their brothers to taking a separate share for themselves ; the mere partition among the males without reference to them does not mean much in the shape of ousting them from their rights : ('17) 4 A I R 1917 P C 181 and ('33) 20 A I R 1933 Nag 27, Rel. on. [P 345 C 2]

(d) Adverse possession—Co-owners—Ouster — Demand and refusal or clear knowledge of ouster is necessary — Omission to pay profits does not amount to ouster.

There cannot be ouster without a demand and a refusal, or without a clear declaration brought home to the knowledge of the cosharers that lesser profits were being paid because the others were being ousted from the remainder of the share. A mere omission to pay profits does not in itself constitute ouster and still less so when something, though not the whole, is paid. [P 345 C 2]

Judgment.—The genealogical tree of the parties is as follows :

AZIMUDDIN (died 1901)
daughter Gulmirbi

Abdul Rahman (plaintiff)	Amirunissa (died on 28-3-34)	= Aminuddin (deft. 1)	Zaibunissa (deft. 2).

The plaintiff sues for joint possession with the defendants to the extent of 1/3rd share in four pies in certain malguzari villages. The plaintiff's case is that his sister Amirunissa owned these four pies. She died on 28th March 1934 leaving her husband, defendant 1 who is the appellant here, Md. Aminuddin, and a sister Zaibunissa who is defendant 2. The extent of the plaintiff's share is admitted by both sides, namely 1/3rd, and so I need not dilate upon that. The dispute centres around the property which the deceased left. According to the defendants, she owned six pies share in these villages and not four, and as the remaining two pies share is in possession of the plaintiff they state that the whole must be brought into hotchpotch before the plaintiff can be given his decree. Whether the deceased had a six pies share or a four pies depends upon whether the plaintiff had ousted her from possession of a two pies share for a period of 12 years and thus acquired that share for himself by adverse possession. It will be necessary to give some further facts in order to appreciate this point. Azimuddin, the father of the plaintiff and defendant 2, died in the year 1901 leaving shares in three villages. On his death these shares were recorded in the name of the plaintiff. According to the plaintiff a dispute arose in the year 1911 or 1912 between his sisters and himself about this mutation and it was settled by the plaintiff giving Amirunissa four pies share. He states that he did not give her the other two pies though it is admitted that she would have been entitled to the extra two pies as a heir of Azimuddin. The plaintiff states that this is how Amirunissa came to possess only four pies at the time of her death. Whether the deceased lost her right to this extra two pies by reason of the plaintiff's adverse possession is of course a question of fact and had the law been appreciated aright in the lower Court and had the necessary evidence been there, the point could not have been agitated in this Court. But, I am not satisfied that the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court has understood the law aright. The plaintiff and his sisters were co-owners in the estate of their father Azimuddin when the latter died in 1901. One of those co-owners, the plaintiff, entered upon possession of the whole. The law presumes in such circumstances that he has entered upon possession for and on behalf of all. It is then necessary for him to prove ouster before he can succeed in depriving the others of their interests in the estate. The proof of ouster in these circumstances has to be extremely strong and ordinarily can only be sustained by actual exclusion of rights to the knowledge of the person excluded. The learned Judge of the lower appellate Court has cited A I R 1930 Cal 466[1] which decides that. In addition, there is 49 ALL 763[2] at p. 770, also 26 C W N 65.[3] I have also decided this question in I L R (1937) Nag 242.[4]

It may well be (though I say nothing about it) that circumstances may exist in which an inference of knowledge can be drawn, or in which the laches or negligence of the co-owner is so great that knowledge will be presumed, but a case of that type would have to be very exceptional. The law does not penalise a co-owner who relies on the honesty of his cosharer and therefore ordinarily the mere fact that he does not take the trouble to assert as many of his rights as he may be entitled to would not justify an inference of ouster. In A I R 1929 Oudh 337[5] it was held that the mere entry of a name in the mutation register is no indication of adverse possession until it is shown that it was obtained after a clear declaration to the effect that the title of the other cosharers was denied. This decision will be referred to when we come to consider EX. D-3. The learned Judge of the lower appellate Court, after referring to the rulings which hold that ouster to the knowledge of the cosharer must be proved, goes on to state that though the rulings cited have so decided, there are Privy Council decisions which modify that and that, according to those decisions, it is not necessary to show that adverse possession was brought home to the knowledge of the true owner. It is enough to show that possession was overt and without any attempt at concealment. The learned Judge relies in particular on A I R 1937 ALL 696[6] which lays down that proposition.

So far as the two Privy Council rulings cited are concerned, namely 61 Cal 262[7] and 14 Pat 327,[8] neither was a case of a co-owner or a cosharer. The whole difference in the law lies there. If this had been an ordinary case of adverse possession against a person who was not a co-owner, then the law as enunciated by the learned Judge would have been unexceptionable. It is true that the Allahabad decision cited lays down that proposition in a case of co-owners, but with the utmost respect (it was a single Judge decision) I am unable to agree. As regards A I R 1937 Lah 890,[9] that lays down that non-participation in rents and profits for a very long time (80 years in that case) may amount to ouster. I have no quarrel with that proposition. The point is that there must be ouster, and ouster in circumstances like the present can only be shown if the exclusion is brought home to the knowledge of the person ousted. That position the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court has not appreciated. It is necessary therefore for me to consider whether the evidence on record is sufficient to establish ouster. The learned counsel for the plaintiff relies strongly on the fact that in the year 1914 mutation was effected in Amirunissa's favour to the extent of four pies only and that this was to the knowledge of both sisters. He states that this proves ouster, especially when coupled with the fact that the sisters were never paid anything more than such share of the profits as would come to four pies. It has been held in the case to which I have referred that mere mutation in itself does not constitute ouster. In the present case that is especially so when we find that the plaintiff represented the sisters before revenue authorities and that he made an express statement which is to be found in Ex. D-3, to the following effect :

> Both these are my sisters. Under the Mahomedan law some share in both the mouzas goes to them. Mutation in respect of both the mouzas be effected in the name of my sisters.

This imports a clear admission that the sisters are cosharers with the plaintiff and that they are entitled to a share according to the Mahomedan law. This share admittedly was 6 pies and not 4 pies. The mere fact that four pies was mutated after this admission would not indicate ouster. It does not show that the plaintiff stated to his sisters that though he represented them before the mutation authorities and though he impliedly admitted that each was entitled to 6 pies, nevertheless because the revenue officer had made a mistake in calculation therefore he intended in future to oust them from the remaining 2 pies. The point which the lower appellate Court has missed is that there was no denial by the plaintiff of their right to the remaining 2 pies. Another point on which the learned counsel relies, and it has also been relied on in the lower appellate Court to some extent, is that a settlement took place in the year 1923-24 and that in that settlement the sisters did not assert their right to 6 pies. Two answers are possible to this. The first is that this suit was filed on 28th August 1936 and that it is not shown on what date in the year 1923-24 the settlement entries were made. Consequently it is not shown that the ouster, if indeed this can constitute ouster (and I do not think so), occurred more than 12 years before suit. The other reply is furnished by the observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 45 Cal 450[10] at pp. 464 and 465, observations which have been followed in this Province in 28 N L R 282[11] and in other cases which have not been reported, to the effect that in the case of Mahomedan families it is unusual for Mahomedan ladies to insist on their unquestioned rights, and that they often prefer being maintained by their brothers to taking a separate share for themselves and that the mere fact of partition among the males without reference to them does not mean much in the shape of ousting them from their rights.

The next matter referred to was an imperfect partition in the year 1926-27 in which the sisters, or rather Amirunissa, were ousted, but that is well within 12 years before suit; so also as regards the conduct of the defendant referred to by D. W. 4. He relates to an incident which occurred some seven or eight years before 1937 when he was deposing. The most important person to explain whether the plaintiff had ousted his sisters or not would naturally be the plaintiff himself. He entered the box as P. W. 1 and though he states that he never paid any profits in excess of the 4 pies share to either of his sisters, he admits that there was never any demand for the profits appertaining to the additional 2 pies share and admits that there was never any refusal on his part. There cannot be ouster in these circumstances without a demand and a refusal, or without a clear declaration brought home to the knowledge of the cosharers that lesser profits were being paid because the others were being ousted from the remainder of the share. He states that the reason he did not give his sisters their shares in the fields was because they did not demand it. The cases to which I have referred show that that makes very little difference in the case of these Mahomedan families, and that even in other cases a mere omission to pay profits does not in itself constitute ouster and still less so when something, though not the whole, is paid.

So far as the case of gift in 1911, pleaded by the plaintiff, is concerned, that has not been found in his favour, and in any case even if it had been, his subsequent admission in the mutation proceedings in 1913 (EX. D-3) would nullify the effect of any assertion of a hostile title which he had set up a year or two before. On a consideration of the evidence I am not satisfied that ouster has been established. Under the law Amirunissa would be entitled to 6 pies, and as the remaining 2 pies are in possession of the plaintiff, he must bring them into hotchpotch. The result is that the plaintiff is entitled to 1/3rd of 6 pies. He is already in possession of 2 pies, and as that is 1/3rd of the 6 pies to which he is entitled under the law there is nothing more to decree. The suit was unnecessary. It is accordingly dismissed with costs in all three Courts.

STONE C. J. AND CLARKE J.

Mithoolal Girdharilal — Plaintiff — Appellant

v.

Babu Jainarayan Bahadurlal and others — Respondents.

First Appeal No. 38 of 1939, Decided on 10th December 1940, from decree of Extra Addl. Dist. Judge, Jubbulpore, D/- 31st January 1939.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 11—Might and ought — Plea not raised for want of knowledge—Fact with due diligence could have been discovered —Plea is barred by res judicata.

A plea which the plaintiff in the subsequent suit ought to have taken in the previous suit is barred and the fact that he had no knowledge of the fact which he ought to have pleaded is of no avail if with due diligence he could have discovered the fact in the previous suit : 42 C W N 560, Disting. [P 349 C 1, 2]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 11 — Court in previous suit not having pecuniary jurisdiction to try subsequent suit — S. 11, though in terms does not apply, general principle of res judicata applies.

In a previous suit for dissolution of partnership and accounts, the plaintiff placed a tentative valuation of Rs. 5500 upon it, reserving the right to receive more than Rs. 5500 if more were found due to him subject only to payment by him of additional court-fee. In a subsequent suit he valued his suit for jurisdiction at Rs. 2 lakhs :

Held that S. 11 could be applied. [P 349 C 2]

Held further that even if S. 11 did not in term apply, the general principle of res judicata applied : Case law referred. [P 349 C 2]

(c) Res judicata — Judgment by consent and facts admitted are as effective as judgment on contest or facts which were in dispute.

A judgment by consent and facts admitted are just as effective for the purposes of res judicata as a judgment passed on contest or facts which were in dispute : 63 Cal 550, Rel. on. [P 350 C 2]

(d) Res judicata—Question decided by necessary implication is res judicata.

A question which is decided by necessary implication operates as res judicata : Case law referred. [P 350 C 2]

(e) Res judicata — Bar of res judicata cannot be avoided by overvaluing subsequent suit.

A plaintiff cannot escape from the bar of res judicata by overvaluing the subsequent suit so as to put it beyond the pecuniary jurisdiction of the Court which tried the previous suit : 10 C P L R 89 and 10 Cal 697, Rel. on. [P 350 C 2; P 351 C 1]

R. N. Padhye and P. Lobo — for Appellant.

M. B. Kinkhede and A. R. Kulkarni, and V. K. Sanghi and M. D. Khandekar — for Respondents 1, 2 and 4, and 3, respectively.

Judgment. — The appellant-plaintiff was for some time prior to 1926 a partner of respondent-defendant 1. In that year they fell out, but instead of bringing an action against defendant 1 for dissolution of partnership and accounts they agreed to submit their dispute to arbitration, and defendants 2 to 4 were appointed arbitrators. On 12th August 1928, the plaintiff gave a notice to the arbitrators cancelling his consent to their arbitrating in his dispute with defendant 1, the reason according to him being that he had discovered that they were not disinterested persons but were partisans of defendant 1, and he then brought an action No. 83 of 1928 against Jainarayan for dissolution of partnership and accounts valuing his suit at Rs. 5500. One of the defences to the suit put forward by the defendant was that the arbitrators had delivered their award on 12th August 1928, that is to say on the same day on which, according to the plaintiff, he had served them with notice of cancellation of the agreement to submit to arbitration, and that that award was binding on the plaintiff. Preliminary issues were framed in the suit as to whether the arbitrators' award was void or binding and the Court held that the award was binding and the plaintiff's suit was consequently dismissed. This decision was upheld in first appeal by the Judicial Commissioner's Court on 16th April 1930. In 1933 the plaintiff applied to the Judicial Commissioner's Court for a review of judgment in that appeal on the ground that he had discovered in May 1933 new and important documentary evidence which proved that the arbitrators were biased in favour of the defendant. The Court rejected the review application on 25th January 1935.

Then on 28th April 1936 the plaintiff applied for permission to bring the present suit as a pauper, but permission was refused, and his application to the High Court for revision of the order met with a similar fate. Accordingly he paid the necessary court-fee and the suit went to trial. In this suit he alleges that it came to his knowledge for the first time on 8th April 1936 that the arbitrators had never given an award at all and that his previous suit had been founded on an erroneous assumption that there had been an award, that the arbitrators fraudulently conspired with defendant 1 to make the plaintiff believe that they had given an award, when actually they had not done so, and therefore he now wants a bare declaration that no award was given. Such a declaration carries with it as a consequence a conclusion that the partnership between defendant 1 and plaintiff is still continuing. The present suit is valued for purposes of jurisdiction at two laks of rupees, but, as it has been framed as a suit for a declaration only, the plaintiff has paid a court-fee of no more than Rs. 15. After the parties had submitted their pleadings the plaintiff applied to amend his plaint by adding to the relief which he claimed an alternative prayer that if the Court should hold that the arbitrators had given an award then the defendants should be ordered to deliver it up to the plaintiff. On the pleadings the following preliminary issues were accordingly framed:

(i) Whether the decision in Civil Suit No. 83 of 1928 operated as res judicata;

(ii) whether the suit for a mere declaration without consequential relief was maintainable; and

(iii) whether the plaintiff should be allowed to amend his plaint as desired.

On issue 1 the lower Court has found that the suit is not barred by res judicata but that the plaintiff is estopped from reopening the case. On issue 2 it has held that a suit for a bare declaration is not maintainable, and on issue 3 that the amendment cannot be allowed because it is inconsistent with the first relief claimed. By reason of these findings the plaintiff's suit has been dismissed and he has now come before us on appeal. One line of attack has been against the finding that the plaintiff is estopped from reopening the case, and in answer to that the defendant has argued that the finding that the suit is not barred by the doctrine of res judicata is wrong. Accordingly the main point for determination in the appeal is whether the suit is barred by either of the doctrines of res judicata or estoppel. The new fact which, according to the plaintiff, had come to his knowledge on 8th April 1936 is, as stated above, that no award was in fact given by the arbitrators. The other facts found in the previous suit are not disputed. It is obvious therefore that if in fact the arbitrators have given an award, then it is useless for the plaintiff to say that he has since discovered that no award was given. As to the existence of an award this was admitted by the plaintiff in the previous suit. One has only to glance at the judgment in that suit which is Ex. D-1 in the case before us to see that. The second sentence of that judgment is to the effect:

> It has been admitted by both the parties that their disputes were referred to arbitration on 14th August 1926 by a duly executed deed of agreement and that the arbitrators have given their award.

The last paragraph of that judgment also contains the finding:

> The award given by the arbitrators is not void. As the arbitrators have decided all the disputes finally by fixing the date of dissolution of partnership as well as the amount finally due by the defendant to the plaintiff this suit is not maintainable.

It was never suggested in that suit that there was any doubt as to the existence of the award. The admission of the plaintiff as to the existence of that award in that suit is contained in Ex. P-64—the statement by the plaintiff's pleader admitting the defendant's documents. He says:

> The following documents out of those filed by Tulsidas (defendant 3 in the case before us) are admitted.

Item 12 in the list is a postal acknowledgment dated 16th August 1928, and he concluded his statement by saying: "It is admitted that arbitrators sent a copy of award to plaintiff by post." The postal acknowledgment dated 16th August 1928, Ex. D-12, shows that the plaintiff received a registered letter No. 108 from Mr. J. R. Paranjpe, pleader, who is one of the arbitrators and defendant 2 in the case before us, and Ex. D-11 shows that the same letter was posted in Jubbulpore on 13th August 1928, i.e., the day after the award is said to have been given. So it is obvious that the plaintiff received a letter from Mr. Paranjpe on 16th August 1928, and he does not even now dispute that the paper which he received then satisfied him at the time that it was a copy of the award which the arbitrators had given. Unfortunately the paper which the plaintiff then received is not forthcoming, the explanation being that it had remained with the plaintiff's pleader Mr. Sheo Prasad and could not be found among his effects when he died. Two documents were produced in that case by the defendant as Exs. D-15 and D-14, and it was assumed in that case that, whether they constituted the original award or not, they certainly represented the conclusion to which the arbitrators had come, and as the existence and nature of the award was not in dispute, no question arose as to whether Exs. D-15 and D-14 were the original award or only a copy of it or, as the plaintiff now contends, not even a copy of it but a fictitious document which did not represent the correct findings of the arbitrators, but was sent to the plaintiff fraudulently to make him believe that an award had been given. In his deposition in that suit, a copy of which is before us as Ex. P-56, the plaintiff said :

I do not remember that I received the award by registered post before filing this suit, but I have received the award by registered post.

The only doubt he had was whether he received it before or after the filing of the suit. The plaint was actually filed on 29th August 1928, Ex. P-52. So after he was in possession of the copy of the award he filed the suit. Consequently, he knew the contents of the award and the fact that the award had been given was brought to his notice. Moreover he had one of the foremost pleaders in Jubbulpore to help him and there could be no doubt about the document being a copy of an award, and if it was a copy of the award, there must have been an original award for it to be a copy thereof. Why then has the plaintiff come to the conclusion that Exs. D-15 and D-14 did not represent the real award of the arbitrators and that in point of fact no award ever existed? For this we have to see Ex. P-3. This is an application dated 10th February 1936 by the plaintiff to the arbitrator Tulsidas asking him if he had the original award in his possession, since it had come to the plaintiff's knowledge on 8th February 1936 from Tulsidas's agent that no award had been given, when the plaintiff's notice revoking the submission of the case to arbitration was received by the arbitrators, and that the award produced in Court had been fraudulently prepared. From this it is clear that the award produced in that Court was Exs. D-15 and D-14 and the list of documents filed in that case does not disclose any other document which could have been this award, nor does it show that any document was removed from the record after the case terminated. To this application, Ex. P-3, Tulsidas wrote a reply on the same paper, the reply being dated 8th April 1936 and saying :

On your first application, it has been clearly stated that no papers concerning the above are with me but even then you people are unnecessarily incurring expenses. The original application is being sent back to you again along with the stamp. Kindly do not take the trouble in future; otherwise no heed will be paid now, nor will any papers be sent back. All will be filed in the office. Be it known.

So this is evidently the information which formed the basis of the statement in the present plaint that the plaintiff came to know on 8th April 1936 that no award had in fact ever been given. On 28th April 1936, as already stated, the plaintiff applied to the lower Court for permission to sue as a pauper. That application closed with the prayer that the award dated 12th August 1928 and decree dated 15th August 1929 be set aside. So although in the suit the plaintiff alleges that it came to his knowledge on 8th April 1936 that there was in fact no award, three weeks later on 28th April 1936 he was still admitting the existence of the award and asking that it be set aside. Even on 29th September 1936, when he made an oral statement in the lower Court in support of his application to sue as a pauper, he was still asking the Court to set aside the award of the arbitrators, the ground then put forward being that he had come to know of fraud between May and August 1933 on the part of the arbitrators who were colluding with the defendant, and in the closing passage of that statement, which is at p. 85 of the paper-book, he says :

By the award I was given about 2200 from Jainarayan and this amount was got attached by Jainarayan and Tulsidas and I got nothing out of the money that was said to have been given to me.

So even by 29th September 1936 it had not entered the plaintiff's head to base his suit on the non-existence of any award. Hence it is obvious that when his application to sue as a pauper was dismissed and he was faced with necessity to pay court-fees it occurred to him or his advisers that an improvement might be made in the case by suing for a declaration which would involve an expenditure of only Rs. 15 and basing the revised claim on a plea that no award in fact existed. Even in the plaint, which was eventually presented in the lower Court, there is another admission of the existence of an award since in para. 11, on page 6 of the paper-book, the plaintiff has said :

That during the arbitration proceedings the plaintiff suspected that defendants 2 and 4 were not acting straight towards him and he therefore gave them notice not to arbitrate but in spite of plaintiff's notices they gave an award. The said award being the result of conspiracy hatched by the defendants against the plaintiff is void in law.

The reason why according to the lower Court the doctrine of res judicata does not apply to this case is that the previous suit was valued at Rs. 5500 while this suit is valued at Rs. 2 lakhs and therefore the Court which tried the first suit was by reason of its pecuniary jurisdiction incompetent to try the present suit, and hence S. 11, Civil P. C., is no bar to the present suit. The respondents say that this is not correct and Expln. 4 to S. 11 applies here because the plaintiff ought to have taken this ground about the non-existence of the award in the previous suit. To this the plaintiff replied that it was impossible for him to have taken the point when he was unaware that the award was not in existence and that Expln. 4 only applies where a person has the necessary knowledge to take the plea. In support of this contention he has referred to 11 M I A 50;[1] 37 I C 119[2] and 42 C W N 560.[3] In 11 M I A 50[1] at p. 73 their Lordships say :

When a plaintiff claims an estate, and the defendant being in possession, resists that claim, he is bound to resist it upon all the grounds that it is possible for him, according to his knowledge, then to bring forward.

(The italics are ours.)

In 37 I C 119[2] the Punjab Chief Court held:

A right, which a litigant possesses without knowing or ever having known that he possesses it, can hardly be regarded as 'a portion of his claim' which can be 'intentionally relinquished' within the meaning of O. 2, R. 2, Civil P. C.

In that case the learned Judge has followed another Privy Council ruling 15 Cal 800[4] where their Lordships observed that a right, which a litigant possesses without knowing or ever having known that he possesses it, can hardly be regarded as 'a portion of his claim.'

In 42 C W N 560[2] it was held that the plaintiff being unaware of the deed of gift, and there being no circumstance which would put the plaintiff on enquiry as to the deed of gift, or which would lead the plaintiff to the discovery thereof at the time he instituted the first suit, the plaintiff was not hit by the rule of constructive res judicata. In that case it was argued, as it has been argued before us, that the "plaintiff might have come to know of the existence of the deed of gift if he had exercised due diligence," that is to say, that the plaintiff might have obtained knowledge of the fact about which he claimed ignorance in the suit if he had shown diligence to ascertain the truth. It was then pointed out that in that case the plaintiff could not with due diligence have discovered the fact which it was said he ought to have pleaded in the first suit. It is this circumstance which distinguishes that case from the case before us because here there was no reason why the plaintiff could not have discovered the fact that there was no award in existence if that was really the case. He received what he believed to be a copy of the award and presumably he read it before he allowed it to disappear into his pleader's archives, whence it never appears to have come out again to the light of day. Whether it was an award or not ought to have been patent on its face, and if it was not an award then he should have instituted an enquiry to find out where was the real award. If it was an award, there is an end to the plaintiff's present contention that there was in point of fact no award. He had the assistance of one of the ablest counsel in Jubbulpore for finding out whether it was an award or not and it is clear from the suit which he filed that both he and his counsel were quite satisfied that it was an award.

Therefore, ignorance of the fact that there was no award will not help the plaintiff in the present case. Accordingly Explanation 4 to S. 11, Civil P. C., will apply unless the lower Court is right in holding that the section cannot apply because of the difference in the pecuniary jurisdiction of the two Courts. As to this we are satisfied that even if S. 11 itself cannot be applied, according to its terms, at any rate the principle can be applied. But we also hold the view that S. 11 can be applied in a suit such as this, for the original suit, being one for dissolution of partnership and accounts, the plaintiff placed a tentative valuation of Rs. 5500 upon it, reserving the right to receive more than Rs. 5500 if more were found due to him subject only to payment by him of additional court-fee. Therefore, in that suit he could have been given a decree even for the two lakhs which he is now claiming : 8 C P L R 86[5] and 9 N L R 112.[6] So it was not beyond the jurisdiction of the first Court to give a decree for the claim which is now made in this suit. It might, however, be said that even so the first Court was not competent to try this suit which commenced with a valuation of two lakhs and, therefore, S. 11 is excluded. It is for this reason that we hold that if S. 11 does not in terms bar this suit, at any rate its principle bars it. The Privy Council has held that S. 11 is not exhaustive of the circumstances in which an issue is res judicata : 48 Cal 499[7] in which at p. 508 their Lordships quoted with approval an observation by Sir B. Peacock in 6 ALL 269[8] to the following effect :

> The binding force of such a judgment in such a case as the present depends not upon S. 13 of Act 10 of 1877 (now replaced by S. 11, Civil P. C., 1908), but upon general principles of law. If it were not binding, there would be no end to litigation.

Again in A I R 1930 P C 22[9] their Lordships said :

> The terms of S. 11 are not to be regarded as exhaustive. The binding force of a judgment in probate proceedings depends not upon S. 11, but upon the general principles of law. The rule of res judicata, though it may be traced to an English source, embodies a doctrine in no way opposed to the spirit of the law as is expounded by the learned Hindu commentators. The application of the rule of res judicata, therefore, by the Courts in India should be influenced by no technical considerations of form but by matter of substance within the limits allowed by law.

A reference may also be made to A I R 1936 Mad 951[10] where the learned Judges have followed another Privy Council ruling in 29 Cal 707[11] in which Lord Davey observed that :

> The limitations as to pecuniary jurisdiction embodied in S. 13 of the Code of 1882 (and S. 11 of the Code of 1908) are not part of the general principle of res judicata :

See also 10 Lah 528[12] and A I R 1931 Lah 217.[13]

Moreover a judgment by consent and facts admitted are just as effective for the purposes of res judicata as a judgment passed on contest or facts which were in dispute : vide 63 Cal 550[14] where at p. 555 we find the following observation :

> On this authority it becomes absolutely clear that the consent order is as effective as an order passed on contest, not only with reference to the conclusions arrived at in the previous suit but also with regard to every step in the process of reasoning on which the said conclusion is founded. When we say "every step in the reasoning" we mean the findings on the essential facts on which the judgment or the ultimate conclusion was founded. In other words the finding which it was necessary to arrive at for the purposes of sustaining the judgment in the particular case will operate as estoppel by judgment.

Similarly a question which is decided by necessary implication operates as res judicata. In the previous suit before the Court could say whether the award was binding or not it had to be presumed that the award existed : see 24 C W N 223[15] which follows a Privy Council decision in 18 W R 182[16] in observing that > it may also be pointed out that where a question is decided by necessary implication, the decision would operate as res judicata.

In 4 Cal 190[17] Sir B. Peacock in delivering the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council observed at p. 199 :

> . . . . nemo debet bis vexari proeadem ca usa. This law has been laid down by a series of cases in this country with which the profession is familiar. It probably has never been better laid down than in the case, which was referred to, in (1736-55) 3 Atk 626,[18] in which Lord Hardwicke held that where a question was decided in effect, though not in express terms, between parties to the suit, they could not raise the same question as between themselves in any other suit in any other form; and that decision has been followed by a long course of decisions. . . . .

See also 15 Bom 89[19] and A I R 1938 Bom 291.[20] It appears to us that in valuing his claim in this suit at two lakhs, whereas in the previous suit he valued it at Rs. 5500, the plaintiff was over-valuing it in an endeavour to escape from the bar of res judicata. The bar cannot be eluded by that means: see 10 C P L R 89[21] and 10 Cal 697.[22] We hold therefore that this suit is barred by the doctrine of res judicata. This finding is sufficient to dispose of the appeal, but, as the other two preliminary issues which were decided in the lower Court have also been challenged in the memorandum of appeal, it is necessary to say something about them. Of these one relates to the bar of S. 42, Specific Relief Act, and the other to the refusal by the lower Court to permit an amendment of the plaint. Very little has been said on either of these matters before us so that we do not think it necessary to go into the questions very deeply. It is said that the finding of the lower Court about the application of the proviso to S. 42, Specific Relief Act, is wrong because it is not made clear what consequential relief the plaintiff could have asked for in addition to his prayer for a declaration. The learned Judge has disposed of the matter in one short paragraph No. 9 in which he says:

Issue 2. Moreover the suit for mere declaration without a consequential relief is not maintainable under the proviso to S. 42, Specific Relief Act. Numerous consequential reliefs as asked for in the previous suit as well as in the pauper application were available to the plaintiff among others and it shall be against the principle of law to entertain such a suit for a mere declaration without a consequential relief.

One consequential relief for which the plaintiff might have prayed was the one which he obviously hoped would follow from a successful termination of this appeal, namely that he can bring a new action for dissolution of partnership and accounts. We are disposed therefore to agree with the finding of the lower Court on this issue. Even less has been said on the question of the amendment of the plaint, the plaintiff being content with referring us to I L R (1939) Nag 194[23] in which it was held that:

Amendments should readily be allowed unless they prejudice the rights of the opposite party. An amendment of the plaint should not ordinarily be allowed when the application is made at a very late stage and the result of the amendment is to bring on the record a new case which on the date of the amendment is time-barred.

The amendment which the plaintiff seeks to make in his plaint is to add a prayer that if it be held that there was an award the defendants should be called upon to produce it. We do not think that there is any point in such an amendment because Mr. Padhye has conceded before us that if in point of fact there was an award then he is precluded by the judgment in the previous suit from challenging its contents. Accordingly the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Civil Revn. No. 632 of 1939, Decided on 9th April 1941, for revision of order of Dist. Judge, Wardha, D/- 5th August 1939.

(a) C. P. Tenancy Act (1 of 1920), S. 106 — Suit purporting to be for arrears of rent — Defendant found not to be tenant — Suit must be dismissed.

Where the plaint purports to be by a landlord against an occupancy tenant for arrears of rent and the Court finds that the defendant is not a tenant and that therefore the plaintiff can make no claim for arrears of rent against him, the order of the Court returning the plaint should either be treated as a dismissal of the claim or the first Court should be asked to pass such an order and draw up the usual decree. [P 352 C 1, 2]

(b) C. P. Land Revenue Act (2 of 1917), S. 2 (17) — Ex-proprietor subsequently purchasing share in village though not to same extent as before — He regains proprietary rights in sir and ceases to be occupancy tenant.

When there are a number of cosharers in an undivided village, the proprietary rights are not vested in any one of them but reside in the entire body regarded as a corporate whole. Each cosharer has an undivided though defined interest in the whole. Therefore each is possessed of "the proprietary right" in that sense to the extent of his share. It is not at the time a divided interest though it is a divisible entity. Hence it does not matter how small a portion of the whole an ex-proprietary tenant acquires. The moment he becomes a cosharer again, whether to the same extent or not, he regains his proprietary rights in the sir and the land thereupon ceases to be occupancy land : ('41) 28 A I R 1941 Nag 21 (F B), Ref. [P 353 C 1]

Order. — The only question with which I am concerned in this revision is whether the first Court had jurisdiction to try the suit. The suit is by a landlord against his tenant for arrears of rent. Under the provisions of S. 106, C. P. Tenancy Act, no civil Court of original jurisdiction can entertain a suit for arrears of rent unless the presiding Judge of the Court is also a Revenue Officer. The suit was accordingly filed in the Court of a Judge who filled both positions. Both the lower Courts hold that the suit is not in reality one for rent and that therefore the first Court had no jurisdiction to try the claim. The first Court on reaching this conclusion returned the plaint for presentation to the proper Court and this order was upheld in appeal. The revision is against these two orders. I may remark at the outset that the order directing a return of the plaint is wrong in any event. The jurisdiction of the Court is determined by the nature of the claim, and the claim here is for arrears of rent and for nothing else. If the defendant is not a tenant, then no question of returning the plaint for presentation to another Court can arise because no other Court can try the claim set out in this plaint. The nature of the claim cannot change by a return of the plaint. If this suit were to be instituted elsewhere, it would either have to be on a different cause of action on a different plaint or the Court to which it is presented would have to return it because the plaint purports to be by a landlord against an occupancy tenant for arrears of rent.

If therefore the lower Courts are right in their conclusion on the merits of the matter, then the suit should have been dismissed on the ground that the defendant is not a tenant and that therefore the plaintiff can make no claim for arrears of rent against him. The plaintiff would then have been at liberty to pursue such other remedies as he might have on other causes of action in the appropriate Court. But of course if the lower Courts are wrong in their conclusion on the facts, then as the first Court had jurisdiction to try a suit for arrears of rent and as this is such a suit, it should have tried it. All I am concerned to see therefore is whether this is or is not a suit for arrears of rent. In my opinion it is. One has only to look to the plaint to see that. It is impossible on this plaint to contend that the claim is for anything else. Logically therefore the order of the first Court returning the plaint should either be treated as a dismissal of the claim or the first Court should be asked to pass such an order and draw up the usual decree. Then an appeal would lie to the lower appellate Court and from there a second appeal to this Court. I do not however intend to follow this tortuous course because the matter has been treated as one of jurisdiction and the Division Bench to which I referred the case[1] has decided that this Court should exercise its revisional powers. I will therefore deal with the matter along those lines.

The facts are not in dispute, or at any rate not the facts which I need consider. The defendants' predecessor was a 5 as. 4 p. cosharer in the village in suit and owned in addition 200 acres of sir land, though whether in exclusive ownership or in severalty is a matter of dispute. That however need not concern us here. It is enough that he also owned the sir. In the year 1928 he sold his entire proprietary share (5 as. 4 p.) to the plaintiff and then became an ex-proprietary occupancy tenant of the sir under S. 49, C. P. Tenancy Act. Some time later the defendants, who claimed title through this predecessor, purchased a 3.20 pies share in the village and thus became cosharers. The question on those facts is, does the repurchase attract the provisions of S. 2 (17), C. P. Land Revenue Act, so as to re-convert the land to sir. The wording of the section unfortunately leaves room for doubt. After defining "sir" it continues:

> Provided that the land which is sir land under this definition shall . . . cease to be sir land when it becomes the subject of a tenancy under [S. 49, C. P. Tenancy Act, 1920], but if, during the continuance of such tenancy, the person in whose favour it has accrued, or his heir upon whom it has devolved, regain the proprietary right in such land . . . such land shall again become sir land.

It is not denied that the defendant is a person to whom the benefits of this proviso will apply provided he can be said to have regained "the proprietary right in such land." The whole question turns upon, what these words mean? To what proprietary rights does the word "the" refer? There is nothing either in the section or in the preceding portion of the Act which affords a clue to the meaning. Therefore, I do not think it would be legitimate to infer that the words necessarily refer to that portion of the proprietary rights which had vested in the ex-proprietor immediately before he lost them by transfer. This is the interpretation which the learned counsel for the applicant desired me to place upon the words. There is no reference to any such portion of the proprietary rights anywhere in the section. What then does one mean when one speaks generally of "the proprietary rights" in a portion of land ?

In the ordinary way, when there are a number of cosharers in an undivided village, the proprietary rights are not vested in any one of them but reside in the entire body regarded as a corporate whole. It is true the Act introduces a fiction in the case of the lambardar for certain limited purposes but that fiction does not apply here, and this is even clearer after the decision of the Full Bench in I L R (1941) Nag 54.[2] The expression means that each cosharer has an undivided though defined interest in the whole. Therefore each is possessed of "the proprietary right" in that sense, to the extent of his share. It is not at the time a divided interest though it is a divisible entity. If that is the meaning, and that is how I read the Act, then it does not matter how small a portion of the whole an ex-proprietary tenant acquires. The moment he becomes a cosharer again, whether to the same extent or not, he regains his proprietary rights in the sir and the land thereupon ceases to be occupancy land.

It will be noticed that S. 49, C. P. Tenancy Act, to which S. 2 (17), Land Revenue Act, refers, says nothing about a loss of proprietary rights but speaks of the loss of a right "to occupy any portion of his sir land as a proprietor." Therefore there is nothing in the wording of the section to assist us in the construction of S. 2 (17). In my opinion, these sections are intended for the benefit of the proprietor of sir land and therefore any ambiguity should be resolved in his favour. The construction which I place upon the Act does that, and in my opinion, it is the construction which should be adopted. I decide accordingly. The decisions of the lower Courts are accordingly upheld but in place of the order returning the plaint for presentation to the proper Court, (an order which, as I have said, is meaningless because no other Court can entertain this plaint except the one to which it was originally presented). I direct that a decree be now passed dismissing the plaintiff's claim on the ground that the defendant is not a tenant and that therefore the cause of action on which the claim is based has not been established. Costs in all three Courts will be paid by the plaintiff.

Second Appeal No. 622 of 1938, Decided on 18th July 1941, from appellate decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Buldana, D/- 8th July 1938.

Berar Land Revenue Code (1928), S. 183 — Pre-emption — Price fixed apparently much below market price—Court has to fix bona fide value — Vendor is entitled to get difference between real value and fixed value from pre-emptor and is entitled to appeal.

The Court is not bound by the price actually paid if that price is below the market value. The price is not fixed in good faith if the price is much below the value of the land and when the reasons for fixing it at a lower value are apparent it is the duty of the Court to examine the transaction and fix a fair consideration for the interest to be pre-empted. If the vendor by reason of having executed a sale deed is to lose the whole of his interest in the property, he is entitled to the fair value of it and there is no reason why he should be put to the inconvenience for having to recover the difference between the price paid and the fair price from the vendee. In such a case the vendor is entitled to prefer an appeal and to receive the difference from the pre-emptor : ('29) 16 A I R 1929 All 780, Rel. on. [P 354 C 2; P 355 C 1]

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit for pre-emption in Berar. It raises an unusual point in that the allegation is that the ostensible price and the price admittedly paid for the field is considerably less than the fair price instead of in excess as is generally the case in suits of this nature. The matter arose in the following way. The vendor was in need of money for a marriage and approached the vendee to raise it by way of a mortgage. The vendee was not inclined to take a mortgage in view of the existence of a Debt Conciliation Board within the jurisdiction and his fear that his debtors might approach the Board to avoid payments. Consequently, it was arranged between the parties that a sale of the field should be taken but that the parties themselves should treat it as a mortgage and that the field should be re-purchased in three years. Consequently, a sale deed was executed and an area of 13 acres and 23 gunthas assessed at Rs. 14.8.0 was sold for Rs. 200. It is not disputed that the price was paid and the pre-emptor brought a suit under the provisions of S. 183, Berar Land Revenue Code, to pre-empt at the price of Rs. 200.

In the trial Court and in the lower appellate Court, where the plaintiff's claim was decreed, it was urged that the transaction was not in effect a sale but a mortgage and that the plaintiff could not pre-empt. As the sale deed was in very clear terms, a deed of sale and nothing else, and as no clause providing for a re-purchase had been inserted, the Courts held that they were bound in view of the proviso to S. 58 (c), T. P. Act, to hold that the transaction must be deemed to be a sale and not a mortgage. The position that the parties intended that the land should be re-purchased by re-payment of the sum borrowed is conceded and indeed the very low purchase money itself would confirm this. It cannot be supposed that in the year 1937 the value of the land in Berar assessed at Re. 1 an acre could have fallen so low as Rs. 15 or Rs. 16 to an acre. The finding of the trial Court was that the value of the land was Rs. 800 and this finding was not disturbed in the lower appellate Court. On the issue Is plaintiff liable to pay market value as pre-emption price in case it exceeds the consideration of the sale ?

the trial Court said

But I do not think that plaintiff is liable to pay this much amount (Rs. 800) to defendant 1. He is substituted in his place and is not bound to pay more. He is bound under the law to pay the consideration of the sale deed.

The finding that the plaintiff could pre-empt on payment of Rs. 200 was upheld in the lower appellate Court on a consideration that there was no ground for holding that the price was not fixed in good faith and that consequently no question of the real value of the field arose as that has only to be ascertained if there was an allegation that the price stated in the sale was not fixed in good faith. In this second appeal by the vendor two points were raised. First, that the transaction was a mortgage and secondly that the pre-emptor could only purchase at a fair price to be fixed by the Court. The argument that the transaction is a mortgage is not pressed and indeed cannot be pressed but it is claimed that it is the duty of the Court to fix a fair price even if the ostensible price is below the market value. This contention was not really challenged as such by the defendant-respondent who put the matter in another way by claiming that the vendor who alone brought the appeal was not entitled to bring it and that the appeal lay only by the vendee who was impleaded as a respondent and is unrepresented. It was argued that as the vendee was satisfied with the decision that he should receive Rs. 200 from the pre-emptor the matter was concluded and the vendor had no further concern.

Sub-section (4) of S. 182, Berar Land Revenue Code, only provides for the raising of a presumption, when the ostensible price exceeds the market price, that the price was not fixed in good faith. That is to say, it shifts the burden of proof which primarily lay on the pre-emptor to the opposite party. Sub-section (2) of S. 183, the section under which the suit is brought, provides that "in all such cases the Court shall have power to examine the transaction and fix a fair consideration for the interest to be pre-empted." The Court is thus in no way bound by the price actually paid if that price is below the market value, as the trial Court held. To fix a price in good faith when the parties are entering into a contract of sale implies the existence of a belief that the price stated in the sale deed does represent the value of the land. If the price is decidedly above the value, then of course it is not fixed in good faith. But the same is equally true if the price is much below the value of the land and when the reasons as in this case for fixing it at a lower value are apparent. The price fixed was not intended by either party to the sale deed to represent the true value of the land and therefore was not fixed in good faith. It was then the duty of the Court to examine the transaction and fix a fair consideration for the interest, in this case the total interest, to be pre-empted. The contention raised by the respondent that the vendee alone could appeal has no force. The vendee is a money-lender and not an agriculturist and he is only concerned with the recovery of his principal, and in a transaction between a vendor and a vendee, if it is established that only part of the price was actually paid, the pre-emptor would be directed to pay to the vendee only so much of the price which was paid by him and to pay the balance to the vendor. It would be unreasonable to direct that the whole amount should be paid to the vendee and that the vendor should have to recover from him. This very equitable principle has been followed in A I R 1929 ALL 780.[1] The same principle would apply here. If the vendor by reason of having executed a sale deed is to lose the whole of his interest in the property, he is entitled to the fair value of it and there is no reason why he should be put to the inconvenience of having to recover the difference between the price paid and the fair price from the vendee. In the circumstances the vendor is entitled to prefer an appeal and to receive the difference.

It is then contended on behalf of the respondent that if the pre-emptor is asked to pay the fair consideration, the case should go back as the matter of market value has not been properly considered in the Courts below. The parties preferred such evidence as to the value of the land as they considered necessary, and on that evidence, a decision has been reached and I can see no reason to interfere with this decision. The result is that the appeal succeeds on the only point which is pressed. The decree of the Courts below is varied to the extent that the price to be paid by the vendor will be Rs. 800, Rs. 200 of which is to be paid to the vendee, defendant 1, and Rs. 600 to the appellant, defendant 2. These sums must be paid on or before 15th September 1941 and in default the plaintiff's suit will be dismissed. In the circumstances of the case I make no order as to costs in this Court.

 Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 38 — Proposal not duly accepted under S. 38 (2) — Still under exceptional circumstances, Court can approve proposal under S. 38 (7).

When a proposal for a composition has not been duly accepted by the creditors under S. 38 (2), it is open to the Court to approve the proposal under S. 38 (7). But an Insolvency Court could only reasonably approve a proposal that had been by the creditors refused in very extraordinary circumstances involving very unusual behaviour on the part of the creditors refusing, or circumstances such as where the proposal was refused by numbers while the proposal was accepted by a minority representing far more in value that the creditors who refused. Some sort of exceptional circumstance would be necessary before a Court could properly approve a proposal that the creditors had refused.

Order. — This matter comes before the Court on a reference by the learned Judge sitting in insolvency appellate jurisdiction and is as follows :

When a proposal for a composition has not been duly accepted by the creditors under S. 38 (2), Provincial Insolvency Act, is it open to the Court to approve the proposal under S. 38 (7)?

As the learned Judge remarks, the case law on the subject is scanty, the two cases directly in point being 58 ALL 655[1] where a Bench of the Allahabad High Court held that S. 38 (7) is not attracted unless there has been an acceptance of the proposal, and 30 I C 694[2] where there is a bald statement that if the creditors do not agree that is the end of the matter—a conclusion arrived at apparently from a consideration of the English law. The learned Judges in the first case appear to have arrived at that conclusion because they read "the proposal" in S. 38 (7) as meaning "the proposed composition," and they came to the conclusion that by "proposed composition" meant "agreed composition;" and accordingly if there is no agreement then there is no agreed composition for the Court to consider. The learned referring Judge found difficulty in accepting that view which appeared to him to give to the word "proposal" one meaning at the beginning of the section and in the middle of the section and another meaning at the end of the section. The matter has been glanced at we are told, in a number of other cases, that is to say 54 Mad 823,[3] 25 C W N 137: 61 I C 904[4] and 24 A L J 441.[5] If those cases are referred to, however they will be seen to be raising different points except that in 24 A L J 441[5] there are some observations as to the power of a Judge to act under Section 38 (7) which lend colour to the position taken up by the non-applicants. There are inter alia, the following observations, at page 451, of Boys J.:

. . . . . I am unable to find in the terms of S. 38 any limitation whatsoever of the nature of the proposal which the Judge may entertain, subject only to this that he shall consider it reasonable and to the general benefit of the creditors. The reason for this is not far to seek. The circumstances attending each insolvency may be infinitely varying in their details and an infinite variety of schemes of arrangement may be called for according to the nature of those particular circumstances. Further, if a Judge does not consider a proposal fit to be approved he need not approve it.

Whether in that case the proposal had ever been before the creditors is not clear, but apparently it was not. 54 Mad 823[3] is obviously not in point because in that case the majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors had accepted the proposal.

Section 38, Provincial Insolvency Act, is similar in its general outline to S. 16, English Bankruptcy Act. It is, however, shorter and leaves out the following words which appear in S. 16 (5), English Bankruptcy Act —"The debtor of the Official Receiver may after the proposal is accepted by the creditors, apply to the Court to approve it . . ." In other words, the English Bankruptcy Act provides the following machinery : (1) proposal by the debtor, (2) examination of the proposal by the creditors, (3) acceptance or rejection by the creditors, and (4) if and only if, acceptance by the creditors, application to the Court. As Lord Esher, M.R., observed in (1886) 17 Q B D 244[6] at pp. 250, 251 speaking of the earlier English Bankruptcy Act :

> In my opinion this Act was passed because it had been proved to the satisfaction of the Legislature that a majority of creditors, however large, was not careful, and was not to be trusted : that on the contrary, the creditors were generally utterly careless, that they wrote off their debts as bad, and agreed to terms which might give some possibility—an evanescent chance—of their getting something out of the wreck. It was because of the known and proved behaviour of creditors with regard to their insolvent debtors that this Act was passed, taking away from the majority of creditors that power which they had so recklessly and carelessly used, and putting a controlling power into the hands of the Court for the purpose of protecting the creditors against their own recklessness; for the purpose of preventing a majority of creditors from dealing thus recklessly, not only with their own property, but with that of the minority, and of enforcing, so far as the Legislature could, a more careful and moral conduct on the part of the debtors.

Accordingly, even granted an acceptance by the creditors of the proposal, the Court is given a power to disapprove. On the contrary in such a case it may approve the composition, and when it approves then certain consequences follow. In India the chain of events is as follows : (1) proposal by the debtor, (2) consideration of the proposal by the creditors, (3) acceptance or rejection by the creditors and (4) application to the Court. The Court thus comes into the story, so far as one can see, even though the creditors have refused the proposal. It is, in our opinion, impossible to read the words in S. 38 (7) "may either approve or refuse to approve the proposal" as follows : "may either approve or refuse to approve the accepted proposal." The language used in that section of the Provincial Insolvency Act copies in a number of its provisions so closely the English Act that it is impossible that the draftsman of this Act had not in front of him the English Act. He has deliberately left out—and we must assume that the Legislature with equal deliberation omitted—the words which cause the Court to exercise its powers relative to a proposal for composition or scheme of arrangement only after it has been accepted by the creditors. It is not a little matter ; it is fundamental. We can only imagine that they have been left out because in India it was thought desirable to give the Court wider powers than in England.

At the same time there can, in our opinion, be no doubt at all that S. 38 is primarily dealing with proposals made by a debtor intended by him to lead to a settlement with his creditors as a matter of agreement. That is the general underlying notion, and in order to guard against the evils mentioned by Lord Esher the Court is given a power to stop agreement resulting in a settlement if it is desirable in the opinion of the Court in the interests of the general body of creditors or of public morality so to do. But the Indian Act seems to us also to envisage a possibility that public morality and the interests of the general body of creditors may both require that the proposal be accepted and may at the same time envisage that some malicious creditor or creditors out of sheer spite or some other oblique motive might prevent a settlement desirable in the interests of the general body of creditors. Accordingly the Legislature has armed the Court with power to accept the proposal even though the creditors have not accepted it.

We put a case : A very heavily indebted debtor with five creditors. To one he owes three lakhs ; to one he owes Rs. 20,000 ; and to the other three he owes Rs. 5000. The three put their heads together and decide to prevent this composition for reasons that are entirely unconnected with the fair settlement of the insolvency, and consequently prevent the two whose debts enormously exceed theirs in amount from agreeing to a composition. It might be that in some rather exceptional case like that it would be the duty of the Court to approve the proposal even though the creditors had refused to accept it because it will be noted that S. 38 (2) requires that the acceptance should be not only by three-fourths in value but also by a majority in number of the creditors. In the case we put the majority, three, represent only a tiny part of the value but are able, for oblique motives, to defeat a proposal desired by those who have by far a larger liability at stake.

That of course is only a possible reason for the Indian Legislature leaving out these words "may, after the proposal is accepted by the creditors, apply to the Court." As a matter of simple construction we follow the golden rule that a statute is given its grammatical meaning bearing in mind the general purpose of the part and the whole of the statute. In this case the section starts with a proposal which clearly means the proposal made by the debtor. It ends with a proposal which, in our opinion, means the proposal made by the debtor. The fact that this return to the term "proposal" is deliberate is strengthened by the fact that in sub-s. (6) the Act speaks of composition or scheme. Had the Legislature in sub-s. (7) by "proposal" meant "either composition or scheme accepted or proposal accepted," seeing that it had spoken of the proposal being accepted in sub-s. (2), nothing would have been easier than to say "the Court may approve or refuse to approve the accepted proposal.

At the same time we make the observation that, in our opinion, an insolvency Court could only reasonably approve a proposal that had been by the creditors refused in very extraordinary circumstances involving very unusual behaviour on the part of the creditors refusing, or circumstances such as we have indicated above, that is to say, where the proposal was refused by numbers while the proposal was accepted by a minority representing far more in value than the creditors who refused. Some sort of exceptional circumstance would, in our opinion, be necessary before a Court could properly approve a proposal that the creditors had refused. In the light of the above, we answer the question as follows : Yes.

The matter will now go back to the referring Judge for disposal.

Narbada Prasad Sheosahai Pande, Plaintiff and others — Respondents.

Second Appeal No. 454 of 1937, Decided on 17th February 1941, from appellate decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Jubbulpore, D/- 12th April 1937.

(a) Specific Relief Act (1877), S. 42—Suit by plaintiff for declaration that he was owner — Fact of his being in possession is not enough— He must show subsisting title.

In a suit for a declaration that the plaintiff was the owner of certain properties, the fact that the plaintiff is in possession is not in itself enough. He must also show a subsisting title. [P 359 C 1]

(b) Adverse possession — Legal nature of possession explained—Possession and occupation are distinct.

The concept of possession as understood in legal terminology, is a complex one which need not include actual occupation. It comprises rather the right to possess, and the right and ability to exclude others from possession and control coupled with a mental element, namely the animus possidendi, that is to say, knowledge of these rights and the desire and intention of exercising them if need be. The adverse possession in law does not necessarily denote actual physical ouster from occupation but an ouster from all those rights which constitute possession in law. Although physical occupation is ordinarily the best and most conclusive proof of possession in this sense, the two are not the same. Though there must always be physical ouster from these rights, that does not necessarily import physical ouster from occupation especially when this is of just a small room or two in a house and when this occupation is shared with others. The nature of the ouster and the quantum necessary naturally varies in each case. [P 360 C 1]

(c) Adverse possession — Minor — Minority does not prevent ouster and stop running of adverse possession — Minor only gets another three years after attaining majority if time expires before three years — Occupation by minor is not equivalent to possession—Question to be considered is whether legal rights of ownership were exercised on his behalf by others — If so whether minor was in occupation becomes immaterial—Stranger entering on land and physically ousting minor from occupation as well as possession and setting up adverse title in himself — Time runs against minor from that moment — S bequeathing property to plaintiff and dying in 1917—Plaintiff minor in 1917 and living with S's widow—Widow asserting hostile title and obtaining mutation of all S's properties in her own name on 4th January 1918 and continuing in hostile possession till 1932—Plaintiff alleging to have been kept out of knowledge of will by fraud till 1928 — Plaintiff turned out by widow in 1921, becoming major in 1922 and regaining possession as owner in 1932 — Plaintiff held lost his title under S. 28, Limitation Act, 12 years after 4th January 1918 unless he could avail himself of S. 18, Limitation Act.

Minority does not prevent ouster and does not stop the commencement or running of adverse possession. The only privilege which a minor gets is another three years after attaining majority, if the time expires before the three years. Occupation by a minor is not equivalent to possession by him. Strictly speaking, there can be no such thing as possession by a minor qua minor because he is incapable of having animus possidendi and of exercising legal rights of ownership. They are exercised on his behalf by others and the question always is whether they were so exercised or not. If they were, then whether the minor was in occupation or not would be immaterial. So also if there is nobody on the property, the law will then impute possession to the rightful owner. But that is a rule which applies universally and is not special to minors. But if a stranger enters on the land and physically ousts the minor from occupation as well as from possession and sets up an adverse title in himself, then time begins to run against the minor from that moment: ('22) 9 AIR 1922 Mad 12, Rel. on; ('39) 26 A I R 1939 Nag 7; ('39) 26 A I R 1939 All 257; ('38) 25 AIR 1938 Nag 89; ('28) 15 AIR 1928 Mad 1113 and 35 Bom 79, Disting. [P 360 C 2; P 362 C 2; P 363 C 1]

The position is all the stronger when the person entering into possession is the heir at law: ('41) 28 A I R 1941 Sind 50, Rel. on. [P 363 C 1]

One S died on 1st January 1917 leaving behind his widow. Before his death he executed a will on which the plaintiff founded his title, stating that he was fraudulently kept from knowledge of the will by the widow and that he did not come to know about its existence until the year 1928. When S died the plaintiff was living with the widow and was a minor, being then about 14 years of age. The widow was in possession and managed the estate and immediately set up title in herself and applied for mutation in her name. This was granted on 4th January 1918. The plaintiff however was turned out of the house by the widow in 1921 and did not regain possession as owner until 1932. The plaintiff became major in 1922 and the widow from 4th January 1918 thus continued in hostile and adverse possession till 1932:

Held that under S. 28 the plaintiff lost his title after the expiry of 12 years from 4th January 1918 and therefore had no title in 1932 when he regained possession unless the plaintiff could avail himself of S. 18, Limitation Act. [P 361 C 1]

(d) Specific Relief Act (1877), S. 42—Suit by plaintiff seeking declaration that he is owner of certain property — Plaintiff acting fraudulently —Relief cannot be granted.

A plaintiff seeking a declaration that he is the owner of certain property cannot be granted the equitable relief when he is shown to have acted fraudulently. [P 361 C 2]

(e) Hindu law — Adoption — Dharmputra is not recognized son under Hindu law — His proper guardian is his natural father and not widow of adoptive father.

A "dharmaputra" is not a recognized son under the Hindu law. His proper guardian would be his natural father and not the widow of his adoptive father. [P 362 C 2]

Judgment. — The plaintiff sues for a declaration that he is the owner of the property in suit consisting of two houses. He states that the cloud on his title is a claim by defendants 2, 3 and 4 against defendant 1, Budhabai in which they have attached this property as hers and brought it to sale. The facts are as follows: One Sheosahai died on 1st January 1917, leaving behind a widow, defendant 1, Budhabai. Before his death he executed a document, Ex. P-4, dated 24th June 1911, called a tabniyatnama on which the plaintiff now founds his title. The plaintiff states that he was fraudulently kept from knowledge of this document by Budhabai and that he did not come to know about its existence until the year 1928. But of that later. When Sheosahai died the plaintiff was living with Budhabai and was a minor, being then about 14 years of age. Budhabai was in possession and managed the estate along with an agent Shankerlal. She immediately set up title in herself and applied for mutation in her name. This was granted on 4th January 1918. Thereafter the plaintiff instituted an application for probate on the basis of a will which purported to leave all the property to the plaintiff reserving only a right of maintenance for Budhabai. This suit was instituted in the year 1920, but it was held that the will was a forgery and the suit was accordingly dismissed in the following year. The plaintiff states that he was thereupon (1921) turned out of the house by Budhabai and that he did not regain possession until 1932.

The plaintiff had evidently become involved in debts by this time and he states that he was obliged to apply to the insolvency Court for adjudication as an insolvent. The application was made in the year 1922 but the plaintiff was discharged in the year 1928. During this time however Budhabai began running up debts and was sued by her creditors. One set of creditors filed Civil Suit No. 30 of 1926 against her and another set Civil Suit No. 35 of 1929. The houses in suit were put up to sale and auctioned in the year 1929. Then the plaintiff instituted a suit as a pauper claiming these properties. It was held however that he was not a pauper, but it appears that the auction sale had by then been set aside on a technical ground, and the plaintiff states that Budhabai, seeing that he had an unchallengeable title under the tabniyatnama (Ex. P-4), let him into possession in 1932. It was therefore unnecessary for him to proceed with the suit. A couple of years later these houses were again put up to sale in execution of the decrees obtained against Budhabai and they were sold on 3rd May 1934 and purchased by defendant 4. The sale was confirmed on 19th January 1935. Therefore the plaintiff files the present suit for a declaration that he is the owner. The suit was launched on 24th July 1935.

In so far as the plaintiff's title is founded on Ex. P-4, an interesting question of interpretation arises on which it is possible to take two views. The first Court, taking one view, held that the document did not amount to a will, and, as no adoption could be effected by the mere execution of a document, it held that the deed was ineffective to pass title. The lower appellate Court took the other view and held that the document amounted to a will in the plaintiff's favour. A number of cases were cited in argument in support of these two interpretations. On the one side were cited 28 ALL 488[1] at p. 495, 23 Bom 271,[2] confirming 12 Bom 185[3] at page 200, 11 Cal 463[4] at p. 483 and 16 Mad 355[5] at p. 359. On the other side were cited 54 Mad 440,[6] 24 Mad 214[7] and 3 I A 253.[8] None of these cases is exactly in point and an elaborate analysis of them would be necessary to distinguish and reconcile them. We do not think it will be either profitable or necessary to enter upon such a task in this case because of the view we take of another point, a point which is enough to dispose of the appeal. That point is whether the plaintiff had a subsisting title at the date of the suit. He is in possession, but possession in itself is not enough to entitle him to the declaration he seeks. He must also show title. For this purpose we will have to assume so far as this appeal is concerned, because we do not intend to decide the point here, that Ex. P-4 operated as a will and gave the plaintiff title on Sheosahai's death, that is to say, in 1917. The question then is whether he ever lost this title and if so, did he regain this, or another title, before suit?

The facts set out in the plaint are as follows. The plaintiff states that Sheosahai brought him up as a son and that he lived with Sheosahai while the latter was alive and continued to live in his house with Sheosahai's widow Budhabai after Sheosahai's death. But at the time of Sheosahai's death, although Budhabai outwardly exhibited signs of motherly affection towards him she was > engaged in a bitter secret plot against the plaintiff, to oust him from all the property bequeathed to the plaintiff by the deceased Sheosahai Pande . . . and they aimed that Budhabai would continue undisturbed in possession of the whole property as an heir of Sheosahai and after her death Shankarlal (with whom she was plotting) who had begun to declare himself as the nearest reversioner would be entitled to the same.

The plaint then continues that in pursuance of this plot to oust the plaintiff Budhabai obtained a succession certificate in her name on 4th January 1918 and got most of the documents which stood in Sheosahai's name renewed in her own; in other words, she assumed complete management, control and ownership of Sheosahai's estate. But in spite of this the plaintiff continued to reside with her, along with his brothers and his sister, and the social relations between them appear to have remained unchanged. All this time however Budhabai fraudulently suppressed the tabniyatnama, (indeed she is said to have burnt it), and fraudulently kept the existence, execution and registration of it from the knowledge of the plaintiff. When the plaintiff attained "years of discretion" he discovered that Sheosahai had accepted him as a son and so he began to make enquiries. Budhabai and Shankerlal were afraid that he might stumble across knowledge of the fact that the tabniyatnama had been executed and that it had been registered, and they were afraid that the plaintiff might go to the Sub-Registrar's office and discover the fraud. Therefore they hit upon the extraordinary expedient of forging a will in the plaintiff's favour and placing this extraordinary document in his possession, or rather of making sure that it would fall into his hands, hoping thereby that he would be induced to seek for probate. But they took care to make the forgery so obvious and clumsy that they knew no Court would uphold it. The ruse succeeded. The gullible plaintiff applied for probate in 1920 and his application was dismissed, as anticipated, in the following year. He was then a minor, only 16 years of age (the first Court gives the date of his birth as 26th September 1904), but he gave his age as 19 and petitioned as a major. He says that "the ladies" told him that that was his age.

As soon as he lost his probate case on the will, Budhabai is said to have actually turned him out of the houses in suit (see para. 9 of the plaintiff's rejoinder dated 30th September 1935). The plaintiff then became resigned to his fate, and being unable to meet his debts had recourse to the Insolvency Court. He was adjudicated in 1922 and remained an insolvent till 1928 in which year he was discharged. The learned counsel for the plaintiff argued that these facts disclose that his client never lost title to the estate and that the title is still in him. He said that the estate vested in the plaintiff on Sheosahai's death because of the will (tabniyatnama) Ex. P-4. The plaintiff lived in the houses in suit down to 1921 and then again from 1932 and therefore he was in possession of the property between 1917 and 1921 and consequently however much Budhabai may have set up a title in herself it had no effect on the plaintiff's rights because he was not ousted from the property.

This is an argument we are unable to accept. It confuses bare occupation with possession. The two are very different. The concept of possession, at any rate as it is understood in legal terminology, is a complex one which need not include actual occupation. It comprises rather the right to possess, and the right and ability to exclude others from possession and control coupled with a mental element, namely the animus possidendi, that is to say, knowledge of these rights and the desire and intention of exercising them if need be. The adverse possession of which the law speaks does not necessarily denote actual physical ouster from occupation but an ouster from all those rights which constitute possession in law. It is true that physical occupation is ordinarily the best and most conclusive proof of possession in this sense but the two are not the same. It is also true that there must always be physical ouster from these rights but that does not necessarily import physical ouster from occupation especially when this is of just a small room or two in a house and when this occupation is shared with others. The nature of the ouster and the quantum naturally varies in each case. The plaintiff states in his plaint that he knew nothing about his rights till 1928. He was fraudulently kept in ignorance of them. On the other hand he knew that Budhabai had set up a title in herself and he, being taken in by her, believed that she was the rightful owner. How then could he have had the intention, desire, and determination, to exercise these rights which make up possession in law when he was convinced that he did not possess them? How could he have been seized of the mental element which is necessary to complete the legal concept of possession, that is to say, how could he have possessed the necessary animus possidendi? Of course he was a minor during a part of this time but he attained majority in 1922 (29th June 1922 to be exact) and he says that he was kept in ignorance of his rights for another six years. Also, in any case, even minors have guardians who can act for them and exercise rights on their behalf. The plaintiff's father was his guardian but he did not raise a finger, presumably because (on the plaintiff's case) he was also deceived. But more of that later. At the moment it is enough to say, though this is denied and will have to be developed further in a minute, that minority does not prevent ouster and does not stop the commencement or running of adverse possession. The only privilege which a minor gets is another three years after attaining majority, if the time expires before the three years.

On the facts given, and for the moment we are accepting at their face value the facts set forth in the plaint, the plaintiff never entered into possession till 1932, and Budhabai set out her title as an heir, asserted this hostile title and entered into effective possession of the property from the moment of Sheosahai's death, and in any event from 4th January 1918. Thereafter, she continued in continuous hostile and adverse possession till 1932. As regards the plaintiff's exclusion from possession till 1932, this is what the plaintiff says in paras. 13 and 14 of the plaint:

> That the plaintiff thereafter (that is to say after discovering the existence of the registration copy of the tabniyatnama) filed a suit before the Additional District Judge, Jubbulpore, in forma pauperis to get back the estate of Seosahai.

It is clear therefore that according to the plaintiff he had not up to this time got back the estate even though he was still living with Budhabai, and, so far as his social relations with her were concerned, was on the same terms with her as he had been from the moment of Sheosahai's death. The plaint continues, after setting out that the pauper application was dismissed:

> That after the dismissal of the pauper application the plaintiff with his personal attempt (Sic) in or about 1932 got possession of the residuary property of Sheosahai on which he could lay his hands, and is in possession since then of houses Nos. 439 and 439/1 . . . . . as owner.

These are the houses in suit, so it is quite clear on his own allegations that he did not enter into possession as owner till 1932. Budhabai's adverse possession therefore lasted from 1918 (at the latest) till 1932. The 12 years expired in 1930, and so at the end of that 12 years the plaintiff's title determined under S. 28, Limitation Act. It follows he had no title in 1932 and so had either to prescribe for one afresh or to obtain a conveyance from Budhabai in whom the title vested. He had done neither up to the date of the suit, and so on the facts set out in the plaint itself this suit is bound to fail unless the plaintiff can avail himself of S. 18, Limitation Act. We may mention that the plaintiff's minority will not avail him because he attained majority in 1922 and the three years rule would only carry him as far as 1925. But as the 12 years did not expire till 1930 he had limitation till then. It was argued that the plaintiff at any rate regained possession during the years 1920 to 1921 while he was fighting the probate case. He was in occupation, as he lived with Budhabai as before, and as he asserted a title to the property it must be presumed that he regained possession because the law will always presume in favour of the rightful owner and will always assume that possession resides in the person having title. This might have been so but for the plaintiff's own evidence which excludes any such possibility. In the first place he does not state that the character of his occupation changed in any way. The plaintiff and Budhabai only lived in a part of one of the houses. The rest was in the possession of tenants and they continued to attorn to Budhabai. The documents which she had had altered into her name remained as before and she continued to assert her own title and exercise every act of ownership. And to cap all, the plaintiff states in the witness box as P. W. 2:

> The suit relates to two houses Nos. 439 and 439/1 at Galgalatal. They have been in my possession from 1932. Before that they were in possession of Mt. Budhabai.

That finally disposes of any doubt as to where possession lay up till 1932. We are also influenced by another fact. The plaintiff found it necessary to set up an elaborate case of fraud. This was necessary in order to enable him to obtain the benefit of S. 18, Limitation Act. It is obvious on the conclusions which we have reached above that the plaintiff lost title to the property by 4th January 1930 and that he had not regained it by 7th February 1935 when the suit was filed. But if he was fraudulently kept out of knowledge of his rights by Budhabai who was ousting him limitation would not commence to run against him until he discovered the fraud, because of S. 18, Limitation Act. The plaintiff states that he discovered the fraud in 1928. In that event he would have had 12 years from 1928 in which to sue Budhabai for possession, that is to say, the title would still be in him during that time. But, according to the plaintiff, Budhabai saw the futility of opposition and voluntarily surrendered possession in 1932, or rather raised no opposition when he turned her out in that year, and so the plaintiff was saved the necessity of suing. And as he regained possession while the title still resided in him and continued to be in possession till the date of this suit, he is able to show a good title and is thus entitled to his declaration. That contention would of course be sound if the facts pleaded are correct. But, before we examine the facts, we desire to observe that this elaborate plea is wholly unnecessary unless the plaintiff had in fact been ousted from possession from 1918 till 1932. The fact that the plaintiff found it necessary to ground his case on these assertions (the fraud was not set up in the plaint as an alternative case, but as the main and only case) indicates that he would have lost title had it not been for the fraud.

But as regards this case of fraud, we are wholly unable to believe it. In order to succeed, the plaintiff has to establish that he was totally ignorant about the Tabniyatnama and its registration till 1928. What are the facts? (After going through the facts their Lordships proceeded). On these facts the plaintiff is out of Court. Apart from all else no equitable relief such as this would be granted when the plaintiff is shown to have acted fraudulently. However, we need not decide the case on that point because our conclusion is that the plaintiff had no subsisting title at the date of suit. The questions we have examined at such length are questions of fact, and this is a second appeal. Had there been findings on these facts by the lower appellate Court we would have had no power to go behind them. But we are not able to discover any such findings. The first Court appears to have reached a somewhat muddled conclusion on the question of fraud as set up by the plaintiff because it answered issue 5 (a) by stating that the plaintiff had been kept out of the knowledge of his right to institute the suit by the fraud of defendant 1 and her representatives, defendants 2 to 4. Nevertheless, it held on issue 6 that defendant 4 was a bona fide purchaser for value. It may be we are doing the learned Judge an injustice because the first of those findings is not to be found in the body of the judgment, and it is possible that "defendant 4" is a slip for "defendant 3," but as the judgment stands that is how it reads. There is no finding about the plaintiff's possession before 1932. As regards that, the first Court has assumed, as indeed it was bound to assume on the pleadings, that the plaintiff would be out of Court unless he could avail himself of S. 18, Limitation Act. The lower appellate Court gives no finding on the question of fraud and only considers the legal position which would result if fraud were assumed to exist. It gives no finding on the question of possession either but assumes that the plaintiff would be out of Court unless he could avail himself of S. 18 because, to use the language of the learned Judge, "the ordinary period of 12 years for bringing his suit for possession of property expired in 1929." That of course assumes that the plaintiff was out of possession from 1917 which is the year of Sheosahai's death. But we are unable to treat these assumptions as findings.

It was argued that the fact of fraud was not challenged by defendant 4 in the lower appellate Court. Two of the pleaders who had appeared there also appeared before us, one on each side. One thought doubtless with the clearest bona fides that the finding had not been challenged and the other, who appeared for defendant 4 along with Mr. K. B. Gupta, a very senior and experienced lawyer who is now dead, was clear that it had been. Mr. Bobde who was in possession of Mr. Gupta's notes stated that they appeared to show that the point had been taken. We can hardly believe that it was not, especially with such a careful and experienced lawyer as Mr. K. B. Gupta in charge, because unless it was taken the plaintiff would be found to succeed and there would have been no point in opposing the appeal at all. We feel we are justified in the circumstances in going into the facts. That leaves outstanding a question of law which was taken for the first time before us in second appeal. The learned counsel for the plaintiff-respondent argued that adverse possession can never run against a minor till he comes of age and that he has 12 years from that date because whoever enters upon a minors's property will be considered to have entered in a fiduciary capacity, either as a guardian or a bailiff, and will not be allowed to say that he entered in his own right. The following cases were relied on: 1938 N L J 418,[9] I L R (1939) ALL 454,[10] A I R 1938 Nag 89[11] at p. 91, 35 Bom 79[12] at p. 89 and A I R 1928 Mad 1113.[13] It was also argued, though somewhat feebly, that Budhabai was in fact the de facto if not the legal guardian of the plaintiff because of EX. P-4.

As to this we are clear that Budhabai was not the plaintiff's guardian either de facto or de jure. The plaintiff at best is a legatee under a will. That would not make Budhabai either his mother or his guardian. A "dharmaputra," (which is the status the plaintiff acquired under the tabniyatnama) is not a recognised son under the Hindu law. His proper guardian would be his natural father. As to her being a de facto guardian, we do not think she was that either even though the plaintiff lived with her and was maintained by her till 1921. Budhabai set up a title to the estate and entered upon it in her own right as heir from the very beginning according to the plaintiff's own story. She never purported to act on his behalf or in his interests. Also, although the plaintiff lived with her so did the plaintiff's mother till she died in 1918 or 1919, and the plaintiff's father continued to visit them and took charge of the important forged will. Budhabai says that she handed it over to the plaintiff's mother who in turn gave it to her husband, the plaintiff's father, and he gave it to the plaintiff. We do not think there is anything in this argument. As regards the legal position we do not think the rulings quoted decide the position for which the plaintiff's learned counsel contends. This very contention was fully considered in 45 Mad 361[14] at pp. 364 to 369 and was negatived. We agree. The fallacy underlying the argument of the learned counsel for the plaintiff is in assuming that occupation by a minor is equivalent to possession by him. Strictly speaking there can be no such thing as possession by a minor qua minor because he is incapable of having an animus possidendi and of exercising legal rights of ownership. They are exercised on his behalf by others and the question always is whether they were so exercised or not. If they were, then whether the minor was in occupation or not would not matter. He might be at the other end of the world, at school or with friends, but so long as somebody is exercising rights over his property on his behalf "possession" in this sense will be imputed to him. So also if there is nobody on the property, the law will then impute possession to the rightful owner. But that is a rule which applies universally and is not special to minors.

But if a stranger enters on the land and physically ousts the minor from occupation as well as from possession and sets up an adverse title in himself, then we have no doubt that time begins to run against the minor from that moment. Whether the person so entering will be allowed to set up these rights is another matter. If he enters in a fiduciary capacity such as a guardian or an agent, of course he will not. But if he is a stranger, then we are clear he can, and the cases cited in the ruling we have referred to so hold, as does the ruling itself. The position is all the stronger when the person entering into possession is the heir at law: see as to this, I L R (1940) Kar 534[15] at pp. 566 and 567. The next step is when the minor though allowed to occupy a part of the property is effectively ousted from "possession". But before considering that, consider the question of an adult in similar circumstances. If nothing is known, nor if the facts are doubtful, then of course the law will imply that of the two in simultaneous occupation "possession" is with the one in whom the title resides. But if it is shown beyond doubt that he is ousted from all effective "possession" and is permitted to remain in occupation as a bare licensee and he accepts that position, then of course the usual presumption will not apply. Is there any difference when the person ousted is a minor? We think not because in that a minor cannot in himself possess the animus possidendi his physical presence on a part of the premises is neither here nor there, and the sole questions then are: (1) Was he in fact ousted, and (2) Will the person ousting him be permitted to show that he did so. The ouster in such a case would be effected by turning the guardian of the minor out of effective possession and control of the property. Not only would it be ridiculous to assert that a young child who is permitted to occupy a room in a house along with his little brothers and sisters on sufferance is in effective possession in the circumstances we have described but it would lead to undesirable social consequences. Nobody would be safe in extending hospitality and showing kindness to any child who had even the remotest pretension to one's estate if that were the law, lest it should hereafter transpire that one's own title was shaky and that the real title resided in the child.

As to the cases cited, 1938 N L J 418[9] is not in point. Only the general observation that dispossession imports ouster, "an actual driving out from possession against the will of the person in possession" is relevant. That can be accepted, but the question whether this can be effected in circumstances like the present was not considered because the case had nothing to do with minors. So also I L R (1939) ALL 454.[10] No minor was involved there, and what was decided, was that when no one is in possession the possession of the rightful owner is deemed to continue. But here Budhabai was in possession and she was the heir at law. A I R 1938 Nag 89[11] and A I R 1928 Mad 1113[13] were both cases of guardians and so are not in point here. In 35 Bom 79[12] the distinguishing feature is that the person entering into possession did not set up a title adverse to the minors till 1891 and this was after the minors had attained majority (see p. 89 of the report). We quite agree that if the person entering upon possession does not set up his or her title, it will be presumed that the possession was on behalf of the minors because the law will never presume a wrongful act. The position is very different when there is a wrongful assertion of title and ouster, as here.

As to whether Budhabai should be allowed to assert a hostile title we have already pointed out that she did not occupy a fiduciary capacity vis-a-vis the plaintiff and that his own parents, both father and mother, were alive when Budhabai ousted him and that they knew all about it. She was the heir at law and had in our opinion every right to assert her own title. There is no estoppel and none has been pleaded. The point was taken here for the first time. The appeal succeeds. The decree of the lower appellate Court is set aside and that of the first Court restored. The plaintiff-respondent and defendant 1 will pay the costs of the appellants (defendants 2 and 4) here and in the lower appellate Court. Defendant 3 who has not appealed will bear his own costs in this and the lower appellate Court. We direct defendant 1 to pay the appellants' costs because she has resisted their right to execution of decrees passed against her and has been as much interested in fighting this litigation as the plaintiff himself. There will however be only one set of costs in these two Courts. Costs in the first Court will be as decreed by that Court.

Second Appeal No. 516 of 1938, Decided on 5th February 1941, from appellate decree of Third Additional District Judge, Nagpur, D/- 29-4-1938.

(a) Specific Relief Act (1877), S. 56 (k)—Suit for injunction restraining building of house—Plaintiff must show special damage or injury—Mere fact that Municipal Committee acted beyond its powers in granting sanction for construction of building does not by itself entitle plaintiff to sue.

In a suit for injunction restraining the building of a house it is incumbent on the plaintiff under S. 56 (k) to show some special damage or injury. The mere fact that the Municipal Committee acted beyond its powers in granting the sanction for construction of the house is not by itself sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to sue: (1858) 121 R R 80; 1 Bom 132; 22 Bom 646 and 6 N L R 53, Rel. on. [P 366 C 1, 2]

(b) Tort—Nuisance—Whether act complained of amounts to nuisance—Test—Criterion is ordinary physical comfort of human existence according to plain, sober and simple notions and not according to elegant and dainty modes and habits of living—Discomfort or inconvenience must be substantial to warrant legal interference.

To determine whether an act complained of as a nuisance is strictly so or not is to be judged by the ordinary standards of persons residing in the neighbourhood and the criterion would be the ordinary physical comfort of human existence according to plain, sober and simple notions obtaining amongst people and not according to the elegant and dainty modes and habits of living. It is not the standard of a petulant, cynical, hypersensitive or fastidious person that would furnish a guide but that of a person who expects to enjoy the ordinary comforts of a decent and healthy life in the local area where he resides. The inconvenience or discomfort must be of a substantial character to warrant legal interference: Case law relied on. [P 366 C 2]

(c) Jurisdiction — Lack of jurisdiction must be distinguished from wrong exercise of jurisdiction — Act done without power is null and void—Act done in erroneous exercise of jurisdiction is voidable — Statutory body must act strictly within statutory powers — Civil Court cannot rectify wrong decision of statutory body.

A statutory body like a municipality acting under a statute must keep strictly within its statutory powers: ('32) 19 A I R 1932 Bom 259, Rel. on. [P 367 C 1]

The lack of jurisdiction must be distinguished from the wrong exercise of jurisdiction. While an act done without any power to do so is null and void, an act done in erroneous exercise of that jurisdiction is voidable: that is rectifiable by a superior authority. Where the decision of the statutory body is wrong as distinguished from being beyond its power, the civil Court cannot rectify the wrong: ('21) 8 A I R 1921 Cal 34 (F B) and 25 Bom 337 (P C), Rel. on. [P 367 C 1]

(d) C. P. Municipalities Act (2 of 1922), Ss. 97 and 98—Building bye-laws under, framed by Nagpur Civil Station Sub-Committee, bye-law 10 and bye-law 10, proviso 1—Construction of proviso 1 — Word "area" in proviso 1 refers to plots and not to bungalow area—Sub-Committee by resolution making bye-law 10 (a) and (b) applicable to bungalow area excepting basti area and new settlements and bye-law 10, proviso 1 to settlements other than bungalow area — Resolution held ultra vires as altering bye-law 10.

Proviso 1 to bye-law 10 does not proprio vigore come into operation so as to make it obligatory on the Sub-Committee to grant permission to erect building on plots less than one acre, but it confers discretion on it to be exercised in each case on merits. The word 'area' in proviso 1 has reference to the plot and not to that part of the Civil Station which is popularly known as a 'bungalow area.' The plain meaning of proviso 1 is that if the committee decides to give permission to erect bungalows in plots less than one acre it should do so on the conditions laid down in that proviso, but it makes it clear that the committee has no power to permit a building on any plot less than 50′ x 50″.

The Civil Station Sub-Committee by a resolution declared generally that bye-law 10 (a) and (b) applied to the whole of the Civil Station area, that is bungalow area, excepting the basti area and new settlements and that proviso 1 to bye-law 10 would apply to the settlements other than the bungalow area:

Held that in so far as the resolution was intended to be operative and not merely interpretive it was ultra vires and of no effect since its effect was to alter the bye-law. It was open to the Sub-Committee to frame a new bye-law on the lines of the resolution but that could be done only by the procedure prescribed in the C. P. Municipalities Act. [P 368 C 1, 2]

(e) Interpretation of statutes — Law enacted —Same word is used in same sense.

It is a well known rule of construction of laws that the Legislature uses the same word in the same sense when it enacts a law. [P 368 C 1]

(f) C. P. Municipalities Act (2 of 1922), Ss. 97 and 98—Building bye-laws under, framed by Nagpur Civil Station Sub-Committee, bye-law 10 — Sub-Committee by resolution interpreting bye-law—Resolution is not absolutely binding on subsequent meeting of Sub-Committee.

The acts of one meeting are not absolutely binding on a subsequent meeting. A resolution by the Sub-Committee interpreting a bye-law in a particular way is not absolutely binding on the subsequent meetings of the Sub-Committee.

M. Y. Shareef and R. S. Dabir—for Appellants.

J. Sen, R. N. Padhye and W. C. Dutt — for Respondent 1.

Judgment. — This is plaintiffs' appeal from the reversing judgment of the third Additional District Judge, Nagpur, in Civil Appeal No. 5-A of 1938 delivered on 29th April 1938. The suit out of which this appeal arises was instituted by the appellants for permanent injunction restraining the Municipal Committee, Nagpur, respondent 2, and P. N. Rudra, respondent 1, from building a house on a plot of land situated in Circle No. 19A known as civil station. The plot in question originally measured 76′ × 300′ and is adjacent to the house of the appellants. That plot was advertised for sale in the Daily News of 5th June 1935, by the owner named Chachondia Appellant 1, who then happened to be the President of the Civil Station Sub-Committee, a body subordinate to the Municipal Committee Nagpur, published a warning in that newspaper on 11th June 1935, to the effect that the owner of the plot would not be permitted to erect any building on it as such erection was contrary to the building bye-laws of the Civil Station Sub-Committee which made it obligatory that there should be at least 80′ distance between two bungalows which was not possible in the case of a building if erected on this plot. A similar caution was conveyed by the Secretary Civil Station Sub-Committee to Chachondia by a letter dated 10th June 1935. On 15th July 1935, Chachondia's advertisement published in the Daily News of 7th June 1935 was considered at a meeting of the Civil Station Sub-Committee and it was resolved that no building would be allowed to be constructed unless 80′ distance was left between two buildings as provided by the bye-laws. It further resolved that the building bye-laws 10 (a) and 10 (b) should apply to the bungalow area of the civil station and not to the basti areas and new settlements, and discretionary authority was conferred on the President to decide each case that would come up for consideration on its own merits. The proviso 1 appended to bye-law 10 of the building bye-laws of the Civil Station Sub-Committee was declared to apply to all the settlements other than the bungalow area. It is pertinent to observe that nowhere in the bye-laws of the Civil Station Sub-Committee is there any specific area defined as the bungalow area. Respondent 1, P. N. Rudra purchased the plot of land measuring 76′ × 300′ from Chachondia on 27th May 1937 and some more land from Chorghade, the owner of the adjacent land on the side remote from the appellants' land. On 22nd March 1937 he applied to the Civil Station Sub-Committee for permission to build a house on the site. On that application Rao Sahib Lala Jai Narain, who was the Vice-President, inspected the site and made a report to the Sub-Committee on 30th April 1937 that there was no objection to permission being granted subject to certain conditions in respect of the outhouses and the latrine. On that report the Civil Station Sub-Committee sanctioned the erection of a building by a resolution dated 5th May 1937. There was also some correspondence between appellant 1 and respondent 1 and the matter came before the Municipal Committee, Nagpur, which refused to interfere with the internal administration of the Civil Station Sub-Committee.

Respondent 1 in accordance with the permission granted by the Civil Station Sub-Committee commenced construction of his house when the appellants instituted their suit. The main allegation in the plaint is that under the building bye-laws in force no permission to erect a building could validly be given by the Civil Station Sub-Committee unless (1) the area of the plot built upon is not less than an acre, (2) the bungalow is centrally situated, (3) that it should be at least 80′ away from the main building on the adjacent land, and (4) the facing of the building, its conservancy arrangements and the position of the outhouses are in conformity with the existing arrangement of the buildings in that part of the civil station. It was averred that respondent 1 contravened the bye-laws in not conforming to the conditions laid down therein with the consequence that there was a likelihood of congestion and a consequent insanitation and difficulty of drainage and diminution of light and ventilation and that the plaintiffs being in close proximity were affected by respondent 1's violation of the bye-laws. The sanction granted by the Civil Station Sub-Committee in these circumstances was contended to be ultra vires of that body. The plaintiffs' contentions prevailed in the trial Court but failed in the lower appellate Court. That Court held that the building which respondent 1 intended to erect was not contrary to the bye-laws and that the permission granted by the Civil Station Sub-Committee for the erection of the building was not ultra vires. It also found that the building was not calculated to cause any discomfort, inconvenience or injury to the plaintiffs or their property. Upon this appeal the main points for determination are (1) whether the sanction accorded by the sub-committee to erect a building was contrary to the bye-laws and (2) whether the building if allowed to be constructed according to the sanction is likely to cause a nuisance to the plaintiffs.

As the appellants asked for an injunction restraining the building of the house it was incumbent on them under S. 56 (k), Specific Relief Act, to show that they had some personal interest in the matter. The mere fact that the Civil Station Sub-Committee acted beyond its powers in granting the sanction to the building would not by itself be sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to sue. In (1858) 121 R R 80[1] it was pointed out that the mere fact that there was a violation of an Act of Parliament could not give a right to an injunction unless it was proved that the violation of law had occasioned damage or was likely to produce damage which could not otherwise be redressed. In 1 Bom 132,[2] Green J., in his observations at p. 142 made it clear that it is only when an act of any corporation or public company which is in excess of their powers is calculated to be injurious to the rights of the property of an individual that he would have the right to protection of the Court by injunction. In 22 Bom 646,[3] an individual ratepayer was held entitled to an injunction against the company in respect of the application of its funds for the reason that the individual ratepayer had an interest in the funds. That the cause of action arises from an injury resulting to the plaintiff and not merely the capricious or perverse exercise of discretion by a corporation was pointed out also in 6 N L R 53[4] at p. 64. It is obvious therefore that the appellants' case could succeed only on proof of some special damage or injury occasioned to them by reason of the permission granted by the Civil Station Sub-Committee, assuming that it was contrary to the bye-laws and therefore ultra vires. On that point we see no reason to differ from the lower appellate Court's finding. The building proposed to be constructed is in the middle of the plot. It cannot therefore be said that it is not centrally situated. As regards the orientation of the building and the general conservancy arrangements proposed to be made no serious objection was taken in the lower appellate Court. It is only suggested here that in the absence of any public drain there would be the fear of the waste water running underground, but that is a complaint of a general nature. The party proposing to erect building may well in his own interest take such precautions as his neighbours do to prevent nuisance. Nor can there be any grave objection to the position of the out-houses which are admittedly 130′ away from the appellants' bungalow. Any slight inconvenience or discomfort that is likely to be caused is capable of being remedied by common agreement.

To determine whether an act which is complained of as being a nuisance is strictly so or not is to be judged by the ordinary standards of persons residing in the neighbourhood and the criterion would be the ordinary physical comfort of human existence according to plain, sober and simple notions obtaining amongst people and not according to the elegant and dainty modes and habits of living as pointed out in (1930) 1 Ch 138[5] at p. 165; see also A I R 1936 Mad 905.[6] It is not the standard of a petulant, cynical, hypersensitive or fastidious person that would furnish a guide but that of a person who expects to enjoy the ordinary comforts of a decent and healthy life in the local area where he resides. It is possible that some inconvenience or discomfort may be caused but it must be a substantial character to warrant legal interference : see 42 Cal 46,[7] 15 Lah 320,[8] 55 ALL 711[9] and 11

N L R 132.[10] On the facts of this case we are not convinced that there is likelihood of any material interference with the health or comfort of the appellants so as to furnish them with a cause of action.

That really concludes the appeal but inasmuch as the point as to the permission granted by the Civil Station Sub-Committee being ultra vires was argued at length and is of general importance we now proceed to consider it. We are in respectful agreement with the observations made in 56 Bom 135[11] at p. 147, that a statutory body like a municipality acting under a statute must keep strictly within its statutory powers. The validity of the permission granted by the Civil Station Sub-Committee is challenged on two grounds : (1) that it is repugnant to the bye-law 10 of the building bye-laws framed under Ss. 97 and 98, and (2) that it was contrary to the resolution passed by that body on 15th July 1935. In the first instance it must be observed that the Sub-Committee is the only authority within the area which has the power to sanction erection of buildings. In exercising that power it merely performs the duty laid upon it by law. As pointed out in 48 Cal 138,[12] the lack of jurisdiction must be distinguished from the wrong exercise of jurisdiction. While an act done without any power to do so is null and void, an act done in erroneous exercise of that jurisdiction is one that is voidable, that is, rectifiable by a superior authority. As observed by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 25 Bom 337,[13] a Court has jurisdiction to decide wrong as well as right. If the decision of the Municipal Committee was wrong as distinguished from being beyond their power the question would arise whether the civil Court could rectify the wrong. Bye-law 10 of the building bye-laws is as follows :

Ventilation (bungalows)

10 (a) The total built-up area in any plot shall not exceed one-third the area of the plot.

(b) In the case of plots which shall be specified to have an area not less than one acre, no main building shall be erected within 40′ from the boundary ditch of the road or 80′ from any other main building belonging to another bungalow.

Proviso 1—Provided that the following bye-laws apply to the area when so decided by the committee.

(1) If a plot of land on which the building sought to be erected measures not more than 200′ × 200′ and not less than 90′ × 90′ no building shall be erected within 20′ from the limits of the plot on which the building is sought to be erected.

The two succeeding rules lay down the distance of the open space to be left between the main building and the limits of the plot in regard to plots of lesser area. Rule 4 which follows says, no building shall be permitted on a plot of land measuring less than 50′ × 50′. Then there is a proviso No. 2, which lays down that in the basti area no building shall be erected on more than half the area of the plot without the special permission of the committee. The bye-laws are not artistically drafted and they do not contain any provision to help one to construe the material words or expressions occurring therein. From the heading of the bye-law 10 it would appear as if that bye-law was applicable only to bungalows, but proviso 2 refers also to bastis as if bye-law No. 10 was applicable to that area. The expression 'bungalow area' is nowhere defined, but it may be assumed for the purpose of discussion that by-law 10 refers to bungalows. Those who are familiar with the sizes of the plots on which the bungalows in the Civil Station area stand may well be able to recall that ordinarily the sizes of the plots substantially exceed an acre. The bye-law 10 leaves them out of consideration and concerns itself with building plots not less than one acre and those less than one acre of varying dimensions. Plots not less than one acre would be but few and bye-law 10 (b) lays down the rule as to the length of the open space that should be left between two main buildings. Plots less than one acre are exceptional within the so-called bungalow area. Proviso 1 is designed to meet such cases. The proviso does not proprio vigore come into operation so as to make it obligatory on the sub-committee to grant permission to erect buildings on plots less than one acre, but it confers discretion on it to be exercised in each case on merits.

There has been obviously difference of opinion as to the meaning of the word 'area' occurring in proviso 1. While one view is that it means 'bungalow area,' the other is that it means the area of the plot on which a building is proposed to be erected. In our opinion there is in bye-law 10 itself an indication as to the meaning of the word 'area.' The word 'area' occurs in parts (a)

10. ('15) 2 A I R 1915 Nag 79 : 31 I C 62 : 11 N L R 132, Municipal Committee of Saugor v. Nilkanth.
11. ('32) 19 A I R 1932 Bom 259 : 137 I C 545 : 56 Bom 135 : 34 Bom L R 143, Chaganlal Sakerlal v. Thana Municipality.
12. ('21) 8 A I R 1921 Cal 34 : 58 I C 806 : 48 Cal 138 : 31 C L J 482 : 24 C W N 723 (FB), Hriday Nath Roy v. Ram Chandra Barna.
13. ('01) 25 Bom 337 : 27 I A 216 : 2 Bom L R 927 : 7 Sar 739 (P C), Malkarjun v. Narhari.

and (b) of bye-law 10. In both of them the word 'area' is used in connexion with plots. It is a well-known rule of construction of laws that the legislature uses the same word in the same sense when it enacts a law. Following that rule it would be fair that the word 'area' occurring in proviso 1 has reference to the plot and not to that part of the Civil Station which is popularly known as a 'bungalow area.' The plain meaning is that if the committee decides to give permission to erect bunglows in plots less than one acre it should do so on the conditions laid down in that proviso, but it makes it clear that the committee has no power to permit a building on any plot less than 50′ × 50′. It must therefore follow that the sub-committee had power to grant permission to build on the plot under consideration which is less than one acre. Nor has there been any breach of the conditions laid down in proviso as the main building in the present case is more than 40′ away from the road. The Municipal Committee had indubitable power to sanction construction of the building and it did not commit any irregularity in the exercise of it.

The next question is whether the permission was illegal because it contravened its resolution dated 15th July 1935. That resolution declared generally that bye-law 10 (a) and (b) applied to the whole of the Civil Station area, that is bungalow area, excepting the basti area and the new settlements and that proviso 1 to bye-law 10 would apply to the settlements other than the bungalow area. Now the resolution was either interpretive or operative. If it simply interpreted bye-law 10, that interpretation was not absolutely binding on the subsequent meetings of the Civil Station Sub-Committee, as it is well-known that the acts of one meeting are not absolutely binding on a subsequent meeting: see Crew on Law of Meetings, p. 47. At the meeting at which the permission was given, it was open to any member to raise a point of order and seek a ruling from the chairman. Inasmuch as no one raised a point of order it must be held that no member endorsed the interpretation put upon bye-law 10 in resolution passed on 15th July 1935. If, on the other hand, the resolution was intended to be operative that was ultra vires and of no effect. There is nothing in proviso 1 to restrict the scope of the bye-laws which follow that proviso. Whereas the resolution sought to limit bye-law 10 (a) and (b) to the bungalow area proviso 1 to that bye-law refers to the settlements other than the bungalow area. In so curtailing the scope of the bye-law which in its plain terms was, subject to the discretion of the committee, made applicable to the whole of the Civil Station area including the bungalow area, its effect was to alter the bye-law. No doubt it was open to the sub-committee to frame a new bye-law on the lines of the resolution but that could be done only by the procedure prescribed in the C. P. Municipalities Act. That resolution therefore could not impair or otherwise affect the powers of the Civil Station Sub-Committee to consider respondent 1's application for permission to build on his plot on its own merits and decide it one way or the other.

From the foregoing discussion it is evident that the act of the Civil Station Sub-Committee in granting the permission was within the scope of its authority. If so, has the civil Court any power to interfere with the discretion rightly or wrongly exercised by that body? It is a well-known principle that a lawful act cannot prejudice any one (actus legis nemini est damnosus). If the Municipal Committee was within its rights in granting the sanction, its acts being a lawful act cannot be interfered with although it may be prejudicial to any individual. The law has conferred discretionary authority on the Municipal Committee. If this Court were to interfere with the exercise of its discretion as exercised it would be substituting its own discretion for the discretion of the sub-committee and the result would be to nullify the law which confers on the Municipal Committee alone the power to exercise its discretion. The law does not intend the civil Courts to usurp the powers granted to local bodies or other corporations but only to see that those who are vested with the authority do not exceed its limits. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

SUBJECT INDEX

Abadi — Ownership in house or materials thereof passing to auction purchaser at sale of zamindari — Subsequent acquisition of ex-proprietary rights by vendor cannot revive ownership in favour of vendor 395*f*

Advancement — There is no presumption of advancement in India—Source of money flowing from husband and property standing in wife's name—Transaction is benami — Property standing in Mahomedan wife's name — No presumption that it belongs to her husband — Test whether transaction is benami—Source of money is not sole criterion — Slight quantity of evidence may suffice but it must be definite — Evidence as to source of money not convincing — Evidence given and withheld open to adverse criticism — Court must rely on surrounding circumstances, position of parties, their relation to one another, motive governing their action and their subsequent conduct including their dealings with disputed property — Wife unable to prove moneys expended to be her own — She can fall back on plea of advancement — Burden to prove transaction benami is on person asserting it to be so 288*a*

Adverse possession—Plea of, in alternative—Suit for declaration of title — Defendant failing in plea of derivation of title from another — He is not estopped from pleading adverse possession 454*a* ——Title by — Suit for rent — Defendant not found to be tenant and suit dismissed —Defendant's possession becomes adverse 454*b* ——Onus is on plaintiff to establish affirmatively his acquisition of statutory title by reason of adverse possession — No case of permissive possession set up by defendant —Permissive character of possession never arising as independent issue for decision — Question of adverse possession cannot be approached by determining whether defendant has proved permissive possession or not 436*b*

——Proof of—House fallen into ruins and presenting mere appearance of ahata with dalan bounded on all sides by neighbour's houses — Such acts of possession as tethering of cattle, using land as playground, cooking food on ceremonial occasions and even planting trees by real owner's family members cannot be taken to arouse notice of real owner and cannot constitute adverse possession against him 436*c*

Adverse possession

——Mortgagee, during subsistence of mortgage, taking possession with mortgagor's consent — Such possession is possession as mortgagee and is not adverse 84*a* ——Waste land—Suit by taluqdar for possession of jungle and waste land and removal of structures, ditches and newly planted trees constituting trespass — Possession of taluqdar in jungle and waste land and tanks in his village is presumed—Onus is on trespasser to prove adverse possession —Suit falls under Art. 144 and not Art. 120, Limitation Act — Time runs from date of knowledge of encroachment 45*b*

Benami — House standing in Mahomedan wife's name — In reply to municipal notice husband stating house to belong to his wife — Municipality addressing all communications to wife — No motive for husband to conceal his ownership shown — Husband's statement and conduct held strong evidence that purchase of house was for wife's benefit 288*b*

Civil Procedure Code (5 of 1908), Ss. 2 (2) and 96 — Adjudication on preliminary point resulting in dismissal of suit is decree — Adjudication not putting end to suit is not decree — Affirmative finding on preliminary question whether suit for partial pre-emption was maintainable is not decree within S. 2 (2) and hence is not appealable 590*b*

——S. 11—Ejectment suits — Former suit tried by Munsif—Subsequent suit tried by Additional Civil Judge — Subsequent suit held not barred by res judicata as former Court was not competent to try it 429*e*

——S. 47 — Person obtaining decree for possession but not executing same as he was in actual possession — Subsequent dispossession—Suit for possession is not barred 615*b*

——Ss. 47, 2—Question relating to stay of execution—Order on, is not appealable 609*d*

——Ss. 47, 115—Decision of lower appellate Court as to whether certain house attached belonged to judgment-debtor exclusively held not liable to any interference in revision 101*b*

——S. 60 (1) (c) — Plea under S. 60 (1) (c) not raised in written statement but urged only at time of argument before trial Court—Plea held could not be raised: 395*c*

Civil P. C.

——S. 60 (1) (c)—Person relying on S. 60 (1) (c) must show himself to be "agriculturist" — Meaning of "agriculturist" explained 395*d*

——S. 60 (1) (c) — Agriculturist allowing house to be sold without objection under S. 60 (1) (c) — Suit by auction purchaser for possession — Agriculturist and much more stranger, cannot object under S. 60 (1) (c) 395*e*

——Ss. 63 and 73—Decree by L against W from Additional Judge, Small Causes — L applying for execution by attachment of W's salary — Decree by E against same judgment-debtor in Court of Small Causes —Application by E for attachment of W's salary under O. 21, R. 48—Subsequent application by E under Ss. 63 and 73 — E held entitled to rateable distribution from date of application for execution and not from date of application under Ss. 63 and 73 277*a*

——S. 80—Person appointed mutwalli by District Judge—Suit in respect of acts done by such person—Merely because such person happens to be public officer, acts done by him cannot be said to be done in official capacity—No notice is necessary 529*y*

——S. 80—Words "cause of action" should not be construed in narrow sense 355*b*

——S. 91 — Public nuisance — Special damage—Plaintiff individually maintaining action must show that he suffered damage more than general body of public—Mere placing of obstruction in front of plaintiff's house which does not impede his coming in or going out from his house cannot be said to cause special damage to plaintiff 52*b*

——Ss. 96 and 2 (2)—Appeal is creature of statute — Appellant claiming right of appeal against trial Court's finding must show that it amounts to decree within Section 2 (2) 590*a* ——S. 100—Omission to consider part of evidence—Finding of fact can be interfered with 615*a*

——S. 100 — Sale — Finding that price alleged in deed is grossly inadequate is one of fact 479*c*

——S. 100 — Adverse possession is mixed question of fact and law—Facts found by first appellate Court are binding in second appeal — Question whether facts establish adverse possession being one of law can be challenged 436*a*

——S. 100—Finding of fact on question of title cannot be challenged in second appeal 429*a*

——S. 100—Finding that party's title is proved is one of fact 412*b*

——S. 100—Finding that gift was in lieu of dower debt is binding in second appeal 348*b*

——S. 100 — Finding of fact — Finding that a mortgage deed had not been executed by executant as guardian of a minor is a finding of fact and not open to challenge in second appeal—The finding that minor had not been benefited by mortgage executed by guardian is equally a finding of fact which is not assailable in second appeal 226*a*

——S. 100 — Accounts of village profits directed to be taken by trial Court—Point that certain income was not considered is one of fact—Point raised in cross-objections in first appellate Court — No arguments addressed—Point cannot be raised in second appeal 203*d*

——S. 100—Question of possession in lieu of dower—Issue framed but not pressed—Point not clearly taken in grounds of first appeal but argued very shortly—Point not taken in grounds of second appeal—Point cannot be raised as being one of fact: 198*d*

——S. 102—Order made in execution proceedings in suit of nature cognizable by Court of small causes—Second appeal does not lie 101*a*

——S. 104 (c), Sch. 2, Para. 16 and O. 43, R. 1 (m)—Court directing office to make necessary adjustments in award as agreed to by parties—Objection to amendment made by office—Order deciding objection is not open to appeal or revision—Proper remedy is appeal from decree 598*a*

——S. 107—Decree against debtor and surety—Appeal by surety alone — Decree cannot be set aside against non-appealing debtor 593*b*

——S. 109 (c) — High Court entertaining application for revision under S. 115, Civil P. C., against decree passed in terms of award—Case does not involve decision on matter of general public importance and case cannot be certified to be fit one under Section 109 (c) 245

——S. 110, Para. 2—Meaning explained —S. 110, Para. 2 means that suit to satisfy its conditions must involve rights and claims to property which are worth Rupees 10,000 or upwards and not that rights should affect property value of which is Rs. 10,000 or upwards 407

Civil P. C.

——Ss. 113, 151 and O. 46, R. 1 — Suit pending before trial Court being one subject to appeal and second appeal—It is not competent for the trial Court either under S. 113 or S. 151 to refer to High Court question whether it is competent to decide certain issue 83

——S. 115 and O. 6, R. 17—Order allowing amendment of plaint—No revision lies 623

——S. 115—High Court does not interfere with interlocutory order or when remedy by way of appeal is open 598*b*

——Ss. 115 and 152 — Application under S. 115 against order of amendment of decree under S. 152 can be maintained 66*a*

——S. 149 and O. 7, R. 11 — S. 149 and not O. 7, R. 11 enables Court to grant time for making good deficient court-fee—Under S. 149 Court has judicial discretion to grant time — O. 7, R. 11 does not compel Court to give time—Application showing no reason for grant of time but merely stating that applicant had not got amount of necessary court-fee without offering explanation —Refusal to grant time held justified — In circumstances of case trial Court directed to reconsider aforesaid application 30*c*

——S. 151, O. 41, Rr. 23, 25 and 27 — Appellate Court has ample power to remand case apart from provisions of O. 41, Rr. 23 and 25 — It has ample power to remand case under S. 151 — Appellate Court finding trial Court's refusal to allow party to produce and examine certain witness not justified—It can remand case under S. 151 for further evidence and decision of issues in light of that evidence— O. 41, R. 27 does not apply 561

——S. 151—Remedy provided by Code — S. 151 cannot be invoked — Suit for partition of undivided share in revenue paying villages — Preliminary decree declaring plaintiff's share passed — No further action taken — Plaintiff cannot invoke S. 151 to have proclamation made in suit villages that he was entitled to share declared by preliminary decree since remedy by way of final partition decree is open 383*a*

——Ss. 151 and 152—Lapse of time is no bar for correction of errors under Ss. 151 and 152—Case decided and decree satisfied —Error creeping into record accidentally or by design—Court though functus officio can in appropriate case correct error—Only restriction upon power to correct is in cases of rights of third party if they have crept in 344

Civil P. C.

*——S. 151— Application of auction-purchaser under O. 21, R. 97 erroneously dismissed when he was late only by fifteen minutes—Application can be restored under provisions of S. 151 91*b*

——O. 1, R. 3, S. 99 and O. 2, R. 3 — Suit by vendee of mortgagee rights against mortgagors — Vendee can implead his vendor as well and ask for relief against him in alternative — Suit is not barred by O. 1 R. 3 — Nor can relief against vendor be said to be premature — Applicability of O. 2, R. 3 is doubtful 56*d*

——O. 1, R. 10 — Court has ample power to correct bona fide error—Plaintiff wrongly described as minor — Immediately, on discovering error, counsel asking Court to correct it — Mistake bona fide— Court should order amendment and not dismiss suit — S. 22, Limitation Act, does not apply to such case 43

——O. 2, R. 6—O. 2, R. 6 is enabling rule — Fact that Court did not choose to avail of it is no ground for interference in second appeal 56*e*

——O. 3, R. 1, S. 26 and O. 41, R. 1 — Presentation of every document in Court must be governed by O. 3, R. 1 — O. 41, R. 1 is combination of S. 26 and O. 3, R. 1 —Presentation of plaint, memo of appeal or application to Munsarim of Court is "act in any Court" within meaning of O. 3, R. 1— Application under Sch. 2, Para. 20 presented by party's counsel—Counsel's certificate of practice expiring before date of presentation and renewed only after aforesaid date —Presentation of application is invalid: 169

——O. 6—Practice of introducing obscure pleading with view to take adversary by surprise deprecated—It is duty of Court to clarify pleadings 457*g* ——O. 6, R. 4 — Plea under S. 53, T. P. Act, not specifically pleaded in written statement but raised in course of argument — Plea held could not be allowed as it took plaintiff unawares 457*h*

——O. 6, R. 17—Order under O. 6, R. 17 —No revision lies 87

——O. 7, R. 9—Order "register" on plaint is not order of admission necessitating Court to grant time for payment of deficient court-fee 30*b*

*——O. 9, R. 9 and S. 115— Propriety of order under O. 9, R. 9 restoring application cannot be raised in appeal from decree in suit—Order is open to revision under S. 115: 10 O W N 1316=('33) 20 A I R 1933 Oudh 331=143 I C 222, OVERRULED 367*a*

Civil P. C.

——O. 9, R. 9—Application for permission to sue as pauper dismissed for default of appearance — Applicant present in Court on day of hearing but failing to appear as he did not hear case being called out and filing application for restoration on same day — Application held should be restored 367*b*

——O. 9, R. 9 and S. 151—Court not finding sufficient cause under O. 9, R. 9 — It may still restore application or suit to correct palpable mischief (Obiter) 367*c*

——O. 9, R. 9—O. 9, R. 9 whether applies to restoration of application under O. 21, R. 97 (Quære) 91*a*

——O. 13, R. 10 — Mere summoning of record does not ipso facto make entire record evidence in case—During inspection Court coming across important document throwing light on question at issue or being helpful in ascertaining truth — Court must take proper proceedings to have document brought on record and proved according to law before using it as evidence 341*b*

——O. 20, R. 19—Suit for partition of undivided share in revenue paying and other property — Preliminary decree decreeing suit for possession of plaintiff's share in certain properties—Form of decree held not proper—Decree held should have provided for further action by revenue authorities in respect of revenue paying property and further directions in respect of other property 383*b*

——O. 21, R. 15 — Several joint decreeholders—Payment to one does not bind others unless he represents them in some way 336

——O. 21, R. 16 and S. 37 (b) — O. 21, R. 16 does not contemplate order of substitution — It gives transferee of decree right to apply for execution directly without obtaining order for substitution — Application can be entertained only by trial Court or on its ceasing to exist, under Section 37 (b) 512

*——O. 21, Rr. 58 and 63 — Objection under R. 58 dismissed — Within one year from order of dismissal amount of decree paid up by judgment-debtor and attachment withdrawn — Claimant need not sue under R. 63 95*b*

——O. 21, R. 62 — Mere fact that incumbrances are notified in sale proclamation does not dispense with proof regarding validity of incumbrances 205*a*

——O. 22, R. 3 and O. 41, R. 4 — R. 4 of O. 41 applies to case under O. 22, R. 3 (2) 155

Civil P. C.

——O. 22, R. 4 — Application by debtors under Ss. 4 and 49, U. P.
